J. W. WRETHER,
Millfield, O.

Professor Maspero has discovered at Coptos, the ancient mart in Egypt of Indian commerce, five Greek inscriptions and one Latin, the latter of great importance, bearing, as it does, on the history of the stations along the ancient desert route from Coptos to the Red Sea. During his spring campaign in Upper Egypt he excavated the sepulcher of Shes Hor-hotep, of the XIth Dynasty, which he describes as "a marvel of painting and design," and which, taken to pieces slab by slab, has been dispatched to Boulaq, where it will be re-erected, like the famous tomb at Berlin. He found, also, others, one of a queen belonging to the XIth or XIIth Dynasty, named Tumm, and the remaining eight dating from the XVIIIth to the XXVIth Dynasty. Together with these he recovered seventeen fine mummies, chiefly of the Greek period, several statues, a peculiarly beautiful altar of Ptolemaic workmanship, a granite sphinx, and a group of heads from Edfu.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:
"THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." Acts means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on this earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked: eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and its morning as prerequisites for the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

BRITISH PHASE OF THE EASTERN QUESTION.—No. 10.

Her Eastern Mission Further Examined—Colonization of the Jews—Their Union with Ephraim, who Holds the Stick (Power) of Joseph—Steps Preparatory to that Union.

1. Turkey Under the Control of England (Ephraim); 2. Colonization Results in the Establishment of a New Government; 3. Highways Opened and Managed by Great Britain; 4. Egypt Still Held by England; 5. Syria and Palestine Come Under British Control; 6. Assyria is Held by England; 7. Egypt and Assyria are Joined to Israel (Palestine), and the Three Form One Nationality; 8. Prosperity of the Remnant Nation. 9. Judah Converted; 10. Israel-Ephraim-England Discovers her True Origin and Nationality.

Great work for England—to colonize the Jews in Palestine and protect them. This is Jehovah's work for the British empire. In this work she is now occupied, preparatory to other forward movements, under "Michael the Archangel"—"One of the chief princes"—Daniel's prince"—"That standeth for the children of thy (Daniel's) people." The standing up of Michael is an event that belongs to the "Time of the End;" and as we are now living in that period, Michael is standing up; and as the Jews are now returning, they are returning under the lead of Michael, their prince, who is the invisible guide of the British nation. We see no escape from this conclusion. Every move of British rule eastward is a lucid demonstration of this startling truth. As the line of her eastern progress is along the southern half of the belt of ancient empire, she was obliged to take Egypt first; then the land of Israel (Palestine). The third in order will be Assyria, for Syria and part of Arabia, if not all, belong to the land of the Abrahamic promise.

Jewish colonization. The present progress of Jewish colonization is wonderful, only to those who do not admit that God's servant, Michael, is their invisible guide. With that archangel in view, the mystery vanishes. Allow Michael to be the prime minister of the British empire of the Orient, and the movements and success of that empire are readily understood. The colonization scheme can be fully comprehended. These colonies grow into villages; it is then "the land of unwalled villages that are at rest, that dwell safely, all of them, dwelling without walls, and having neither bars nor gates." Ezek. xxxviii. 11. Who can carry on and protect such a movement but the God of that movement? And what visible agent has he, if we except the British empire? With the Bible before him, who can doubt the ultimate success of the colonization scheme?

A short work will the Lord make of this movement. England's power over Turkey will foster and push forward this great work. The former prime minister, Lord Beaconsfield, laid the foundation of that far-reaching scheme which is so ably but blindly supported by England's present premier.

If God's purpose with the British empire is to colonize the Jews in Palestine; make of them and Israel a remnant nation, and protect them till the Messiah takes the visible command, would not that empire be compelled to do what she is now working out?

2. She would be obliged to control the north of Africa and the southern part of Asia. This would be necessary in order to secure and control the right of way eastward.

3. She would be required to open up and maintain great national highways to the East. This her commerce would require, for it would be necessary to give these colonies other work than simply tilling a few square miles of land; the scheme would require the Jews (many of them) to be commission merchants, since they, in their location, would be required to handle all the articles moving either eastward or to the west. Being familiar with all tongues, they could transact business with all nations. They would be required to speak the English language, and their education would then be suited to their mission.

Any one can readily see that the Jews, in that position, would become immensely wealthy. This would soon be the result, should the wealthy Jews, such as the Rothschilds and the Barings, take part in the movement. They would then excite the cupidity of Gog. "Art thou come to take a spoil? Hast thou gathered thy company to take a prey? to carry away silver and gold, to take away cattle and goods, to take a great spoil?" Ezek. xxxviii. 13.

4. It would be necessary, also, to sustain one continuous northern barrier against the southern progress of the Russian empire, for Russia and England are enemies, both from position and aim. Both empires seek to control the East for political purposes. One of the powers only can be supreme. It is very evident that England, if now exposed along her contemplated highways, would be defeated in her plans, since Turkey and Persia would be forced to take a part against her. Russia's design on the Ottoman empire is well understood; and she seeks a plausible pretext to secure her prey. Persia is too much exposed to her northern neighbor to make any warlike movement against her till England is in a position to give her ample protection. It is evident, then, that England must sustain in her policy the Ottoman and Persian empires.

5. The British empire must gain the control, especially, of Palestine, Syria, Assyria, Persia, and Arabia also. These points will come up under the investigation of other phases.

6. She must keep control of the seas. Should any power cause Great Britain to lose her ocean empire, her eastern empire would come suddenly to an end, as she would not be able to transport her armies to defend her eastern possessions. What would India be without protection from the home government? How could she protect Egypt and the returning Jews? We cannot view the British ocean power, (her tonnage being more than double that of Portugal, Spain, Italy, France, Austria, Turkey, China, Russia; more than double that of all Gentile nations, the United States being excepted), without the conviction that the Almighty has so ordered it, in order that that empire subserve his purposes in gathering and protecting his people. If the French fleet, at Trafalgar, combined, as it was, with that of Spain, and far exceeding that of Nelson, had been victorious, the sceptre of the ocean would have changed its nationality; but such was not God's purpose, since the time for the return of Israel and Judah was approaching, and the visible agent to protect the chosen, was Ephraim, the stick of Joseph being in his hand, under his western name of Saxon, (Son of Isaac) as "in Isaac thy seed shall be called."

7. It was required that God's executive agent in this last great work, should be a commercial people—a nation of merchants. This will appear evident if we consider that all these great results, relative to the gathering of God's ancient people, were to be accomplished by what would seem to be natural causes. British commerce requires for its protection an immense navy. Such a navy gives her the control of the seas, and makes her the natural agent to return and protect the Jews. She appears to act freely, yet she is the direct agent of the Great Unseen.

God does his will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth. While England does all to elevate her national greatness, Jehovah is causing her to work out his own purposes.

8. It is necessary that that nation should be a missionary people. Such a work as England has devised, and has been carrying forward during a century, was required to prepare the way for the proper instruction of the people that were to constitute the ruling nation in the coming age.

Many other points might be named, but these are quite sufficient for our present purpose. They identify the British empire as the visible power, now under the control of Michael, the great prince of the Hebrews.

England is evidently pointed out in Ezek. xxxviii 13. "Sheba, and Dedan, and the merchants of Tarshish, with all the young lions thereof." To make this clear requires a very considerable amount of thought. The eastern world has allowed its population, like swarms, to move to the West, plant nations with new names, new thoughts, manners and customs; but her lands could not float with her people; hence these lands carry their first Scripture names, and consequently impart their names to their occupants, no matter of what race. Asia is noted for this peculiarity. The western and southern divisions of the globe, being principally without any ancient names now known to the civilized world, could be designated by new names. Look over the eastern belt of empires, and mark the names of the countries: Egypt, Persia, Syria, Arabia, Assyria, Persia, Media, India, China. The same is true of the Rivers, Nile, Jordan, Euphrates, Tigris, Indus, and Ganges. The occupants of those waters, and of those countries may change their species and races, yet their names remain. An Egyptian is an inhabitant of Egypt, whatever may have been his former name. The name does not require that they shall be native born. The same is true of all countries. We are required to know what people dwell in certain countries at the time to which certain prophecies allude. It is not what people dwelt in Tarshish, Sheba, and Dedan, when Ezekiel uttered his prediction, but what people dwelt there in the "latter days." "Young lions," "merchants of Tarshish," would indicate a rule of merchant princes, and descendants or colonies of a great commercial nation. Since those countries are coming under the protection of England, the prophecy looks to that people.

In taking leave of this mighty empire as it moves towards the Orient, we are obliged to admit some degree of excitement. The origin of the British empire, its past history and its present position, point to some terrible movement in the near future. 1, The standing up of Michael, the great prince; 2, The time of trouble; 3, The delivery of Daniel's people; 4, The sleepers in dust awaking; 5, The division of the human family; 6, The shining forth of the righteous under the glories of the Messiah. These are themes calculated to absorb every thought. Is it possible that Michael is commander-in-chief of the Oriental movement? Are the nations now gathering towards the mountains of Israel, preparatory to the battle of that great day? Michael, that great prince, that disputed with Satan over the body of Moses; that fought with his angels against the dragon and his angels; that contended against the Persian and Grecian empires, is now about to enter into deadly strife against the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet.

A world about to change its monarchs and its empires for Messiah's reign! What terrible conflicts will precede the Messianic coronation! No peaceful abdication! No casting of their crowns peaceably at the feet of God's beloved Son. The beast will be taken, and with him the false prophet, and finally the dragon must surrender his power and his throne. The shadows of these events fall upon us; the hour of conflict approaches. Nations are, at the sound of the war-drum and trumpet, marshaling to the places to be occupied in the conflict. Yet the world is dreaming; yea, and an apostate church is dreaming, of peace, and centuries of peaceful reform under the banners of corrupt and doomed nations—giving no head to the coming storm.

But let us bid adieu to the British empire till we trace other powers to the same advanced position.

J. P. WESTHEE.

Editor Restitution:

I send you a letter and an answer which I sent to the A. C. Review, but they have returned. If you can use it, do; if not, I will answer privately.

By this letter we see that there are some around who are inquiring after the truth. The articles referred to in the Review are these: A Mr. Cone, a Christian preacher, has been writing some articles on the kingdom, setting forth the church as the kingdom. These articles were open for replies, so I replied to them as best I could. This was continued until Mr. Rice requested me to stop. So I did stop, thanking him for publishing what he did. So I suppose this is the reason for not publishing further. Mr. Cone's positions were very unscriptural, according to our understanding of the Bible.

Yours in the truth,

J. B. COX.

Editor A. C. Review:

I ask a short space in your columns for a letter and an answer to it. I have received many letters of encouragement from different readers of your liberal paper, and only this one I ask to answer through it. This is a true copy of the letter.

OWENTON, Ky., Aug. 4, '83.

Bro. J. B. Cox—Dear Sir:

Having become quite an interested reader of your publications in the A. C. Review on the kingdom, must be my excuse for writing you.

I have been of opinion, or rather belief, that the universal kingdom of heaven which is to succeed the four universal earthly kingdoms will be at the second advent of Christ.

The best article I have seen on that subject was in the June number of Zion's Day Star, entitled, "My Reasons Why," which paper I have ordered to be sent to you. And I must say that my mind has undergone a change with regard to the punishment of the wicked. I do not now believe that it will be unending. After you receive the paper, I would be glad to hear from you privately or through the Review. Fraternally yours,

J. H. THRELKELD.

CRAWFORDSVILLE, Ind., August 30, 1883.

Dear Friend and Brother:

In answer to your kind letter I wish to say that many became interested in my articles by way of replies published in the A. C. Review on things concerning the kingdom of God. For many there are who now believe that the kingdom of God will follow the four universal kingdoms referred to in the second chapter of Daniel's prophecy. There is no doubt whatever that the four divisions in the metallic image represent the four universal kingdoms which have existed on this earth, the fourth still existing in its divided parts as represented by the toes of the feet. The same illustration occurs in the seventh chapter, where Daniel speaks of the four beasts and the ten horns that should arise. These are, he says, ten kings that shall arise. These toes or horns still existing, we are therefore living in the closing days of the fourth universal kingdom. So the time is fast approaching when the God of heaven shall set up a kingdom that shall not be destroyed. Now, as four universal kingdoms succeeded each other, so the kingdom of God will succeed the four universal kingdoms. We read: "And in the days of these kings (or kingdoms) shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever." Now what kingdoms are to be in existence when the God of heaven shall set up a kingdom that will break them in pieces? It certainly cannot be the Roman kingdom in its undivided state, or it should read, "in the days of this kingdom." But no; it is in the plural, which means more than one; the former kingdoms only existed one at a time. Therefore it cannot mean them as a whole. So we must conclude that it refers to the ten or horn kingdoms, and these are they that must be destroyed when God shall set up his kingdom which shall never be destroyed. The signs of the times indicate that it is in the near future.

I have received the papers you sent me, for which I thank you. The Zion's Day Star is a very worthy paper.

You also inform me in your letter that your mind has undergone a change with regard to the punishment of the wicked. I take it for granted that before you changed your mind on the subject, you held the popular view, which is "eternal torment," but now you believe that there will be an end to the torment of the wicked. The Bible teaching on this subject is: The wicked shall be destroyed. We read: "At the revelation of the Lord Jesus from heaven with the angels of his power in flaming fire, rendering vengeance to them that know not God, and to them that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus: who shall suffer punishment, even eternal destruction from the face of the Lord and the glory of his might, when he shall come to be glorified in his saints." 2 Thess. i. 7-10, Revised version.

Thus we see that the wicked must come to an end. The Psalmist no doubt understood this when he said: "Wait on the Lord, and keep his way, and he shall exalt thee to inherit the land when the wicked are cut off: thou shalt see it." Psa. xxxvii. 34.

Also the wise man, I think, believed that the wicked would not exist eternally. He says: "For the upright shall dwell in the land, and the perfect shall remain in it. But the wicked shall be cut off from the earth, and the transgressors shall be rooted out of it." Prov. ii. 21-22.

Nowhere in the teaching of Jesus or his disciples can we find that eternal life is offered to the wicked, either in happiness or in misery. But to the righteous eternal life is promised. I therefore exhort you, my brother, to be steadfast in well doing, always abounding in the work of the Lord, and may it be our lot to meet each other in the kingdom of our God, if we should not meet in this age.

Yours in hope of the soon-coming kingdom. J. B. COX.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—Second Series. Number 27.

THE RUINS

The ruins on the summit of Tabor are extensive. The destroyer, however, has dealt so extensively with them, and they are so overgrown with thorns, and briars and thistles, that any minute examination by a passing traveller is impossible. I spent the whole afternoon exploring, and since that time I spent an entire day among them, yet I was not satisfied.

The top of the mount is a level, oval-shaped area, about a mile in circuit. Round it are the remains of a massive wall, outside which is a moat hewn in the rock. The foundations of the wall are colossal, and of the earliest type of Jewish masonry. Some of the towers are much more recent; and one gateway, still standing, has a pointed Saracenic arch, and an Arabic inscription stating that the fortress was built, or more probably rebuilt, by Abubekr, brother of the renowned Saladin, in the year A. D. 1210. Near the south-eastern angle I saw a little vault in which the Latin Monks from Nazareth celebrate an annual mass, in honor of the Transfiguration. On the opposite side the Greeks have their altar and sanctuary, and are in the habit, I was informed, of making a yearly pilgrimage to the spot and spending a day on the summit. But during my visits to Tabor, the mountain was deserted. Not a human being was there; and not a vestige of anything like a permanent abode of man. I saw dead ashes and charred sticks, left there apparently by some passing traveller like myself. I was not even so fortunate as to meet the hermit of whom Dean Stanley tells such a romantic story, but if the panther I saw was that which is said to have been the constant companion of the old man, I fear his attempts to tame it had not been very successful.

The top of Tabor was evidently the site of a city as well as of a sanctuary from a very early period. In fact, its strong and commanding position could not fail to attract the notice of the warlike Canaanites. The city was allotted to Issachar (Josh. xix. 22); and it continued a place of note, not only throughout the whole period of Jewish history, but down to the close of the Crusades.

The view from Tabor possesses a far higher interest for the Bible student and the Christian pilgrim than its heavy and desolate ruins. It is one of those wondrous panoramas which time can never obliterate from the memory; and whose striking features and vivid coloring, change can never dim. The notes I wrote on the mount are before me, but they are scarcely needed. I see the landscape now as I saw it then. On the north, Naphtali's brown peaks running in a serried ridge athwart the glowing sky. Further to the right a little corner of the Sea of Galilee, slumbering in its deep, deep bed, and the glittering top of Hermon towering over it like a guardian angel. On the east the long purple ridge of Gilead, rising like a colossal wall from the Jordan valley. On the south the plain of Esdraelon, Palestine's battle-field, sweeping round the base of the mount, and extending, a sea of verdure, away to the hills of Samaria, and the dark ridge of Carmel. In the distance, ranged along its opposite side, I saw dimly the isolated tells on which once stood the cities of Taanach, Megiddo, and Jokneam of Carmel. Directly facing me, four miles distant, beyond an eastern arm of the plain, rose "the hill of Moreh," a grey, treeless ridge, with the villages of Endor and Nain upon its side. Over its left shoulder appeared the bare white top of Gilboa. Westward my eye wandered along the wooded heights of Galilee to the Great Sea, a section of which was visible beside the bold promontory of Carmel.

Standing on this spot I was able to understand why Tabor was the gathering-place of the northern tribes. Connected by a wooded ridge with the hills of Galilee and mountains of Naphtali, it was always accessible to them; while at the same time it stood out commanding the plain of Esdraelon. Its steep sides were easily defended, and its broad top gave ample space for the organization of a little army of mountaineers. The plain below it was the center of attraction for all invaders. Its pastures tempted the nomads of Arabia; its firm flat surface attracted the chariots and horsemen of Philistia, Canaan, and Syria. From the top of Tabor the light infantry of Israel could watch all their movements, and take advantage of any fitting opportunity for attack. The graphic story of Barak and Deborah was here brought vividly before my mind:—Barak eagerly watching the advance of Sisera across the plain; while Deborah, with the enthusiasm of a patriot and the inspiration of a prophetess, looked and prayed to heaven for the signal to attack. At length her eye saw it, and she cried: "Up, for this is the day in which the Lord hath delivered Sisera into thine hand: is not the Lord gone out before thee?" Judges iv. 14.

The sun went down, and deep purple shadows fell upon plain and valley. The wild, plaintive wail of jackals, mingled with the sharper howl of wolves, warned me to seek safer quarters. I mounted and rode slowly down to Deburieh. Here stood the Canaanitish Daberath, but it has long since disappeared, and the only remains of antiquity now are the walls of a mediæval church.

THE VALLEY OF JEZREEL.

"I will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel." Hosea i. 5. The old city of Jezreel gave its name to one of the noblest plains of Palestine, and that name was afterwards softened by the Greeks into the more familiar Esdraelon. Its position affords a key to its bloody history. It intersects Central Palestine, extending from the bay of Acre to the fords of the Jordan. It was thus open to all invaders—to the Philistines from the coast, the Israelites from the east, and the Syrians from the north; while at a later period it was the highway along which passed and repassed the armies of Assyria and Egypt. Its wide-spread meadows and corn-fields, its luxuriant pastures and abundant waters courted rest, and gave ample space for military manœuvres. The northern tribes watched the invaders from the top of Tabor, and the southern tribes had their gathering-place on the heights of Gilboa, or at the passes of Megiddo, according as the enemy came from the east or west.

Issachar, to whom this plain was allotted, suffered more than all the other tribes. His was a hard lot. In the condition and history of the plain—open to every incursion, exposed to every shock of war—we see the fortunes of the tribe, and we have a melancholy commentary on the blessing of Jacob: "Issachar is a strong ass, couching down between two burdens; and he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was pleasant; and bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute." Gen. xlix. 14, 15. As the peasants do still who cultivate patches of Esdraelon, Issachar paid black-mail to the "children of the East." When the tribe saw the prowess of David, and his ability to protect Israel, their valuable possessions and exposed positions made them anxious for his succession to the throne. And this explains the words of the sacred writer—"Of the children of Issachar, which were men that had understanding of the times, to know what Israel ought to do." 1 Chron. xii. 32.

The main part of Esdraelon is triangular in form. Its base on the east reaches from Enganeim to Tabor, fifteen miles; and its apex is at the foot of Carmel, where the Kishon flows into the plain of Acre. From the base, however, three arms stretch out eastward, divided by two short parallel ridges. The northern arm lies between Tabor and the ridge of Moreh, and the central between the latter and Gilboa. These two extend down to the Jordan. The third arm is on the south side of Gilboa, and is shut in on the east by the mountains of Ephraim.—J. L. Porter.

THE LUTHERS.

The Luders, Luthers—the name is the same as Luthair—were a family of peasants at Mohra or More, a village on the skirts of the Thuringian forest, in the Electorate of Saxony. "I am a peasant's son," Luther wrote, "father, grandfather, great-grandfather, were all peasants." The father, Hans or John, was a miner. He learned his trade in a copper mine at Mohra, but removed in early manhood to Eisleben, where business was more active; and there, being a tough, thrifty, industrious man, he did well for himself. The Mohra people were a hard race—what the Scotch call "dour," and Hans Luther was one of them. He married a peasant woman like himself, and from this marriage, now just 400 years ago, on the 10th of November, 1483, came into the world at Eisleben his first-born son, Martin. Six months later, still following his mining work, Hans moved his family to Mansfeld, a few miles distant in a valley on the slopes of the Harts Mountains. He continued to prosper. He worked himself with his pick in the mine shafts. The wife cut and carried the wood for the cottage. Hans, steadily rising, became the proprietor of a couple of smelting furnaces; in 1491 he became one of the four church elders—what we should call church wardens. He drew the attention of Count Mansfeld himself, whose castle overhung the village, and was held in high esteem by him. Melancthon, who knew both Hans and his wife, admired and honored both of them. Their portraits were taken afterwards by Cranach—the features of both expressing honesty, piety and clear intelligence.

Martin was the eldest of seven children; he was brought up kindly, of course, but without special tenderness. He honored and loved his parents, as it was bound to do, but he thought in his own later life that they had been over-harsh with him. He remembered that he had been beaten more than once for trifles, worse than his fault deserved. Of the village school to which he was early sent, his recollections were only painful. He was taught to read and write, and there was what pretended to be an elementary Latin class. But the school-masters of his childhood, he said, were jailers and tyrants, and the schools were little hells. A sense of continued wickedness and injustice weighed on him as long as he remained there, and made his childhood miserable. But he must have shown talents which encouraged his father to spare no cost on his son's education that his own scanty means would allow. When he was 14 he was sent to a more expensive school at Magdeburg, and thence, after a year, to a still better school at Eisenach, where he was taught thoroughly, and his mind began to open. Religion, as with all superior lads, became the first thought with him. He asked himself what God was, what he was, and what God required him to do; and here the impressions of his home experiences began to weave themselves into what he learned from books.—James Anthony Froude, in the Contemporary Review.

He who foresees calamities suffers them twice over.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Sept. 19, 1883.

THE editor expects to be in Brother W. T. Huffin's neighborhood, Huntington Co., Ind., Saturday evening and Sunday, Sept. 29 and 30, to preach the Word.

TICKETS will be sold to Chicago and return, via the Pittsburgh, Ft. Wayne and Chicago Railway, at exceedingly cheap rates on Wednesday, Sept. 26, good until Friday Sept. 28 inclusive.

Wilford's Microcosm for August and September have come to hand. Though differing with both editor and contributors in some important respects, we find articles that we read with pleasure and profit. One dollar a year. Address 23 Park Row, New York.

The Old Testament Student for the current month has just been received. It is a continuation of the Hebrew Student under another name. We commend this periodical to all who are studying the Hebrew language, and, indeed, to all who are carefully investigating the Old Testament Scriptures. One dollar a year. Address, Morgan Park, Ill.

The International Standard for September, also, is before us. From our peculiar tastes we find much pleasure in perusing this serial. Although it is a scientific magazine containing articles requiring a considerable amount of mathematical knowledge to comprehend, yet it also contains a large amount of instructive matter for the general reader. We commend it especially to the attention of scholars. Two dollars a year. Address, 339 Euclid Avenue, Cleveland Ohio.

The Gospel according to St. Matthew, translated from the Greek Text of Constantius, Tischendorff and other textual authorities. By Charles Gardner, M. A. Cloth, finely bound, 60 cts. So far we have only found time to glance at some pages of this book, but this slight perusal gives us a very favorable impression of the work. For a copy address this office.

THE following selections were sent by a brother beloved. The second—true for ages—has vindicated those prophecies that foretold just such desolations. But we are nearing an important change, when God will make the "desolate land like the garden of Eden; and the waste and desolate and ruined cities to become fenced and inhabited;" when he will cause the mountains of Israel to shoot forth their branches to yield fruit to his people that are at hand to come. Soon the King of Israel will dwell in Jerusalem, and then he will make his people a name and a praise among all people of the earth.

GREAT PROJECTS.

Immense projects seem to be a special characteristic of the present age. The proposal to tunnel the English Channel, in reference to which considerable has already been done; the connection of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans by a ship canal across the Isthmus of Panama, a work already under way; the flooding of the Great Sahara by a canal from the Mediterranean; and a second canal across the Isthmus of Suez; are projects with which the public are already familiar.

And now comes another great scheme which is nothing less than to make Jerusalem a seaport by flooding the great hollow of the Jordan valley and the Dead Sea, by a canal from the Mediterranean sufficient in width and depth to float the largest ships. The Interior, of Chicago, thus speaks of it:

"The project of building a second canal across the Isthmus of Suez has been followed by a proposition to turn Jerusalem into a seaport by bringing the Mediterranean into the heart of Palestine. So far as at present outlined, the scheme includes a canal twenty-five miles in length, from Haifa, in the bay of Acre, through the plain of Esdraelon to the Jordan valley. The depth of the proposed canal is to be forty feet, and its width two hundred feet. This work will bring the waters of the Mediterranean into the deep trough of the Jordan, 1,300 feet below the sea level, and will extend by way of the sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea. It is further proposed to construct a canal along the wady that reaches from the southern shore of the latter sea to the head of the gulf of Akaba, twenty miles in length, and thus connect with the Red Sea. If this plan is successfully carried out, it is expected that an inland sea about two hundred miles long, varying in width from three to ten miles, and deep enough to float vessels of the largest size, would extend from the Mediterranean to the Dead Sea. An English company, with the Duke of Marlborough at its head, has been formed to survey the Jordan valley, sound the Dead Sea, and explore the deserts. They propose to pay $5,000,000 as indemnity to the natives who own the tract of Holy Land to be submerged by the meeting of the two seas."

THE LASH OF PALESTINE.

Palestine sits in sackcloth and ashes. Over it broods the spell of a curse that has withered its fields and fettered its energies. Where Sodom and Gomorrah reared their domes and towers, that solemn sea now floods the plain in whose bitter waters no living thing exists; over whose waveless surface the blistering air hangs motionless and dead; about whose borders nothing grows but weeds and scattering tufts of cane, and that treacherous fruit that promises refreshment to parching lips, but turns to ashes at the touch. Nazareth is forlorn. About the ford of Jordan, where the hosts of Israel entered the promised land with songs of rejoicing, one finds only a squalid camp of fantastic Bedouins of the desert: Jericho, the accursed, lies a mouldering ruin today, even as Joshua's miracle left it more than three thousand years ago; Bethlehem and Bethany, in their poverty and their humiliation, have nothing about them now to remind one that they once knew the high honor of the Savior's presence: the hallowed spot where shepherds watched their flocks by night, and where angels sang "Peace on earth, good will to men," is untenanted by any living creature, and unblessed by any feature that is pleasant to the eye.

Jerusalem itself, the stateliest name in history, has lost all its ancient grandeur, and is become a pauper village; the riches of Solomon are no longer there to compel the admiration of Oriental queens: the wonderful temple which was the pride and glory of Israel, is gone, and the Ottoman crescent is lifted above the spot where, on that most memorable day in the annals of the world they reared the holy cross. The noted sea of Galilee, where Roman fleets once rode at anchor, and the disciples of the Savior sailed in their ships, was long ago deserted by the devotees of war and commerce, and its borders are a silent wilderness; Capernaum is a shapeless ruin: Magdala is the home of the beggared Arabs; Bethsaida and Chorazin have vanished from the earth; and the "desert places" round about them, where thousands of men once listened to the Savior's voice and ate miraculous bread, sleep in the hush of a solitude that is inhabited only by birds of prey and skulking foxes.

Palestine is desolate and unlovely. And why should it be otherwise? Can the curse of Deity beautify a land?

Palestine is no more of this workday world. It is sacred to poetry and tradition—it is a dream-land.—Mark Twain.

GENTILE TIMES ENDING.

"And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken." Luke xxi. 25, 26.

We now tread the border lines of dispensations. This gospel age nears its closing days. Its grand object of taking out of the Gentiles a people for the name of God has nearly been consummated. The return of the Messiah to build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down, is an event of the near future. That house of heavenly royalty, the Elect Church, is nearly full. For the last princely crown, for the last priestly mitre, the gospel call will soon secure the honored and successful candidates. Then this age gives place to the age-to-come. Our texts, chosen for a heading, are prophetic of events—events of trouble and disaster—that are to mark the close of the "Times of the Gentiles." Many a one now living will see these times end. We are, even now, in the perils of the last days. We give part of a sermon from the last number of the Christian Herald, published in New York City, as a striking comment upon our Savior's starsling predictions. We shall try to make THE RESTITUTION a faithful herald of passing events. Let us watch and pray.

THE TIMES.

"I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth." Joel ii. 30.

Dr. Cummings—great and good man—would have told us the exact time of the fulfilment of this prophecy. As I stepped into his study in London on my arrival from Paris just after the French had surrendered at Sedan, the good Doctor said to me: "It is just as I told you about France; people laughed at me because I talked about the seven horns and the vials, but I foresaw all this from the Book of Daniel and the Book of Revelation." Not taking any such responsibility in the interpretation of this passage, I simply assert that there are in it suggestions of many things in our time.

Our eyes dilate and our heart quickens its pulsation as we read of the events in the third century, the sixth century, the eighth century, the fourteenth century; but there are more far-reaching events crowded into the nineteenth century than into any other, and the last quarter bids fair to eclipse the preceding three quarters. We read in the daily newspapers of events announced in one paragraph and without any especial emphasis—of events of which a Herodotus, a Josephus, a Xenophon, a Gibbon would have taken whole chapters or whole volumes to elaborate. Looking out upon our time, we must cry out in the words of the text: "Wonders in the heaven and in the earth."

I propose to show you that the time in which we live is wonderful for disasters and wonderful for blessing, for there must be lights and shades in this picture as in all others. Need I argue this day that our time is wonderful for disaster? Our world has had a rough time since by the hand of God it was howled out into space. It is an epileptic earth. Convulsion after convulsion. Frosts pounding it with sledge hammer of icebergs, and fires melting it with furnaces seven hundred times heated. It is a wonder to me it has lasted so long. Meteors shooting by on this side and grazing it and meteors shooting by on the other side and grazing it, none of them slowing up for safety. Whole fleets and navies and argosies and flotillas of worlds sweeping all about us. Our earth like a fishing smack off the banks of Newfoundland, while the Gallia and the Bothnia and the Arizonia and the Great Eastern rush by. But it seems to me as if our century were characterized by disasters volcanic, cyclonic, oceanic, epidemic. I say volcanic because an earthquake is only a volcano hushed up. When Stromboli and Cotopaxi and Vesuvius stop breathing, let the foundations of the earth beware. Seven thousand earthquakes in two centuries recorded in the catalogue of the British Association. Trajan, the emperor, goes to ancient Antioch, and amid the splendors of his reception is met by an earthquake that nearly destroys the emperor's life. Lisbon, fair and beautiful, at one o'clock on the first of November, 1775, in six minutes 60,000 have perished, and Voltaire writes of them. "For that region it was the last judgment, nothing wanting but a trumpet!" Europe and America feeling the throb; fifteen hundred chimneys in Boston partly or fully destroyed.

But the disasters of other centuries have had their counterpart in our own. In 1812 Caracas was caught in the grip of the earthquake; in 1822, in Chili, 100,000 square miles of land by volcanic force upheaved to four and seven feet of permanent elevation; in 1854 Japan felt the geological agony; Naples shaken in 1857; Mexico in 1858; Medina, the capital of the Argentine Republic, in 1861; Manilla terrorized in 1863; the Hawaiian Islands by such force uplifted and let down in 1871; Nevada shaken in 1871; Antioch in 1872; California in 1872; San Salvador in 1873; while this summer, of 1883, what subterranean excitements! Ischia, an island of the Mediterranean, a beautiful Italian watering place, vineyard clad, surrounded by all natural charm and historical reminiscence; yonder, Capri, the summer resort of the Roman Emperors; yondar, Naples, the Paradise of art—this beautiful island suddenly toppled into the trough of the earth. 8,000 merry-makers perishing, and some of them so far down beneath the reach of human obsequies that it may be said of many a one of them as it was said of Moses, "The Lord buried him." But while the nations were measuring that magnitude of disaster, measuring it not with golden rod, like that with which the angel measured heaven, but with the black rule of death, Java, of the Indian Archipelago, the most fertile island of all the earth, is caught in the grip of the earthquake and mountain after mountain goes down, and city after city, until that island, which produces the healthiest beverage of all the world, has produced the ghastliest accident of the century. One hundred thousand people dying, dying, dead, dead.

But look at the cyclonic, the disasters cyclonic. At the mouth of the Ganges are three islands—the Hattiah, the Sundeep and the Dakin Shahazpore. In the midnight of October, 1877, on all those three islands the cry was: "The waters, the waters!" A cyclone arose and rolled the sea over those three islands, and of a population of 340,000, 215,000 were drowned. Only those saved who had climbed to the top of the highest trees. Did you ever see a cyclone? No. Then I pray God you may never see one. I saw one on the ocean, and it swept us eight hundred miles back of our course, and for thirty-six hours during the cyclone and after it we expected every moment to go to the bottom. They told us before we retired at nine o'clock that the barometer had fallen, but at eleven o'clock at night we were awakened with the shock of the waves. All the lights out. Crash! went all the life-boats. Waters rushing through the skylights down into the cabin and down on the furnaces until they hissed and smoked in the deluge. Seven hundred people praying; blaspheming, shrieking.

Ah! you never want to see a cyclone at sea. But a few weeks ago I was in Minnesota where there was one of those cyclones on the land that swept the city of Rochester from its foundations and took dwelling houses, barns, men, women, children, horses, cattle, and tossed them into indiscriminate ruin, and lifted a railtrain and dashed it down, a mightier hand than that of the engineer on the air-brake. Cyclone in Kansas, within a few months; cyclone in Missouri, cyclone in Wisconsin, cyclone in Illinois, cyclone in Iowa. And am I not right in saying that one of the characteristics of the time in which we live is disaster cyclonic?

But look at the disasters oceanic. Shall I call the roll of the dead shipping? Ye monsters of the deep answer when I call your names. Ville de Havre! The Schiller! City of Boston! The Melville! The President! The Cimbria! But why should I go on calling the roll when none of them answer, and the roll is as long as the white scroll of the Atlantic surf at Cape Hatteras breakers. If the oceanic cables could report all the scattered life and all the bleached bones that they rub against in the depths of the ocean, what a message of pathos and tragedy for both beaches! Week before last, eighty fishermen perished off the coast of Newfoundland, and whole fleets of them off the coast of England.

The sea, now owning three-fourths of the earth, proposes to capture the other fourth and is bombarding the land all around the earth. The mowing of our hotels at Brighton Beach backward 100 yards from where they once stood, is a type of what is going on all around the world and on every coast. The Dead Sea rolls today where ancient cities stood. Pillars of temples that stood on hills geologists find now three-quarters under the water, or altogether submerged.

Look at the disasters epidemic. I speak not of the plague in the fourth century that ravaged Europe; and in Moscow and the Neapolitan dominions and Marseilles wrought such terror in the eighteenth century; but I look at the yellow fevers, and the choleras, and the diphtherias, and the scarlet fevers, and the typhoids of our own time. Hear the wailing of Memphis, and Shreveport, and New Orleans, and Savannah of the last two decades. From Hurdwar, India, where every twelfth year three million devotees congregate, the caravans brought the cholera, and that one disease slew 18,000 in eighteen days in Bassorah. Twelve thousand this summer slain by it in India, and twenty-five thousand in Egypt. Disasters epidemic. Some of the finest monuments in Greenwood, and Laurel Hill, and Mount Auburn are to doctors who lost their lives battling with southern epidemic.—From Dr Talmage's Sermon, preached Sept. 9, 1883.

IN the matter of news all we have to say today is a short quotation from the Chicago Journal of Monday, Sept. 17. It says:

There are strong probabilities that the present armed neutrality of Europe will soon be broken by the commencement of actual hostilities which may not end until most of the leading powers are involved. France has already become embroiled in serious complications with China, and if the latest accounts are to be relied upon, the invading French army on the Tonquin frontier has met with a disastrous repulse, after having been severely punished. Germany has demanded of Russia an explanation of the activity of her agents in Bulgaria, and Russia replies with diplomatic insolence to the effect that Bismark has quite enough to do in these days of failing health to mind his own business. The situation in France at the present time is critical in the extreme for various causes. First, the Cabinet, the press and the people are divided in regard to the Chinese policy, the general sentiment being adverse to what many think is an unnecessary and expensive war, and, secondly, the old enemy, Germany, seems disposed to irritate the French people whenever the opportunity presents itself, and is quite ingenious in inventing new ways to make them angry.

Editor Restitution:

I send you for publication in THE RESTITUTION, if agreeable, a most interesting account of the recent dreadful earthquakes and volcanic eruptions in the East Indies, which I think ought to be preserved in your columns for the instruction and information of all Christians. Surely no servant of God can fail to see his hand in these fearful signs of the times. Let us hope that such dreadful warning of the coming Judgment and wrath of the Almighty may not be lost on the thoughtful of this doomed generation. Surely we are encouraged to hope when we see these fearful signs that "The end is nigh even at the doors."

Let us therefore lift up our hearts and rejoice. The article is headed, "Another Great Eruption." On the other side of the clipping you will find interesting news from the East headed "Returning to Palestine." I hope you may find room for their insertion at an early day. Yours faithfully,

A. B. MAHONEY.

ANOTHER GREAT ERUPTION.

Volcanic disturbances began on the Krakatoa on Saturday night last, in the East Indies, about fifteen miles off the coast of Java, and continued on Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday. The aggregate loss of life from the various elements of the terrible disturbances must be fully 75,000, but the number of those who perished can never, of course, be accurately approximated. The disaster is the most terrible and devastating of modern times. It spread to Java and many other rich and prosperous islands in that vicinity. Streams of burning lava poured down into the valleys, inundating villages and carrying death and flames to the most populous places. In the straits of Sunda, the most important channel of navigation between the Sea of Java and the Indian Ocean, islands have been swallowed up, the coast line changed or entirely obliterated, and every lighthouse has been swept away. This important strait, sixty miles in width, is now dangerous to navigation. New islands have arisen, and landmarks on the coast are so altered as to make the country unrecognizable. The government is preparing to obtain new soundings of the strait. Sixteen volcanoes have appeared between the site where the island of Krakatoa formerly stood and Sibisie island. A part of the Bantam is an ashy desert. The cattle are starving, and the population are in despair. The Soengepan volcano was for many hours enveloped in an enormous luminous cloud, which gradually increased in size until it formed a canopy of lurid red and whitish grey over a wide extent of territory. During this time the eruptions increased, and streams of lava poured incessantly down the sides of the mountains, sweeping everything before them. Where a stream of lava entered an arm of the sea or came in contact with the water of a river, the incandescent lava produced boiling heat and rapid evaporization. The fissures that opened in this thin crust as it solidified would emit torrents of vapor, extending high into the air, and making a tremendous seething sound.

Little alarm was felt at first, but within a few hours showers of stones began to fall at Jorjakerta, Soumbaya, and Samarang. All through the night showers of red-hot rocks and ashes fell, making complete darkness in all those towns. On Sunday morning the disturbances had extended beneath the waters of the strait, and they were soon boiling and hissing violently, while great waves dashed upon the Javanese shores, and the temperature of the sea went up nearly twenty degrees. The threatening rumblings gradually became more and more distinct, and by noon the Maha Meru, the largest of the volcanoes of Java, was belching forth flames at an alarming rate. This eruption soon spread to the Gunung, the crater of which is the largest in the world, being nearly four miles in diameter, the Gunung, Guntur, and many other minor mountains, until more than a third of the forty-five craters of Java were either in active eruption or seriously threatening it.

The greatest violence was reached on Sunday evening, and the island of Java seemed about to be completely buried in a mass of fire and sulphurous ashes. At the same time the enormous waves began to dash with greater force upon the shores, coming in some places far up into the interior, and great chasms opened in the earth and threatened to engulf a large proportion of the island's people and buildings. About midnight the most frightful scene of the whole disturbance took place. Suddenly an enormous luminous cloud, similar to that which was seen over the Gunung Guntur, but much greater in extent, formed over the Kendang range of mountains, which skirt the south-east coast of the island. The cloud gradually increased in size until it formed a canopy, of lurid red and whitish gray over a wide extent of territory.

Much of the northern portion of the island, which was covered with tracts of forests, was soon in one great blaze. What a few hours before were fertile valleys, covered with flourishing plantations of coffee, rice, sugar, indigo or tobacco, the staples of the island, were now but mud, stone and lava covered fields of destruction and ruin. Probably not a single crop in Java will be saved.

During this time the eruptions increased, and streams of lava poured incessantly down the sides of the mountains into the valleys, sweeping everything before them. Here and there a stream of lava would enter the arm of the sea or come in contact with the waters of a river. Then the nearest incandescent lava, as it protruded from the great stream, would suddenly produce boiling heat and rapid evaporization, but the superficial consolidation that almost immediately ensued would prevent any further contact. The fissures that opened in this thin crust as it solidified would emit torrents of vapor, extending high into the air and making a tremendous hissing and seething sound, as if a thousand locomotives were simultaneously letting off steam. Here and there in the lava streams were innumerable thin, plate-like crystals of feldspar, arranged in trains, one behind the other, in the direction of the flow of the current, and felspathic spherulites were rapidly formed in the vitreous matter, resembling those which form in the slag of a glass furnace.

One of the most singular freaks of the eruption was the carrying in the midst of the molten lava of a bed of solid ice of enormous size, which had been emitted from one of the craters, carried along by the current and landed on the extremity of Point St. Nicholas, on the north-west corner of the island. It is supposed this ice formed the crust of some subterranean lake.

About two o'clock Monday morning, the cloud broke into small sections, and the columns of fire and smoke on the southeast corner of the island ceased to ascend, while the craters in the other parts of Java seemed to open their fiery throats still wider, to let out the greatest quantities of lava, rocks, pumice, and ashes yet vomited out. The hissing of the sea became so loud as to be almost deafening, and the waves rushed up on the shores to an unprecedented height. When daylight came it was seen that an enormous tract of land had disappeared, extending from Point Capneim on the south, to Negery Pafroering on the north, and west to Low Point, covering an extent of territory about fifty miles square. In this were situated the villages of Negery and Negery Babawang. Of the people inhabiting these places and the natives scattered sparsely through the forests and on the plains none escaped a frightful death. This section of the island was not so densely populated as the other portions, and the loss of life was comparatively small, although it must have aggregated fully 15,000 souls. The entire Kendang range of mountains, extending along the coast in a semi circle for about sixty-five miles, had gone out of sight. The waters of Welcome Bay, the Sunda Straits and Pepper Bay on the east, and of the Indian Ocean on the south, had rushed in and formed a great sea of turbulent waters. Here and there the peak of a high crater was exposed for a moment by the receding of a great wave, and occasionally a puff of brownish gray smoke or a slight shower of rocks showed that the volcanoes still continued active subaqueous eruption. The debris of the submerged and destroyed buildings was tossed hither and thither over the tumultuous waters the only sign left that there had once been inhabited land where all was now a waste of water.

A despatch from the scene, says: "At the entrance of Batavia was a large group of houses extending along the shore and occupied by Chinamen. This portion of the city was entirely swept away, and of the 25,000 Chinese who lived on this swampy plain it is hardly probable that more than 6,000 managed to save their lives. They stuck to their home till the wave that washed them away came, fearing the storm of the flames and the flow of lava of the interior more than the torrents of the water from the exterior. The population of Europeans and Americans in Batavia suffered a loss of perhaps 300 souls out of the 3,500 whites living there.

Java was one of the most beautiful and fruitful of the islands of the East Indian Archipelago. It supported a larger population than all the other islands put together; as dense, indeed, as that of the most populous European countries. Yet, no territory of equal area elsewhere on the earth is so cursed with destructive volcanic outbreaks as Java. Two chains of mountains extend the whole length of the island, each one of which is studded all the way with active volcanoes. In the East the volcanoes are found in clusters, while the western part of the island is a compact mass of mountains culminating in volcanic peaks. There are forty-five craters on the island, more than one-third of which are contributory to the disturbance, terror and destruction of the last week. Of these not the least active was the great Gunung crater, which has a diameter of four miles and is the largest in the world.

It is rather singular that beginning with 1807, Java has been visited by destructive earthquakes and eruptions at intervals of just five years. In the the year named 1,000 people were destroyed by an earthquake in the single town of Jokjokarta. In 1873 an eruption caused the death of many of the inhabitants of Kadu. In 1879 there were seven severe shocks in the island, by which a considerable number of people lost their lives. There was some slight disturbance in 1881, but this last disaster may be covered as ceasing, like its immediate predecessor, after five years of volcanic quiet. The two greatest eruptions in Java in this century, before this one, were in 1822 and 1883. In the latter year one volcano vomited ashes and sand to the extent of 30,000,000 tons. In 1822 no fewer than 114 villages were laid waste and 4,000 persons killed.

I am here yet and preach tonight. The interest is splendid. Baptized one lady Saturday, and three (a brother and two sisters) yesterday, all uniting with the church last evening. The brethren are happy.

As many brethren in Michigan will be anxious about me, I will say this as to notice in the paper what I am doing, which will save me writing several letters. I go to Montone tomorrow and stop over Sunday at Gospel Grove.

Yours in the blessed hope.

Brother W. S. Finn, of Topeka, has notified me that he will be here Sept. 13, and hold a meeting of days in this county. There are some brethren in the eastern part of this county who may be glad to meet with us and share the good feast, and make arrangements for meetings in their parts, as Brother Finn wishes to stay in this region for some time. Therefore I say to the scattered ones, come and hear him. Meeting will commence Sept. 15, at the Schoolhouse near Bro. Huffman's, where Bro. Foore had meetings last May, and we will arrange for future meetings. All who have been wanting meetings can now have them.

THE ADOPTION OF SONS.

They that are in the flesh cannot please God. They do not stand in such a relationship to him as to make him look upon them with approval. The righteousness of the law has not been fulfilled in them. Their carnal mind is at enmity with that law. It has not been brought into subjection. It is not like minded with Christ. It looks on its own things, prizes its own reputation, does not humble itself to become obedient, refuses the place of a servant.

To be carnally minded is death; that is, death follows as the result of the enmity against God. The refusal to obey, the refusal to become subject to the law of God, leaves it captive to the law of sin, and amenable to the penalty of death.

God has promulgated his law, he says evil do this, and live" or rejects the conditions, and sin

The adoption of sons does not come upon everybody. Aliens from the commonwealth of Israel may not cry "Abba Father." They are "without God and without hope."

"But it is not necessary to be baptized in order to become children," "we can come to God without submitting to this ordinance, and be accepted by him," say they, to whom the test seems too severe. How do you know that it is not necessary? How do you know that you can come to God in any other way? Who told you that it was not your duty to be baptized after having received the faith?

The question, "what must I do to be saved?" is answered by the positive command, "Repent and be baptized, every one of you." Who, in that command, is left out? Are you? Does not the "every one" include you?

Look at the question. From its form we see at once that the convert from whose lips it fell, felt that something must be done to secure the proffered salvation

The apostle says, you must turn away from sin—change your mind and conduct—and as the first step in so doing, you must be baptized. "Except a man be born of water.....he cannot enter the kingdom of God." He has not become a child, because he has not been born of water,—and God, looking upon him as an alien, gives him no passport into the promised land. "He cannot enter."

"To be born of water" is one of the conditions of sonship. "Ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus, for as many as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ." These, and no others, are accounted the children of God, by faith.

Faith accepts conditions. God says be baptized and you shall be saved. He who believes God, becomes a doer of the word; he is baptized, and becomes subject to the law of God. He there receives the adoption, because there he is made nigh by the blood of Christ, to the covenants of promise, and becomes of the household of God.

He is justified there, because it is the blood that justifies; he is reconciled there, because through the death of the Son comes reconciliation.

It is in vain to say, "He that believeth on the Lord Jesus Christ shall be saved, and I believe, therefore I shall be saved." God says, Believe, repent and be baptized and you shall be saved.

Do you believe God—do you believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, when you aver that you can be saved without conforming to the letter with the law of adoption?

You are only reconciled to God by the death of his Son, and you can come to that death for pardon, only as you are buried with Christ by baptism into death.

There is no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus. Are you in the name? If not, where and when have you received pardon? how do you hope to escape from wrath?

QUESTIONS FOR BROTHER MALONE TO ANSWER.

I am glad to see Brother Malone's article on the Fair Chance, in THE RESTITUTION. I hope it will do good. It is a good article in the main, and is quite conclusive as against "The Fair Chance Theory." But I noticed a little discrepancy in some of his statements. To which I will call his attention, and then ask a few questions. But before I do this, I will correct his estimate of the population of the earth including all that have ever been born.

He says: "There will be enough of those (who have not had one fair chance) to densely populate the earth, and during his reign and at its end, to pile them upon one another several stories high."

If Brother Malone will make a little calculation he will find, that all who have ever lived, and all who will live for the first 6,000 years, could be accommodated with good easy standing room, in the State of Ohio, and leave 8,714 square miles for visitors.

Let us estimate the average population of the earth to be 10,000,000,000. No. of generations in 6,000 years, 200; whole number of inhabitants, 2,000,000,000,000; number of square feet to each inhabitant, 1 1-2; number of square feet occupied by the whole number of inhabitants, 3,000,000,000,000; number of square feet in a square mile, 25,000,000; number of square miles occupied by all the people, 81,250; number of square miles in the State of Ohio, 39,969; leaving a balance of land for visitors, of square miles, 8,714.

I will now call his attention to the discrepancy. He stated in his first main proposition, "That he believed in the resurrection of the just and the unjust." In his exposition of 1 Cor. xv. 22, he said the only true meaning (of that passage) is, that all who die shall die in Adam, and all that will be raised at all will be raised in Christ. The unjust in Christ? If they are they will be made alive at his coming. "The dead in Christ shall rise first." 1 Thess. iv. 16. They that are Christ's will be made alive at his coming. 1 Cor. xv. 23. But if the unjust are in Christ, as Brother Malone says, they will be raised in incorruption, in glory, in power, a spiritual body fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body.

The discrepancy is this: In his first statement he said, the unjust will be raised to be destroyed. In this statement he said that all that will be raised will be raised in Christ, and to immortality. Now which is the true statement? Are the wicked worthy to be raised up? A few questions:

1. Does the gospel preached to Abraham teach the resurrection of the wicked?

2. If Paul hoped firmly for the promise made to Abraham, could he have hoped for the resurrection of the wicked?

3. If some are raised from the dead because they are worthy to be saved, will those who are not worthy to be saved be raised up?

4. Are there two probations for the resurrection—must one class be worthy in order to attain it, and may the other class attain unto it though they be not worthy?

5. If Christ is the first fruits, or sheaf or sample, of the harvest of the resurrection, will those who do not belong to that harvest of which Christ is the first sheaf, be included in the harvest?

6. If those who are worthy of the first resurrection, had not been worthy of it, would they have been raised up?

7. Can it be true in the gospel scheme, that one must be worthy in order to be raised up, and that another may be raised up if he is not worthy?

Editor Restitution:

The readers of THE RESTITUTION will see from the circular of J. P. Weethee that he proposes to publish his works on the "Coming Age," and the "Eastern Question."

All who have read the various numbers of these works as they have appeared in THE RESTITUTION, will know they have cost their author much research, great mental labor, and a great sacrifice of time in composing them; we know such to be the fact, being neighbors and intimately acquainted with the author; we are interested with him in the subjects upon which he has written, and with him trust in the promises, believing that "God's kingdom will come, and his will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

For the last four years more than half his time has been occupied in preparing these works.

They will cover the entire field of famous prophecy, and will furnish very useful text-books, for all that desire to investigate the prophecies. Such works ought to be interesting to every lover of prophetic Scripture and of the coming Redeemer and his reign. The subjects of these works are world-wide in their bearings, and must command attention.

To print, bind in book form and circulate, will require money. How shall this be raised? It is too much to require one whose means are as limited as those of their author to furnish all the money.

We suggest two methods by which money can and should be raised:

First. Let every person that can spare any means to aid its publication, send that amount to THE RESTITUTION, or the author, at Millfield, Athens county, Ohio, said amount to be refunded out of the first sales of the works.

Second. Those that want the works, say how many copies of each volume they will pay for. They will cost $2.50 or $3.00 per book.

We shall take a copy of each, and furnish other aid. Let some one in each congregation or neighborhood go immediately to work and see what can be raised.

The author wants the first volume ready by Christmas, and the second by March. The works are large and require time. Yours truly.

C. and M. J. WEETHEE.

WHAT IS TRUTH.

God, the eternal Father, is the author and originator of all truth. Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is the full embodiment of truth. He says, "As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be in the coming of the Son of man." What was the condition of the world before the flood? The world was filled with violence; all flesh had corrupted his ways (God's ways). Noah was an exception, "Thee only have I found righteous before me;" how soon had the race degenerated and gone away from God their Creator. Alas for frail fallen humanity; 1656 years is the length of time from the creation of Adam to the flood, all flesh had corrupted God's ways. A few bright stars appear in the record, Abel, Enoch and Noah; the wise man says God made man upright, but he sought out many inventions.

Question, Has the race of men become any better? Immediately after the flood man began to multiply; the same wicked, corrupt, rebellious disposition is manifest, and characterizes man's doings in the building of the tower of Babel; and so it was through the ages that preceded the gospel. How few have been the holy, honest, upright, God-fearing men compared with the great mass of the human family. God had his witnesses all through the past ages, as true as steel; Abraham, Job, Moses, and many others who bore testimony to the truth that God was strictly just and infinitely good, kind and merciful. At the introduction of the gospel age a star appeared; it was the star of Bethlehem, it was God's beloved Son who was the brightness of the Father's glory and the express image of his person. He come in God's appointed way and in exact fulfillment of the predictions of the prophets. He demonstrated the truth of his mission by the wonderful works he performed; but unlearned men but poorly understood God's plan of salvation and redemption. Men have most dreadfully blundered in supposing or believing that it was God's purpose to convert the world in this gospel age; but inspiration gives no warrant for anything of the kind. Read Acts xv. 13-17. Yet Dr. Whitby and his school have clung to the fable till it vanished into thin air. Some are holding on to the Ignis fatuus even while God's judgements and the opening scenes of the great day of God Almighty stare us full in the face.

In comparing the age in which we live with the first age of the world, we do not deem it necessary to show the antitype of every item that might be named: But we will name a few things. First we affirm that everything manufactured in America or in Europe that can be adulterated is thus debased and in then palmed off and sold in the markets as genuine. We begin with the article of silks which the ladies wear for dresses; we select a well-known house, Mr. B——, for illustration; a lady enters the store and says, "I wish to purchase a silk dress, have you a pure article?" "Yes, madam, we have the Simon pure," hands her down a piece, she takes a penknife from her pocket and begins scraping till she lays bare the warp; she then takes from her pocket a newly invented microscope of powerful magnitude, lays it over the piece scraped, and says, "Mr. B—— please look here;" he looks and starts back with amazement; the microscope reveals the cotton warp as large as is needed in such fabrics, very neatly molded over with a silk thread. She says, "Mr. B——, what am I to do; I wanted a pure silk dress and I am willing to give your price," (the ladies are quite willing to have it known they pay $100 for a dress). "I do not know; if that is not a pure article, and I see it is not, then there is none manufactured that is pure; the deception is complete and the detection and exposition clear."

Our next is the article of butter. A large house who deal in butter in New York of a sudden discover that their 50 pound firkins are ten pounds less in size than formerly; they set about to find out the cause, they spare no pains, but all in vain: they select their best man and send him to Cincinnati where the butter is packed. He works himself into the good graces of the packers till he gets the secret and is suddenly missing, returns to New York and makes his report which is as follows: he says there is a composition just the color of butter and nearly as heavy as lead; this they pulverize as fine as flour, sift it and mix in with the butter; so in every 40 pounds of butter we eat 10 pounds of soap-stone. Rather bad for the digestion.

Our next is that of tea. A cargo of tea arives in Liverpool, is inspected by the custom house and rejected as bogus. It is shipped to this country and undergoes an inspection: is condemned as a fraud; the article is headed, lead-coated tea, the experts report is, there is not a particle of the Chinese tea about it, and so much white lead sifted into it that it is visible to the naked eye. Question: Who has done this? is it John Chinaman? No, I don't believe a word of it; it is some Christianized Yankee, Englishman, or it may be that sly cunning astute Scotchman, who says Scotland has furnished three-fourths of the brains for the world. Very likely.

Once more. There is a large distillery on the Ohio where they fatten large droves of hogs; they get a drove ready for the market and all of a sudden the hog cholera breaks out among them; in the morning there is 20 or 25 of them dead and more dying. The alarm is sounded, the hog cholera; what's to be done? A Dutchman is standing round and when the right time comes he says, "Me take away them hogs if you mind." "Yes you can have them." He has his teams ready, loads and takes them into his lot close by in the bush, cuts and renders into lard, has his kegs new and clean, labled best family lard for Cincinnati market. The secret leaks out that this same Dutchman the night before procured a quantity of strychnine. Injects it with meal and feeds the hogs. He is arrested, tried and sent to State's prison for fifteen years.

This savors strongly of Sodom. We have these statements from undoubted authority, and could give more, but the heart sickens at the recital. Let us understand you; do you say that men professing the Christian name are guilty of such things? I would not like to be qualified that some of the wickedest things done in the land are not done under a garb of religion, and we don't give it all to the nominal churches either. God is just and holy and we make a sad mistake if we are dreaming of getting into the kingdom of God without obeying God's imperative commands. Christ said to the Scribes and Pharisees, "Moses because of the hardness of your hearts suffered you to write a bill of divorcement and put your wife away, but it was not so in the beginning. God made them male and female; for this cause shall a man leave his father and mother and cleave unto his wife and they twain shall be one flesh; save for the cause of fornication a man shall not put away his wife and be married to another." St. Paul affirms the same things, and yet this is a crying sin of the age, we cannot say to the sects, see how these Christians live, or to the men of this generation, follow us as we follow Christ, but we have to hang our heads in shame.

Says a well-informed man, when we talked with him about the coming of Christ and the end of the age, "I don't believe it; look at your second adventism, since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the foundation of the world." This is backed by our Savior's words, "They know not till the flood came and took them all away, so shall it be when the Son of man shall be revealed." Had they have listened to Noah or have asked him in sincerity what he was building that great vessel for he would have told them. God does not do anything arbitrarily. Have the men of this age been warned of the coming of the Son of man and the end of the age? We answer, Yes, they have had line upon line and precept upon precept, especially where the Bible has been circulated. More warning would be superfluous. Will the church be especially informed before of her translation before the rapture? Our feeling and our judgement is that she will be notified in time for the necessary preparation for the marriage supper of the Lamb; yet our Lord's words are, "Watch, for in such an hour as ye think not of the Son of man cometh."

Editor Restitution:

I have much pleasure in sending you an article from our principal newspaper here on the Westminster Confession of Faith. I think it so good, and fitted to give some useful information that I request you would give it a place in THE RESTITUTION.

I remain yours in Christ,

J. CAMERON.

THE WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY; ITS HISTORY AND STANDARDS: BEING THE BAIRD LECTURES FOR 1882.

Readers will find in Dr. Mitchell's lectures an intelligent and exceedingly well instructed account of the origin, purpose, history, and results of the famous Westminster Assembly, by one who has made a special study of the subject. We do not suppose that the lecturer, in the wildest imaginative moments of his existence, credits himself with possessing a lively and picturesque style, keen philosophical grasp or a crisp epigrammatic manner. We find page after page of copious information given with a conscientious detail which, when delivered, must have gained respect, with an accuracy which must have gained confidence, and with a dryness which must have won the subdued slumbers of his audience, and made them dream in their pews of dead dogmas, Calvinistic confessions — and sawdust. Perhaps the most interesting part of the volume is that which traces various doctrines of the Confession of Faith to the Articles of the Irish Church of 1615 due to Archbishop Usher, and points out the origin of many definitions of the Catechisms in manuals by Palmer, Newcomen, Gouge and Rogers. Usually the famous dogmatic Standards are regarded with special reverence, as having arisen with the mysterious perfection of Solomon's Temple, on which no ax fell, no hammer rung, but "like some tall palm the mystic fabric sprung;" while the divines who were the artificers of them have been honored with peculiar awe for the almost superhuman originality, grasp, and skill with which they framed the master; and immortal compendiums. Professor Mitchell, however, acts as an unconscious iconoclast, for he indicates the sources from which the ministers compiled these works which have held the minds of generations in bondage, and from whose power Scottish clergy are obliged still to work out their intellectual salvation with fear and trembling. It is curious also to note that the production which is so remarkably identified with the theological life and traditions of Scotland—the Shorter Catechism—is that with which Scottish divines had nothing to do, and that it was entirely an English compilation, wrought after the Scottish Commissioners had left their northern homes.

The intrinsic importance of the Westminster Confession, and its position as a test for our University Theological Chairs, causes us just now to turn with more interest and curiosity to its origin and authorship. In June 1643, an ordinance was issued by Parliament calling that Assembly which met to settle a pure faith for England and framed those Standards which were only adopted in Scotland. The principle on which representative divines were chosen was, that two should be elected for each English county, each University, and the Channel Islands, one for each county in Wales, and four for the city of London; while Scottish Commissioners were also invited to be present. In all, about 160 divines and laymen were appointed, each member who attended receiving four shillings a day for expenses. Although in the list of those called we find a few names of reputation for learning and ability, it is impossible to say that they represent the best scholarship and most cultured views of the age. We miss in the roll several men, famous still for ripe learning, high theological attainments, and grasp of intellect, who would have been fittest to join in this memorable Synod, though they would have opposed many of its decisions; while in the number are a host of estimable but utterly obscure men, whose support gives no weight and adds no value to one dogmatic conclusion of the meeting.

It is evident that the orthodox see nothing absurd, nothing humorous in the opinions of honest Masters Wrathbond, Scudder, Woodcock, Thorngood, Mew, Hicks, and Tuckney being binding on after generations of clergy and all future theological Professors in our Universities, centuries after these respectable gentlemen themselves, having quitted their fleshy tabernacles, have peradventure discovered, to their surprise, in another and a better world, that they have been quite mistaken, and that the General Assembly of the firstborn does not hold or enforce any Calvinistic creed on its elect members. Even when they were deliberating on most weighty articles, the attendance was so small that the three committees were reduced to a quorum of six each; and we find in full Assembly only forty out of a hundred and fifty voting on a dogma, which has henceforth been imposed on the minds and consciences of millions of Presbyterians. Yet these worthy members confidently discover the hidden decrees of God, and double the fate of men, of angels, of devils and of infants; they interpret the most debatable parts of Scripture, and the most perplexing points of Pauline dialectics and rimic; they formulate the most mysterious purposes of Providence, and they define the least comprehensible doctrines of the Godhead.

It is marvellous to think that these decisions on things past understanding, by men whose opinions on the simplest points of politics, agriculture and physics, we would not listen to, should be binding on the nineteenth century, though the whole tide of thought has left them dry behind. Modern opinion has seen that the Confession is dogmatic on questions on which man can know nothing, and often determined on points which are utterly wrong. Criticism has shown that it supports conclusions on corrupt texts, and on misinterpreted passages. Science has proved that it makes assertions which are profoundly erroneous. Advancing civilization and higher cultivation have shown that its views of the purposes of God can be contrary to that true humanity on which we base our elementary ideas of the nature of the Deity. If the Assembly, whose views were discarded by the English Church a few years after, had been held a hundred years earlier, it would have been Roman Catholic; if it had been held fifty years later, it would have been Arminian; what, then, gives perpetual authority in Scotland to this Calvinistic parenthesis in ecclesiastical history and doctrine? It is difficult to see why the theological views of the seventeenth century should be taught in our University Chairs any more than the scientific opinions of that age.

Suppose it had been laid down that every Professor of Medicine and Surgery in future should conform to the standard of an association of doctors of 1648, we should find them now teaching the most ghastly methods of therapeutics, insisting on drugs which ruin the carnal constitution, and practising phlebotomy, which drains the human being of his blood, increasing insanity by the means taken to cure it, and denouncing the circulation of the blood as a flagrant heresy. If, in our Chairs of science, the opinions of the Royal Society, founded in 1660, were still binding, we should find in natural philosophy, in geology, in chemistry, opinions taught, as in Roman Catholic institutions, as purest science and undoubted facts, which research has exploded and sent long ago into the limbo of extinct notions and curiosities of bygone credulity and ignorance. Why, then, should the notions, no far more difficult obsolete points, of "little Master Palmer," of that tedious Master White, who prays for a whole hour; of gossipy Master Robert Baillie, the Pepys of Puritanism; the sanctified and delightfully absurd Samuel Rutherford; the insignificant Messrs Caudry, Hicks and Mew; inexperienced laymen like Serjeant Wild, Sir John Crotworthy, and Solicitor St. John, to be held as sacred and imperative, and entitled to hold the minds of posterity under the fatal law of intellectual mortmain?

Still must each Professor teach, under the yoke of their "dead hand," the inspiriting doctrine of total depravity, which holds that man is so corrupt that he can do no good thing, and yet that he will be damned if he does not do it; that he deserves eternal torments for sin which he never committed, because his forefather ate forbidden fruit thousands of years before: that none who do not believe in Christ can be saved, and consequently that millions are doomed for not accepting a gospel which they never heard; that it is the duty of the civil power to punish and extirpate heresy; that the world was made in six days, and that the Sabbath was appointed from the beginning of the world, although the geological Professor in the same College will tell his students that the world was millions of years without a human being to keep the Sabbath, while primitive man for untold ages had neither the idea of a Sabbath, a God, nor of a "law or covenant of works," which the Confession says God gave to Adam.....That it is the "elect infants" only who are saved; that "God as a righteous judge doth blind and harden" the wicked. Such doctrines may be perfectly true—these matters are far too profound for us to decide—but they certainly are doubted; some, also, are denied by the vast majority of civilized people, and discarded by the highest, clearest minds and hearts in Christendom; yet still Professors of Theology are bound by these Standards, are forced to shut their eyes and mouths to all that speculation, learning, science have taught for centuries, and are endowed by the State to teach the opinions of a few estimable but erroneous gentlemen, who, after much prayer and contention, agreed upon them more than two hundred years ago.

Dr. Mitchell, whose views are interesting only as specimens of other admirers of the Confession of Faith, is not unconscious of some difficulties in maintaining some dogmas which are contrary to fact, science, and humanity; and he has his "answers to objections," which he gives with an air of profound satisfaction and with complete unsuccess. The Confession says the creation of the world took place in six days, "which now almost all orthodox divines grant it did not." We therefore naturally conclude that these "orthodox divines," as regards the Confession, are heretics. Not at all, says Dr. Mitchell, who is in the same case; these words, he argues, are almost identical with those in Scripture, and therefore must be interpreted in the same non-literal, non-natural sense, as divines conveniently, but uncritically, put on those in Genesis. Now, can the lecturer deny that the Westminster Assembly meant them as six literal twenty-four-hour days? Can the lecturer deny that these words are given as the statement of an historical fact, and are not a quotation which may be accepted as metaphorical, or poetic, if we please? It is nothing to the point to show that some writers—Dean Colet or Philo—had previously regarded the "days" in a figurative sense; and it is ridiculous to say that the Assembly showed their intention not to exclude such a fanciful interpretation because they did not write "six natural or literal days." If we are allowed to treat the Standards when we choose as metaphorical, on the fancied ground that the Scripture passages they paraphrase are figurative, we shall be led into a delightful chaos, and have a most comprehensive Church. The phrase, "Son of God" is figurative, "redemption" is a Pauline metaphor from Greek law, "adoption" a metaphor from Roman law, "everlasting" and "eternal" punishment and the mysteries of the Godhead have been interpreted in various ways in Scripture; may we, therefore, explain them for ourselves with corresponding variety in the Confession? and if not, on Dr. Mitchell's theory, why not? What is allowed to the Calvinist may be allowed to the Universalist and the Unitarian. What is sauce for the Evangelical goose is sauce for the Rationalistic gander.

But, in fact, the whole notion is absurd. The Standard is a formal, prosaic, legal document, to be interpreted by what it says, and not by what some suppose Scripture means but does not say. The lecturer, further, in argumentative despair maintains that when it is said "elect infants dying in infancy are saved," it is not to be inferred from these words that there are any who are not elect! If so, we would have fancied these divines, so shrewd as not to say "literal days," would have been equally shrewd to omit "elect," in order to prevent a misconception, seeing that the opinion was so prevalent that there were infants non-elect, and therefore lost. Besides, this notion that all dying infants were humanely elected to life because they should die before they have power and time to sin, is contradictory of the article in the Confession, which says that when God elects to salvation it is without any foresight of good works,....or any other thing in the creature, as conditions or causes moving him thereto." We greatly fear that Dr. Mitchell should be looked after. If he had lived in the Puritan age, he would have been violently denounced as a heretic, denied Church privileges by the ministers he reveres so deeply, or put in jail by the civil magistrate whose authority he respects so highly, and reduced to be an "ambassador in bonds." How is it that with so many disputable and denied doctrines in a Standard containing about 10,000 propositions, that in successive generations ministers accept and sign it without any hesitation? They must, of course, be sincere, else they could not be so ardent in defence of the sanctity of the Parliamentary oath, though ordinary men cannot agree together on twelve secular questions? It is a curious problem which we can only explain by supposing that perfect belief is required only when we swear to one or two articles, but that a reduction is allowed, as by grocers, on taking a quantity. Dr. Mitchell has issued a useful work, proving the urgent necessity for the abolition of tests in our Universities if we desire to see freedom of thought, honesty of assertion, and progress of religious opinion and theological knowledge.—Alexander F. Mitchell, D. D., Professor of Ecclesiastical History, reviewed, in Scotsman, Edinburgh, Scotland.

WE'LL LIVE IN TENTS.—Heb. xi. 8-10.

God bids his people on the earth,
Ere yet he comes and calls them home,
To live, exhalt to home and hearth,
Like far-bound travelers,—in tents.

It is his will that we should pass,
Like strangers, separate and aside
From all the world-enamoured mass
That crowd the Babylons of pride.

He'd have us rear no stately towers,—
Sink no foundation walls of stone;
But camp each night a few short hours,
And see the morrow's dawn, move on.

O brother! whatsoever chain
Binds us to fleshy lust and strife,
Here let us rend it in God's name,
And live, henceforth, the pilgrim's life!

CHORUS.—We'll live in tents until our feet
Shall reach the land by sin untrod;
The gate of pearl—the golden street,—
Whose builder and whose maker, God.

THE "PURPOSE OF THE AGES."

THE WORLDS.

Scripture presents to view three "worlds," or general orders of things. They are called three distinct "heavens and earth." 2 Peter iii. They are known as "the world that then was [before the flood]," "the world that now is," and "the world to come." The change from one to another is more dispensational than physical. The Greek word kosmos, translated world, means arrangement, order, when not applied to mankind. God "spared not the old world," and it is said to have "perished;" yet that did not involve a literal destruction of the physical or planetary heavens and earth. Neither need we understand that the change from this world to the next will be any more a literal destruction of this earth than was that of the former. This planet is the basis of all three worlds; and though its kosmos shall pass away, yet "the earth abideth forever." As the first world ended at the flood, so the present world will end to make way for the new heaven and earth. The third or world to come which follows will be the "world without end" wherein dwelleth righteousness. Those that lived in the world before the flood could not, by dying or otherwise, come to the world that now is. Neither can we by any means go to the next world. It is a "world to come." We must wait for it as we wait for the morrow.

THE AGES.

These "worlds" are recognized in Scripture as subdivided into periods of time called "ages," (Greek aion, sometimes translated worlds, at others more properly rendered ages—meaning an indefinite but limited period of time). Only one complete age is discerned in the first or old world. In the second or present one we see several. First, the patriarchal or one-man age, which ended with Jacob at the national organization of Israel; second, the Jewish age, which ended with the rejection and death of Christ; third, the present gospel age, which ends with the second coming of the Lord. The next aion, or first of "the ages to come," is the millennium or thousand years reign of Christ and his glorified church over all the nations of the earth.

All the ages of the past, including the present gospel age, are only preparatory to something better and grander farther on. Each succeeding age is a step onward in the development of God's "purpose (or plan) of the ages." Eph. iii. 11, margin R. V. When a new age is added, it is not because the preceding one has been a failure, but because its own peculiar work of God is finished and another work is to be done. With this discrimination of the successive order of the ages and the character of the work designed to be carried out in each, much Scripture that is otherwise obscure and seemingly contradictory becomes beautifully clear and harmonious. Without this fact in mind, people are continually applying a prophecy or statement of the Bible to one age that belongs to another; or applying two conflicting statements to the same age that belong to totally distinct ages. As a result of this hap-hazard method of studying the word, we have promulgated, for instance, the conflicting doctrines (conflicting only when promiscuously applied to any one age or class) of election or Calvinism, "free grace or Arminianism, and Universalism; whereas, if those portions of Scripture upon which these doctrines are severally based were applied each to its own time or age, instead of confusion would be seen the utmost harmony and wisdom of God's plan. Hence we are admonished to "rightly divide the word of truth."

THE GOSPEL AGE.

The present dispensation, so far from being the time to which so many of the prophecies exultingly point as that of universal blessing to all mankind, is rarely alluded to in the Old Testament prophecies. The work of this age was not revealed to other generations. It was a mystery concealed from previous ages. The prophets were only until John (the Baptist). Since that time the gospel is preached among the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his (Christ's) name. Paul speaks of the work of this age as "the mystery which in other generations was not made known as it hath now been revealed, that the Gentiles (who are chosen out during this age) are fellow-heirs with Christ, fellow-members of his body, and fellow-partakers of the promise in him;—the mystery which hath been hid from all [previous] ages, that now might be made known through the church the manifold wisdom of God, according to the purpose of the ages (as the Greek, prothesis ton aionon) which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord." Eph. iii. 4-11. No, this is not the age in which God purposes to save the world. Do not so detract from and degrade our Heavenly Father's omnipotence as to suppose he has been vainly trying to save the world of mankind for the last six thousand years! He has been doing nothing of the kind. In his purpose the time for that has not yet come. That is the work of the "ages to come." The present age witnesses an entirely different work. The promise was to Abraham, "In thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." That promise is still unfulfilled, but it was God who promised, and it will surely yet come to pass. But before this work of blessing can begin, the "seed" must be prepared. And this is the age in which the seed is being perfected. "But," you inquire, "is not Christ Abraham's Seed?" Let Paul explain: "If ye are Christ's, then are ye [also] Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." Gal. iii. 29. The seed is prepared by a choosing out or selection of a certain few from among all nations, who are the "elect according to the foreknowledge of God" (1 Pet. i. 2), to constitute that Seed. This is the Scriptural doctrine of "election." Of all earth's multitudes Abraham only was elected; later, Isaac only was elected; of his sons Jacob only was elected; then all of Jacob's posterity was elected—the nation of Israel. Not that these were elected to heaven and all the rest to eternal torment. The Bible does not teach that. But they were elected for a purpose, as a means to an end farther on—blessing to others. Rom. xi. 11, 12. So in this age an election obtains. God is calling out and electing a people to constitute the promised seed. This Bible doctrine of election possesses none of the hideous features of "pre-destination," which charges our Heavenly Father with bringing millions of human beings into existence after having pre-destined by far the greater part of them to endless torment. Such teaching is revolting to the warmest Christian heart, and is Scripturally as unfounded as it is horrible to contemplate. The true doctrine of election as taught in the Bible exalts our ideas of the love and graciousness of God, for surely none can question his right to elect whom he will in order that through them he may bless others. Nor does this presentation of election oppose "free grace" by which all may be justified from sin and redeemed from its eternal wages.

THE AGE TO COME.

After the consummation of this gospel age will follow the millennial age. Jesus called it the "regeneration." Peter called it "the times of restitution of all things." The elect church who is now the "espoused virgin" will then be the "bride" gloriously united with her Lord, being made joint-heir and joint-possessor with him of the promised inheritance. Psa. ii. The apostle John, carried forward in vision to that time, says of Jesus "thou hast redeemed us to God out of every.... nation; and hast made us unto our God, kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth." Rev. v. 9, 10. "They shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him the thousand years." Rev. xx. 6. Kings rule,' and priests intercede and bless. God is now electing or saving a church (ekklesia, chosen out), and through them as "a royal priesthood" it is his purpose to save and bless the world.

Yes, even now to a co-operatively few in God making manifest his love and mercy, but it is "in the ages to come" that he will show forth to all "the exceeding riches of his grace." Let us rejoice and be glad that there will be a "restitution of all things"—and who will dare to limit its extent—a "dispensation of the fulness of times" in the which he will "gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are in earth, even in him." Eph. i. 10.—Day Dawn.

It is easier to approve of the good deeds of men in past ages than it is to follow their example. But if we approve of their conduct, we condemn ourselves if we do not do likewise.

Something for Children To Do.

There is something on earth for the children to do,
For the child that is stirring to be
Like the One who once ransomed, in accents of love,
"Let the little ones come unto me."

There are sweet, winning words to the weary and sad,
By their grief, loving Jesus to be told;
There are hearts that are waiting by some little hand
Unto Jesus the Lord to be led.

There are lessons to learn, both at home and at school;
There are battles to fight for the right;
There's a watch to be kept over temper and tongue,
And God's help to be asked day and night.

There are rallies to be given, kind deeds to be done,
Gentle words to be dropped by the way;
For the child that is seeking to follow the Lord
There is something to do every day.

"I suppose I'll have to be very good now, grandma, because we have this baby, and mother won't want her to be naughty, and she'll very likely be so if I am."

So said a little boy looking up very earnestly into his grandmother's face. And every one must admit the truth of what he says, that "it is very good reasoning."

It is well for the young always to remember that they can not be good or naughty for themselves alone, for they will always influence some one or other to be like them.

Bless the Children.

Bless the children—so say we all,
For the dear little people are the very brightness of our lives. Just as flowers make the face of nature glad and happy, so these tender blossoms make this human life of ours beautiful and fair. In these gifts God renews the world from day to day; they cover up the dark miseries of humanity, and hide at least for a time the sorrows of life. What would home be without them? Who has not noticed the aching void in a house where they are not? It may be that worldly prosperity is there, but of the riches of the heart there is little. And we can not overrate the influence of children in conflict with that selfishness which is as natural to the human heart as grass is to the field. We say with all our heart, "God bless the darlings every one."

How Josey Was Caught.

Josey liked to keep office for his "Uncle Doctor," as he called him. But the doctor did not always like to trust him there when he was called away, for Josey had a habit of looking into things that made the doctor fear he might get into mischief, for Josey was a meddlesome boy. One day, however, Josey found himself alone, and began to look at everything on the table. The electric battery pleased him most.

"Ho! I know how to fix this," he said. "If any man came in that wanted electric treatment, I could do it as well as Uncle Doctor. There! Now its all right. Now you take hold of these handles."

The taking hold was easy enough, but letting go was quite another matter. Any little boy or girl who has ever tried it will know how Josey's arms jingled and ached, but he had to hold on, he could not let go; and there he was, tears running down his face, when his uncle heard his screams and came in.

"You got caught that time, Josey," said his uncle, whom he had set him free. "Now, remember that bad habits hold fast to a boy worse than an electric battery does, and are harder to get rid of. And meddling is a very bad habit."

"I won't have anything to do with either of them," said Josey.

To the Young.

Dear Young Friends:

Do you desire to come to Jesus? and to feel the joys of redeeming grace? Then love not the world, nor the things that are in it like Paul become crucified to it and the world to you; rise above it and feel that you are a stranger and pilgrim on earth. Give all to Christ, realizing that all you have is Christ's, and that the things of the world are, or should be, of no value, only as they enable one to be more useful now. Seek pardon and he will say to you, as he did to that one that came and stood before him weeping, who had washed his feet with her tears, and wiped them with the hair of her head. He told her to "go in peace," and he will say the same to you. You cannot wash the feet of Jesus, but you can bow before him, ask him to pardon you, and he will. There is so much to be done. Can you not be a missionary for Christ? He has promised to reward you with the crown of eternal life when the victory is won. You may think you can not do anything, but there is plenty of work for all; the harvest is near but where are the reapers.

LYDIA REED.

Jerusalem.

We continue Mrs. Davis' Journal as printed in the Age-to-Come Herald for our readers of the Youths' Column. We think they all will like to read about Jerusalem where our Savior once lived. We think many of our little readers would like to go with "Charlie" and Mrs. Davis to the Mt. of Olives and a great many other places she writes about. But as but very few can go to Jerusalem we can read about it, and so we give what Mrs. Davis says about the city and its people to our readers in this column.

Jan. 18. We are now having another terrific storm. The rain is pouring in torrents, and has been for the last twelve hours. Everything now indicates a good harvest. How necessary for the returning Israelites.

Jan. 24. The rains continue. They are gentle showers that water the earth profitably. Violent storms have been more usual. But they drench the earth too powerfully. They are more in harmony, however, with the spirit of this age, than the gentle rains. Is there not an omen of the new age, even in the rain? The Kedron is still flowing, and I, with others, am to visit it this afternoon.

The great event of the day is the coming of Maj. Gen. Gordon, of the English army. He was governor of the Soudan twelve years. Mr. Floyd brought him here, and from him we learn that the general has come to stay, which is a mystery to all. He is said to be a religious man, and very kind to the poor. I hope he is an Israelite. Who knows but that he may yet fight for Jerusalem?

Mr. Green is still here. He and Mr. Spafford have been up through the country where the railroad is to be built. He is one of the royal engineers and will go back to London to interest capitalists in this enterprise. He intends to labor free of charge. God is moving on some capable men to work for the upbuilding of Palestine.

We hear of the terrible floods in Europe and elsewhere. Many are beginning to feel anxious about these floods, cyclones, etc. I have lent the Perilelia papers to many persons, and they seem to understand the subject. Will the editor please send me a chart of the planets; such a one as I made before I left America. Many are anxious to see one.

There are large quantities of wheat stored up here, which looks like the beginning of the fulfilment of prophecy, "The floors shall be full of wheat."

We have splendid bread; nice fruit and eggs. We need good cows; then we would be all right for food. Meat is not necessary here. I have not the slightest desire for it; and shall be glad to see the end of death. For one animal to take the life of another to support its own, seems to be unnatural.

I have orders for sketches, paintings, bouquets, etc., which will keep me busy a long time. In fact I was never so busy before in my life. This is now a busy city, I assure you; and as business increases we shall all find enough to do.

I dislike writing. I am sorry it is so, but it is. I can sit here twelve hours without food and make pictures, and do not get weary. But to write one letter is a task. How strange. But I remember Moses, and dare not complain.

I can hardly conceive of you in America, in the cold, snow and ice: while we are looking out on green fields and flowers. There can be no question but that the climate is generally healthy. I do not have headaches as I used to at home. My liver is in a much better condition, and I weigh ten pounds more than when I left Boston.

An English lady has recently come here to live. I have been out with her this morning to buy carpets and furniture for her rooms. She comes alone and expects the kingdom to come soon. She believes in the Anglo-Israel theory.

I will add no more "leaves" today, as I am expecting my little friend Charlie to come for me to go to the Kedron. Charlie is a young Jew, twelve years of age. He is my companion in all my walks. He acts as interpreter and guide. These young Jews have wise heads, I assure you.

The manners of the Orientals please me; I feel at home with them.

Jan. 29. It is said that as much rain has already fallen this year as during the whole season last year. It has rained nearly every day for the past two weeks. Well, we have no rivers to overflow, and our houses, so far, are quite dry. There is no danger of wet leases if they are properly attended to before the rains come on.

One day last week with my little friend, I went to the Potters' field to gather flowers; but instead of doing that I became much interested in exploring the old tombs. They are exceedingly interesting. We found negroes living in some of them, and they are not so very uncomfortable to live in either. The tombs were cut out of solid rock, and many bear traces of beautiful carving. They cover an area of considerable extent. I was quite fascinated with the place, and all night long I was wandering among the tombs in my dreams.

There are many interesting scenes here for those who love the "Land" and the "Book." Another day Charlie took me to see an old Roman road over Mt. Scopus. The wind blew almost a hurricane. But we persevered and reached the top; but were glad to immediately descend. These roads are among the wonders of the world. Portions of them are as perfect now as when the old Roman chariots passed over them. They were made very durable; graded and paved with great skill, as smooth and even as a floor.

I sometimes sit under the trees and think of bygone days; wishing these rocks and caves could speak to me of what they have witnessed. The rocks, as I have before told you, are crumbling; and some of the caves are tumbling in. I think in time the most of them will disappear. It seems that God intends they shall become fertilizers. Perhaps they are an augury of the crumbling of this age, out of which shall spring a new one. The soil is a rich red, like iron ore. It adds great beauty to the scenery in contrast with the rich green.

Jan. 31. It is still raining, with no signs of clearing up. Well, let it rain. The time will soon come when the Lord will "come and reign righteousness upon" his people in this land. Hosea x. 12. This land has long waited for both kinds of rain; and I will try and learn a lesson of patience. The more light we have the more patience we need with those who do not see the light.

Just think, February 7th, and the flowers all in bloom; or, many kinds, I should have said; for they are not all in bloom yet. Some blossom much earlier than others.

My mind has been so absorbed with everything here that it seems as though I had always lived here. Somehow I cannot realize that I ever lived anywhere else. I cannot account for the feeling, but it is so. All that I ever passed through before seems but a dream, and living here the reality. When I read the Bible it seems to be real, and as though I was familiar with the scenes it describes.

All classes seem to be living in expectation of some great event to take place immediately. They eagerly inquire for news, and are intensely excited over the rumors of war, or the calamities of which we get some scanty information from almost every part of the world. Coming events seem to cast their shadows before.

The rain is pouring down in torrents. The streets are quite deserted. All the clouds seem to come from the west.

But few travellers have yet arrived. A few American tourists called on me last week. They were interested in my mission, and will order flowers.

I have seen but two drunken men since I came to this city, and they could walk. The liquor here is so pure that it does not affect people as it does in higher civilized countries where men make professions of being better Christians; consequently there have been few quarrels, or crimes of any kind arising from drink, compared with those countries.

The union of the two houses of Israel is a mighty question which will yet stir the world. "Cry unto Jerusalem, that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned; for she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins."

Feb. 24. The rains continue. The Prince came yesterday, and it seemed that all Jerusalem was out to meet him. I did not think there were so many people in the city. It is already full.

Today I went with my little friend to the Convent of the Cross for flowers. We found the hills and valleys covered with them—most lovely to behold. We worked diligently till the shades of evening reminded us of our duty to return. As we came over the brow of the hill, a most magnificent sun-set view met our eyes. The golden rays of the great luminary of light, as they spread over the city with its lofty minarets and domes, gave us a most sublime view of Jerusalem as in a vision of glory. Charlie, my little Jew guide, said, "This is like Paradise." The City of the Great King, from whatever point you may behold it, is wonderfully grand. It impresses the beholder with a sense of majestic greatness and beauty. [Dr. Patterson, who has been in nearly all the large cities of the world, says there is no other city from which so much of it can be seen from so many different standpoints, as Jerusalem.]

Feb. 28. Today as I walked the streets I met a Mohammedan funeral procession. First came two black girls dressed in blue, holding over their heads in a sort of winding robe-like form, a blue cotton handkerchief, shrieking with a wailing tone at the top of their voices. Then came about twenty veiled women wearing the common sheet. Following them was the coffin, borne by six men. It was covered, and had a Turkish cap on the head of it to indicate that the corpse was a male. The men looked solemn; but it appeared the women hired their weeping done for them.

In the afternoon I went to the sewing circle to sew for the poor refugee Jews, where some substantial clothing is given out to the poor. We like to work for this object. About forty travellers also came today, mostly Americans. We are glad to welcome visitors to Jerusalem.

Perfection comes by obedience.

"Peace I leave with you. My peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth give I unto you."

Those hearts that beat for others and long to do them good, seeking to make them happy, are the happiest on earth.

The man who does most to enlighten human darkness, mitigate human distress and comfort human hearts, is more likely to be true and sound in spiritual philosophy and doctrine than the man who is only critical and not self-sacrificing.

—Employ the gift thou hast,
Whate'er it may be, with true and earnest care,
And thus endeavor shall not be the last;
Each good performed another shall prepare.

Do not wade far out into the dangerous sea of this world's comfort. Take the good that God provides you, but say of it "it passeth away, for indeed it is but a temporary need." Never suffer your goods to become you God.

We may not add a hair's breadth to the seamless robe of Christ's completed righteousness, but we may be allowed, by obedience to God's commandments, to add the beauty of a graceful fringe, and so to "adorn the doctrine of our Lord and Savior by a pious and godly conversation."—P. S. Henson.

Far out of sight, while yet the flesh enfolds us,
Lies the far country where our hearts abide,
And of its bliss is naught more wondrous told us
Than these few words, "Thou shalt be satisfied."

Nothing does so establish the mind amid the railings and turbulence of present things, as both a look above them and a look beyond them—above them, to the steady and good hand by which they are ruled; and beyond them to the sweet and beautiful end to which by that hand they will be brought.—Jeremy Taylor.

Our sun is shining, therefore, we argue, our day shall linger,—and we plan more, and do more, and Time's meshes twine thicker round our hearts, and its all a mistake!—we are reckoning by the sun, and not by him who controls the sun,—and in the midst of our work, and the many things we say must be done, lo! our sun goes down—while it is yet day! Incomplete—sudden—unexpected—it is always so. Our watches never mark the appointed hour. They reckon by the sun and the sun reckons to God. "Tomorrow!" we say,—

"——And tomorrow, and tomorrow,
Creeps in this petty pace from day to day
To the last syllable of recorded time."

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXII. Read X PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, SEPTEMBER 26, 1883. NO. 36.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS--TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortalized saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

THE NINETEENTH COSMIC LINE.

In a previous article we found the pyramid complete with the sphere at the nineteenth cosmic line, namely at the semi-diameter or radius of the sphere, that the twenty-fourth cosmic line gave the other semi-diameter or radius of the sphere, the sum of the two thus constituting the polar diameter of the sphere that the sacred cubit was probably founded upon this polar diameter as a typical standard, and because of this cosmic relation geometric and numerical, divided into twenty-four equal parts, the foot being one-half of this same typical standard and represented by the radius or semi-diameter of the sphere and reached in regular cosmic order at the nineteenth cosmic line. We thus found moreover that all the cosmic rudiments necessary for determining measurements of extension were complete at this nineteenth line, and that at the twenty-fourth cosmic line all the cosmic rudiments necessary to determine weight were also complete.

In another article some time ago, in which I endeavored to show the cosmic relation of time to number, we found that according to the type of the times of the Gentiles found their completion also in the nineteenth line or in the 1216th of the whole period 2666⅔. "The times of the Gentiles" apparently begin with the rise of the ancient Babylonian empire. This had its rise about 750 B. C. Add therefore the 750 B. C. to the 1916⅔ A. D. and we have the whole period 2666⅔ or having this typical period subtract the 750 and we have the 1916⅔ the point of its cosmic completion in time. But the completion of "the times of the Gentiles" inaugurates the second coming and cosmic rule of Christ, a time when everything mundane must and will and may and can be spanned to the line and the plummet. God measures and weighs as we are frequently reminded in his Word, and so impressively taught in Daniel v. 24-28. Here was a kingdom "measured" and "weighed" and "found wanting."

Again the specific term applied to Christ and his Messianic rule in the psalm (44th Septuagint, 45th C. V.) "arrows" in the 5th verse is a term of cosmic measurement, meaning to extend within and only unto cosmic bounds. At his coming the cosmic standard, the sceptre of righteousness, will be in the hand of a cosmic lord, at a cosmic time. May it be ours to reach the cosmic line. Then indeed will our "line have been cast in pleasant places."

In my last article I called the attention of the reader to the suggestive numerical fact and coincidence that the prophecy in Isaiah which is usually now-a-days interpreted to point unequivocally to the "Miracle in Stone" or "The Great Pyramid of Jeezah," is found in the 19th verse of the 19th chapter. Following out this numerical typical index let us see where it will lead us and what we will discover. If our inferences thus far drawn are correct we might expect to find elsewhere in the Scriptures evidence of this correctness in the numerical harmonies. As the nineteenth cosmic line brings us to Christ's cosmic rule, and to specific prophecy having a cosmic relation to it, we might expect passages having a numerical correspondence in other books of the Scriptures to teach truths which correlate in a cosmic manner with the general truth and fact of his kingdom. Let us see, and beginning with Gen. xix. 19, what have we? This: Lot pleading with God to be allowed to flee unto Zoar instead of up into the mountain of God's appointment. Remember that there is a mountain of exaltation and refuge for God's people when Christ and his kingdom comes. Again Exodus xix. 19. What do we find? This: "Mount Sinai and the voices of the trumpet preceding the giving of the law. Moses as a mediator speaks and God answers him with a voice. Remember that the mountain of exaltation in the last day is an antitype of Sinai and that Moses as a mediator is a type of the true mediator Christ who will speak again and God will answer.

Once more, Lev. xix. 23. What do we find? This: "Guard my law." And the specific instruction in regard to keeping the species of their domestic animals distinct, not sowing their vineyard with other seeds, not adulterating their garments in the weaving of them in short separation, "be ye separate." Remember there will be separation of all dross and alloy from the constituent parts of Christ's kingdom when he comes.

Again Numbers xix. 19. What do we find? This: "And the clean one will sprinkle upon the unclean one on the third day and on the seventh; and he (the unclean one) will wash his garments and he will bathe in water and will be unclean until evening! Remember "the sprinkling" that maketh clean, "the washing of regeneration," and the "baptism unto repentance and good works." And that when we have done all we are still to put our hand upon our mouth and cry unclean, unclean, until "the morning" (the resurrection).

Again Deuteronomy xix. 19. What do we find? This: "And ye shall do unto him after the manner in which he did wickedly against his brother and thou wilt take away the wicked thing from out their midst." Ye and thou acting as judges and administers of law, laying justice to the line and the plummet. "A royal priesthood," remember, "priests and kings unto God" then and there.

Again Joshua xix. 19. What do we find? This: A chapter devoted to an allotment and a distribution of an inheritance. There are but three names of places mentioned in this nineteenth verse. There are but three measures of extension remember, height, length, and breadth. All things are yours then and there in this new division of an inheritance.

Again Judges xix. 19. What have we here? This: An answer to an offer of pious hospitality to a wayfarer on the way from Bethlehem-Judah, to Mount Ephraim. Are we not all wayfarers from the one to the other of these typical places? And this wayfarer was well nigh home. He had reached Gibeah. What is his answer? "We have bread and wine. There is no lack of anything." Every saint who has become a true partaker of the sacred symbols ought to be able to make the same good answer.

Again 1 Sam. xix. 19. What have we here? This. "And it was told Saul saying, Lo David is in Naioth in Rama." Who was with David? The prophet Samuel. He was in a sacred place. It will be told the enemies of the King then that the Son of David is in a sacred place, and Rama will be comforted then. Rachel who wept for her children and would not be comforted, will be comforted then.

Again 2 Sam. xix. 19. What does this give us? "And he said unto the King (as we must all say), account not my transgression, O my Lord, and remember not the iniquities which thy servant did on the day when my lord went his way out of Jerusalem, that the king should set them in his heart." Remember David is on his way back to Jerusalem when this occurs, and he has already prolonged the decree of grace and pardon.

Again 1 Kings xix. 19. What here? This: Elijah going to cast his mantle upon Elisha, the prophetic garment of service. Is not Elisha the Jew? And will not Elijah come again and cast upon him the prophetic mantle of God's service ere the king and the kingdom fully comes?

Again 2 Kings xix. 19. What is this? "And now, O Lord our God, save us from out his hand, and all the kingdoms of the earth will comprehend that thou God alone art Lord" Ah yes. Is not this the lesson of lessons God has been teaching all these ages? and how slow to learn it is the world. "Now." Then will all the kingdoms at least acknowledge it. "He will break them in pieces as a potter's vessel."

Again 1 Chronicles xix. 19. What? "And the servants of Adrazar (a typical king) saw that they were being worsted before the face of Israel, and they made a covenant with David and served him as bond-servants. And Syria was never again willing to go to the help of the sons of Ammon." Ayel Syria learns the lesson first, and what a blessed service it will be! Amen!

Is there anything more to complete the picture? Is this mere coincidence in the numerical types, dear reader? More at another time on the 24th cosmic line and its teaching.

In my last article preceding this I should have said the "cubit or arm-measurement" was from the inside of the shoulder to the wrist or point of confunction with the hand instead of "to the extremity of the little finger." The old idea of from the elbow to the extremity of the little finger slipped in to confuse my head and pen.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.--Second Series. Number 28.

ENDOR.

In the ruddy morning twilight I rode across the beautiful plain to Endor. It is a poor village of some twenty houses, perched on the bleak side of Morah, about two hundred yards above the plain. The rocks round it are pierced with caves—some natural, some artificial, as if the old inhabitants had been troglodytes. Above the village is one larger than the rest, the entrance to which is between high rocks, and is partly covered by the branches of a fig-tree. Within it is a fountain called 'Ain Dor, "the fountain of Dor," which doubtless gave its name to the ancient as well as the modern village. Entering this gloomy grotto, and looking round on its dark riven sides, I felt how suitable such a spot would be for the interview between Saul and the witch.

NAIN.

A pleasant ride of forty minutes along the hillside brought me to Nain. It was by the very same path our Lord approached it, for he was on his way from Capernaum. It was with no little interest, therefore, I observed on my left, three or four hundred yards from the village, a group of rock tombs. Towards one of these probably the funeral procession was moving when he met and stopped it. How vividly did the whole scene appear to me now as I stood on the spot! The procession issuing from the gate: the men carrying the open bier; the women behind grouped round the poor widow, and rending the air with their cries as they do still. Another procession meets them. He who heads it looks with melting tenderness on the widow, and says, in accents that thrill her soul, "Weep not!" He touches the bier. In mingled awe and astonishment the bearers stop. "Young man, I say unto thee, Arise!" As the words are uttered, the dead rises to life; and in a moment he is in the arms of his mother.

Nain is a small village; but the ruins round it show that it was much larger in olden times; and it commands one of the finest views in Central Palestine. Beneath it the plain, beyond which rise the wooded hills of Galilee; and on the north the great flat dome of Tabor, with Hermon shooting up behind it on the distant horizon. From this place I first saw these two mountains in close perspective proximity, and I thought that perhaps it might have been some such view which suggested the Psalmist's words: "The north and the south thou hast created them; Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name." Ps. lxxxix. 12.

SHUNEM.

The path from Nain to Shunem passes round the western slopes of Moreh. As I turned my back on Tabor the brown hills of Samaria came in sight, looking like a lower continuation of Carmel; then Gilboa came into view, rising up white and bare from the center of the beautiful green plain, and having the grey ruins of Jezreel at its western base. Sweeping round still to the left, I looked away down the middle arm of Esdraelon to the lofty tell on which the old city of Bethshan stood, and beyond it to the picturesque range of Gilead. This is "the valley of Jezreel," properly so called, and the scene of some of the most momentous events in Jewish history.

Shunem was now below me, situated in a little nook at the foot of the ridge, encircled by enclosed gardens and luxuriant fields of corn. I rode into it and dismounted at the fountain. The people were rude and almost hostile; but there was an air of sturdy independence about them, and of thrift and success about their houses and fields, that pleased me. A party of men and women were busy reaping in an adjoining barley field; and a number of little children were basking in the bright sunshine among the sheaves and stubble, all with bare heads, and a few of them stark naked. I sat down and read the story of the Shunamite, every detail of which assumed a life-like vividness. In the house of a great man—probably the sheikh—of that village Elisha was wont to lodge. One day his son—the child of promise—"went out to his father to the reapers," just as the children I saw now had gone out. But the heat was too much for him. The fatal sunstroke prostrated him. "My head, my head," he cried; and when carried home to his mother, "he sat on her knees till noon, and died." 2 Kings iv. 8-20. The mother's journey across that plain to Carmel, and Elisha's miracle, are well known.

GIDEON'S VICTORY.

The scene of one of the most glorious victories, and of one of the most disastrous defeats in the annals of Israel, was before me at Shunem. It was with no ordinary interest I proceeded to survey the battle-field, so as fully to understand the sacred narrative. When the "Midianites, and the children of the east," with their herds, numerous and destructive as locusts, invaded the land three thousand years ago, they pitched their tents on the north side of the valley of Jezreel, "by the hill of Moreh;" while Gideon and his little band of warriors "pitched beside the well of Harod," on the south side, at the foot of Gilboa. Judges vi. 3, 30; vii. 1. The hill Moreh was there, rising up close behind Shunem. The camp of the Midianites lay along its base, probably extending from the "fountain" of Shunem down to Bethshan. Mounting my horse I rode across the rich valley to Gideon's camp at the well of Harod. The distance is a little over three miles, and there is a slight descent the whole way. The well, or rather "fountain," for the Hebrew word is Ain, springs from a wide excavation in the rocky root of Gilboa, and sends out a copious stream which forms a miniature lake, and then murmurs away down the vale. Gilboa rises over it in broken cliffs. Gideon's active followers had assembled upon the mountain; and he, at God's command, "brought them down to the water," to test them (vii. 4); this done they again ascended (ver. 8). During the night Gideon "went down" with his servant to spy out the camp of the enemy (verses 9 and 10). He heard the Midianite tell his dream; he knew thus that the Lord's time of deliverance was come; and by his singular but effective stratagem, and unexpected assault, he struck terror into the host of the enemy, and they fled in wild disorder down the valley to the fords of the Jordan. For the first time I there saw how not only every detail of the battle was accurate, but how every incidental expression of the sacred historian was illustrated by the topography of the battle-field.

THE DEATH OF SAUL AND JONATHAN.

Two centuries later the Philistines marched into the center of Israel, and took up their position at Shunem, on the spot where the Midianites had encamped. Saul then gathered the tribes on the heights of Gilboa. 1 Sam. xxviii. 4. Looking down from his commanding position on the war-like array, and the formidable war-chariots of the enemy, drawn up in the valley, Saul was "afraid, and his heart greatly trembled." Conscience made a coward of him, for he felt that he had forgotten God, and that God had therefore forsaken him. The closing scene of Saul's life is sad and solemn. One's heart bleeds for the great man; and looking at him morally as well as physically, one is compelled to exclaim, "How are the mighty fallen!"

Forsaken by Heaven, he so far forgot himself as to seek counsel from the spirits of darkness. During the night he crossed the valley, passed along the east side of the Philistine army, and went over the shoulder of Moreh to Endor, where he visited the witch. The distance is about seven miles, so that he must have travelled at least fourteen that night. Though wearied with the journey, and broken in spirit, he drew up his troops in the morning at the fountain of Harod. The position was badly chosen. The ground slopes down from Shunem, and the Philistines had thus all the advantages for attack; while both front and flanks of the Israelites were exposed, and fight all but impossible, owing to the steepness of the mountain behind. The Israelites were broken by the first impetuous charge of the enemy, and the slaughter was dreadful as they attempted to flee up Gilboa. They fell down slain in Mount And the Philistines followed hard upon Saul and upon his sons....And the battle went sore against Saul, and the archers hit him; and he was sore wounded of the archers" (1 Sam. xxxi. 1-3). David in his beautiful ode has brought out the peculiarity of the position: "The beauty of Israel is slain upon the high places....How are the mighty fallen in the midst of the battle! O Jonathan, thou wast slain in thine high places!" (2 Sam. i. 19, 25.)

The stripping and mutilating of the slain, mentioned in the narrative, may seem to some inhuman, and almost incredible. Strange to say, it is characteristic of Arab warfare to this day. I myself saw a fearful example of it a few years ago, not many miles from this spot. During a journey through Palestine I witnessed a battle, or rather massacre of Kurds by Hawara Arabs. I visited the battle-fields the day after; and there I found the ground strewn with corpses, all stripped, and some frightfully mutilated. Akeil Aga, and the ruffian horde that now follow him, are worthy representatives of the old Philistines. After that spectacle of human barbarity I read with more intense feelings of horror the closing scene of the battle of Gilboa: "And it came to pass on the morrow, when the Philistines came to strip the slain, that they found Saul and his three sons fallen in Mount Gilboa. And they cut off his head, and stripped off his armour....And they put his armour in the house of Ashtaroth; and they fastened his body to the wall of Bethshan" (1 Sam. xxxi. 8-11.)

From the fountain of Harod I rode up an old path, hewn deeply in the rocky side of Gilboa. Looking upon that mountain—bleak, and white, and barren, without tree, or shrub, or blade of grass—I could scarcely help thinking that the wildly plaintive words of David's lamentation were prophetic: "Ye mountains of Gilboa, let there be no dew, neither let there be rain upon you, nor fields of offerings; for there the shield of the mighty is vilely cast away, the shield of Saul, as though he had not been anointed with oil" (2 Sam. i 21.)—J. L. Porter.

A MONUMENT OF THE PAST.

The following description of the "Arch of Titus" appeared in the New York Observer some few years ago. As the true representations of the sacred utensils, once used in the Temple worship at Jerusalem, are depicted on this triumphal monument of the Roman Captor of the City of the Great King, we feel assured that our readers will be glad to peruse this account of their sculptured forms, although the sacred originals have disappeared. Some think it possible that the originals will yet be brought to light. In the providence of God this is not impossible.

ARCH OF TITUS, AT ROME.

It was night when I first entered the "Eternal City." Darkness and silence hung alike over its ruins and its modern works, and though all impatience to be standing among the former, I could see them only in imagination, and must wait for the morning light. When the day returned I sallied out alone; bending my steps in search of one of its ancient monuments, one which was to me most interesting of all because erected in the purpose of God, though by heathen hands, to stand through ages as a confirmation of his holy word. I passed the column of Antonine, and the Forum and column of Trajan, and reaching the Roman Forum spied an old friar, whom I asked in Italian to point me to the Arch of Titus. He seemed never to have heard its name, although he had doubtless passed under it a thousand times; and this was a fair specimen of the intelligence of the great mass of the monks of Rome and Italy. A priest who came along, directed me to a triumphal arch at the foot of the Capitoline Hill as the one, but I found it inscribed with the name of Septimius Severus. Seeing another on the summit of the ancient Via Sacra, I made my way to it and read the following inscription:

SENATVS.
POPVLVSQVE ROMANVS.
DIVO. TITO. DIVIA. VESPASIANI.
VESPASIANO. AVGVSTO.

There is no monument of ancient Rome that possesses equal interest for the Christian. Its proportions are considered more faultless than those of any other, while its position adds greatly to the effect, but it has a far higher interest in the sculptured records which it contains. It was erected by the Senate and Roman people, to commemorate the conquest of Jerusalem by Titus. The memorable siege of the Holy City was begun by Vespasian the father of Titus, a siege the horrors of which have never been equalled. While at the head of the army before the walls, Vespasian, upon the death of Nero, was proclaimed Emperor by his troops. He hastened back to Rome, leaving Titus in command, who, upon the fall of the city and the destruction of the Temple, made a triumphal march into Italy and to the imperial city, bringing with him a long train of captive Jews, together with the spoils, among which were the sacred vessels of the temple. It is this triumphal procession which is commemorated in the bas reliefs of the beautiful arch. They have suffered somewhat from the hand of time, still more by the hand of Vandalism, but the main features are still well preserved to supply a place in the illustration of the Bible which can be filled from no other source. They are the only visible representations that exist of those sacred vessels, the patterns of which were received from heaven. The fate of the sacred vessels themselves is not positively known at the present day. They were carefully preserved among the trophies of the Capitol where they were copied, and it is generally believed that the originals were removed by Maxentius and lost from the Milvian bridge in the Tiber, in his disasterous flight from Constantine.

The frieze of the arch is ornamented with sculpture representing a procession of warriors leading oxen to sacrifice. Upon a side panel of the interior is a group representing Titus in the act of celebrating his triumph over the Jews. He is in a chariot drawn by four horses abreast, accompanied by the Senators of Rome, and officers bearing the fasces. The sculptured form of Victory stands holding a wreath of laurel with which she is about to crown him. Upon the opposite side, on a similar panel, is the celebrated group bearing the sacred vessels of the Jewish temple. First comes a standard-bearer, leading the way, with a canopy or arch supported above his head. The table of shew-bread is borne on staves, with a cup and the silver trumpets used by the priests of the temple to proclaim the year of Jubilee. Other bearers followed carrying laurels, and the golden candle-stick with its seven branches. In size and form these bas reliefs correspond precisely with the descriptions of the sacred record, and the minute descriptions of Josephus.

Little did those ancient heathen, the Roman Senate and the Roman people, when decreeing and erecting this monument to a deified warrior and Emperor, imagine that they were erecting a monument to the true God in the verification of prophecy and divine history; and little did they suppose that, after nearly two thousand years, the disciples of that faith which they had already begun to persecute, even unto cruel death, should come from distant lands to read the record, and to be confirmed in their faith. God works in wondrously when he employs such methods to accomplish his purposes. Titus was but an instrument in God's hand in the destruction of the unbelieving city, and in the fulfilment of the prophecies of our Savior relating to the temple, of which he said: "There shall not be one stone on another which shall not be thrown down," and the Roman nation completed this remarkable fulfilment of the divine purpose by making a monumental record of the events. There it stands, after the lapse of eighteen centuries, to testify for the living God.

The Jews of Rome, of whom there are about six thousand, are said to be the descendants of the captives which Titus brought from Jerusalem to grace his triumph. They have at least inherited their bondage, suffering oppression at the hands of a nominally Christian and ecclesiastical government. They are confined to a small and filthy quarter of the city, and are compelled to pay tribute to the government for the privilege of living even here. Until the pontificate of Pius IX, they were shut up within the Ghetto every evening, and not allowed to leave it until morning, under a heavy penalty. Not one of them will even, at this day, pass under the arch of Titus, although it spans one of the thoroughfares of Rome. They shun it as a memorial of the subjugation of their nation, a fall which has never yet been retrieved, and regard it always with aversion. I met in the street one day a Jewish Rabbi, who had often been at my room, and asked some information respecting this interesting arch, wishing to know how it was regarded by his people; but he suddenly became oblivious of the English that he had just been speaking, and could not comprehend my inquiry. How wonderfully does everything connected with this people confirm the truth of the Word of God.

BAPTISM THE "FORM OF DOCTRINE."

There is a letter or form, and a spirit of baptism. Many rest in the mere form, others ignore it entirely. Why not have both? The form is easily determined, if its spirit or meaning be understood.

The doctrine of Christ is mainly summed up in two words, death and resurrection. Then the "form of doctrine" should be and is a symbolic death and resurrection. Rom. vi. 3-5, 17. It expresses our faith—Christ died and rose again. It expresses our hope—because he lives we shall live also. It expresses the substance of practical Christian life—dying to sin, and rising to a new life of holiness. Rom. vi. 11. That there are many who have this faith, hope, and life, or spirit of obedience, who have not thus expressed them in the Scriptural form is doubtless true. But they should be so expressed. The spirit of obedience should always precede the form and final expression in it. Some have been so taught, that the relation between the reality and the form has not been seen, and so they are led to do something else instead, and think it will do just as well. Their act, done sincerely, may be because of loyalty, but the act itself is not an expression of either the faith, hope, or loyalty. He that refuses to obey when the truth is seen is neither sincere nor loyal. Rom. vi. is clear upon this subject, giving the broad meaning as well as the form of baptism: "Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death; that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also [raised] in the likeness of his resurrection." The "likeness" and the reality must resemble each other.

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CRAPSIL, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Sept. 26, 1883.

A BRIEF note from Dr. E. Petavel will be found in another column. Eternal life through Christ alone, and the establishment of the Messianic kingdom in the coming age, are doctrines that are held by a few very able advocates in Continental Europe. May God bless them and add to their numbers.

NUMBER 10 of the Biblical Expositor and People's Concentary has come to hand. The current numbers contain a history of Hebrew literature. One leading object of the work is to explain difficult passages. The editor, Prof. Hirschfulder is Lecturer in Oriental Literature, University College, Toronto. Ont. The serial is a monthly at $1.00 a year.

FROM a card sent by Bro. C. Winterstein, bearing date, Jerusalem, Aug. 21, 1883, we learn that there has been no cholera in that city. Mails have been irregular on account of quarantine. He writes that the leading bank had closed, stigmatising it as a disgraceful arrangement. It seems that Mrs. Davis has fully recovered from her accidental injury, as he says all are well. The fanatics, of whom he has written in former letters, seem to be going from bad to worse.

BR. WOODWARD held a series of meetings after the close of the conference at Argos. As a result of his earnest exhibition of the gospel, with prayerful reliance upon God, eight persons were persuaded to yield the obedience of faith from the heart. It is much better to preach the gospel than to be ever insisting upon foreign debateable questions. May God help us to proclaim the glad tidings of the soon-coming kingdom. This age nears its closing hours.

L'AMI D'ISRAEL for July has arrived safely. It is a quarterly in the French language devoted to giving intelligence concerning Israel in our days. The first article is entitled, "Israel le Peuple Missionnaire," or "Israel the Missionary Nation." As we gather the leading idea of the article, from a hasty glance, and with our limited knowledge of the language, it seems to be that the grand evangelizing work belongs to the future and is to be performed by Israelites. The writer takes the ground that the commission was given by our Lord to the apostles as Israelites, and that the work commenced by them is to be completed by missionaries of the same nationality.

The following is an important item of news, and it is all that we give the present week:

A dispatch from Vienna states that Russia is making extensive military preparations along the Austrian and German frontiers. Tenders have been asked for 30,000 military beds. All the railroads have been ordered to have military cars in readiness. A list has been made of private steamers in the Black Sea, and their captains ordered to prepare for transportation of ammunition, troops and provisions. These vessels have ceased executing private orders, and the carriage of corn is thus interrupted. Enormous provision depots have been established along the frontier, and two army corps have been distributed between the Vistula and Big rivers. A list has been made of all persons who, in the event of war, could be deported from Poland to the interior of Russia.

Prove All Things, Hold Fast That Which is Good. 1 Thess. v. 21.

In this age of doubt and darkness, vague speculation and philosophy so-called, this injunction of the apostle to the Gentiles comes to us with double force. Let us take heed to the warning, lest instead of adding to our knowledge of Bible truth we be found but accumulating the "wood, hay, stubble," which must all be consumed when the day of trial comes.

I humbly beg permission to say a few words on an article in THE RESTITUTION of August 1st, under the caption—"I will Send You Elijah." In this article it is said that "Revelation distinctly teaches that there will be two prophets, who, during the great tribulation, will stand up as powerful opponents to the antichrist. Now, I have carefully, prayerfully, and patiently searched the Scriptures to find where this is taught, and I fail to see it. Turning to Rev. xi. 2-14, I read of two witnesses—two olive trees—two candlesticks, but we are not here told that they are either men or angels, prophets raised from the dead, or Elijah, who never saw death. This is the only place in the Book where I find record of such an event to transpire in the future; and as the book of Revelation is almost entirely figures and symbols, I do not feel at all safe in accepting as a coming fact, that which seems so much at variance with the whole tenor of Scripture teaching. Is not the Bible the candlestick of the Lord, the Old and the New Testaments the two olive trees giving to us the oil, or light, from the Everlasting? Have not these two books stood forth as witnesses before the God of all the earth, and have not his inspired writers been empowered to perform all the miracles referred to in Rev. xi.? Even though we may not yet be able to see the application of all the symbols mentioned in that chapter? Of one thing we are sure, if these witnesses are, or were, mortal men—they are then the same—they are mortal, for they lie dead in the streets; and we know that which is immortal cannot die.

As the angel was conversing with Zacharias before the birth of John the Baptist, we read in Luke i. 16, 17—"And many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God. And he shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children and the disobedient to (or to) the wisdom of the just, to make ready a people prepared for the Lord." From this we see that John was truly a reformer and did precisely what we are told in Malachi that Elijah shall do. Mal. iv. 5, 6: "Behold I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord; and he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse."

Surely the same idea is here conveyed, for had not the preaching of John turned many to the Lord, we may reasonably suppose that the earth then would have been smitten with a curse; but instead of that, the "salt of the earth" arrested the pending doom.

There is no force whatever in the fact that John did not quote Mal. iv. 5, 6, when waited upon by the priests and Levites. God did not at all times reveal his purposes to the instruments he saw fit to use in carrying out his great designs. We have no reason to suppose that they referred to any particular prophet, as the marginal reading is "a" prophet, not "that" prophet. I have no doubt John simply meant that he was not Elijah risen from the dead. Assuredly John uttered no falsehood, nor was he omniscient that he could know why they questioned him.

In Mal. xi. 7-16, John is the chief topic of conversation, and in perfect harmony with this fact, and the grammatical construction of the language. The 14th verse is rendered in the R. V., And if ye are willing to receive it (this in the margin) this is Elijah which is to come. Their blindness did not alter the fact that it was Elijah. In Matthew xvii., where our blessed Master was coming down from the Mount of Transfiguration, he was asked by his followers, verse 10, "Why say the Scribes that Elias must first come?" In perfect accord with the ordinary mode of expression, Christ in taking the language of the prophet uses the future tense and then immediately quotes the same language as already having been fulfilled in the person of John. This surely is simple, plain truth; no contradiction, no double meaning.

To recapitulate: John fulfilled Mal. iv. 5, 6.

1. He came before the day of the Lord.

2. He converted many of the children of Israel to the Lord their God.

3. His success in this averted the threatened curse.

4. There is no weight in the fact that he did not quote and apply to himself all three of the prophecies, Isa. xl., Mal. iv. and Mal. iii.; one is sufficient, seeing they all three refer to the same event.

5. He unequivocally denied that he was a prophet—of course he meant risen from the dead.

6. Christ positively asserted that Elijah had come already, and the disciples understood that he spoke to them of John the Baptist.

7. Christ merely in tense stood where the prophet did for the moment and then at once explains that the prophecy was fulfilled.

8. This point is covered by the seventh.

9. This prophecy has had as literal a fulfillment as others.

10. Christ tells the disciples that Elias is come already and they (the Scribes) knew him not, but have done unto him whatsoever they listed; likewise also shall the Son of Man suffer of them. Mat. xvii. 12.

Surely, surely this is enough. Our Master's own words.

Submitted in the spirit of Christ.

THE NEW COVENANT.

That there will be a new covenant made hereafter with the house of Judah and Israel is plain from the writings of the prophets and apostles. It is also evident that the new covenant will be something different from that which was made with the posterity of Abraham at Mount Sinai.

I here set before the reader the prophecies concerning this new covenant yet to be made with the seed of Abraham.

The first prophecy concerning the new covenant is recorded in Jer. xxxi. 31-37. Behold the days come saith the Lord that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah: not according to the covenant I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand, to bring them out of the land of Egypt, which my covenant they brake, although I was a husband unto them, saith the Lord; but this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord. I will put my law in their inward parts and write it in their hearts, and will be their God and they shall be my people, and they shall teach no more every man his neighbor and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord; for they shall all know me from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord; for I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more. Thus saith the Lord, which giveth the sun for a light by day and the ordinances of the moon and the stars for a light by night, which divideth the sea when the waves thereof roar; the Lord of hosts is his name.

If these ordinances depart from before me, saith the Lord, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before me forever. Thus saith the Lord, If heaven above can be measured, and the foundations of the earth searched out beneath, I will also cast off the seed of Israel, for all that they have done, saith the Lord.

Any person of discernment may see by reading this that there is yet another covenant to be made with the Israelites, not like the one made at Sinai; and it is also evident that this new covenant has never been made with them, for their land is in the possession of Gentiles, and they are cast off to this day. But when this new covenant is made, they will dwell in the land of Canaan, and never be cast off again.

This same new covenant yet to be made with the Jews and Israelites is mentioned by Paul, who considered it had not been made in his day. Heb. viii. 7-13: But now hath he obtained a more excellent ministry by how much also he is the mediator of the better covenant, which was established upon better promises. For if that first covenant had been faultless, then should no place have been sought for the second. For finding fault with them, he saith, Behold the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah, not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day when I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt, because they continued not in my covenant, and I regarded them not, saith the Lord. For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel; after those days saith the Lord, I will put my laws in their mind and write them in their hearts; and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people, and they shall not teach every man his neighbor and every man his brother, saying, know the Lord, for all shall know me from the least to the greatest; for I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more. In that he saith a new covenant, he has made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away.

What Paul has said here agrees with what is said by Jeremiah upon the same subject. When Paul saw the forlorn state of the Jews this was his comfort, that God hereafter would make a new covenant with the Jews, the amount of which was, that he would be their God, that they should be his people, that they should hereafter return to the land of Canaan, and be one people, nevermore to be driven out.

This he mentions in Rom. xi. 26-29, For I would not, brethren, that you should be ignorant of this mystery, (lest ye should be wise in your own conceits) that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in; and so all Israel shall be saved; it is written there shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob, for this is my covenant unto them when I shall take away their sins. As concerning the gospel they are enemies for your sakes: but as touching the election they are beloved for the Father's sake; for the gifts and calling of God are without repentance.

It is evident that what Paul has said here of God's covenant, has reference to something concerning the Jews which has not yet taken place. It has been, and is now, by many ministers and others thought that the new covenant means the covenant of grace that all believers are now in, but where is the proof of it? There is no such thing as the covenant of grace, or the covenant of redemption, in the Bible. Some only declare that all covenants are conditional; others with as much zeal and honesty boldly assert that all are unconditional. The fact is some are conditional and some are not.

When God made a covenant with Abraham to be his God, to make him the father of many nations, to give him and his seed the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession, it was upon this condition: that he should obey the Lord in what he required. When he offered up his son on Mount Moriah the Lord said, Because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, that in blessing I will bless thee, etc.

Abraham believed, and having performed what was required in the covenant, was entitled to what God had promised. A particular reason is given why God would give Isaac the land of Canaan and multiply his seed, in Gen. xxvi. 5: "Because that Abraham obeyed my voice and kept my charge, my commandments, my statutes and my laws." Supposing he had not obeyed, would he have been entitled to the blessings of the covenant? Surely not. The covenant made with the Israelites at Sinai was conditional. God promised them if they were obedient that he would be their God to give them the land promised to Abraham; to give them rest from their enemies; to increase them; and that they should dwell long in the land they were journeying toward. But if they disobeyed; that they should flee before their enemies, and be driven out of the good land. When they obeyed, it was well with them; when they disobeyed, it was ill with them. They have disobeyed and have not performed the conditions of the covenant on their part and see the consequences of it. They are called "a disobedient and gainsaying people," who have not obeyed and for this they are driven out of their land and are scattered all over the world to be a proverb and a by-word, according to what Moses said should come upon them if they broke the covenant which they entered into at Sinai.

The new covenant of which we are now speaking, is different from that which was made at Mount Sinai. God has promised to make a new covenant with that same nation, but not such an one as the other, "not according to the covenant I made with their fathers when I took them by the hand and brought them out of Egypt." That was upon conditions of obedience, but this new covenant will be without any conditions. "I will be their God and they shall be my people," are the terms of it, and when this is once made with them they will never more be scattered; Christ being their surety will stand for them as their only safety. According to Dan. xii. 1, "At that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people."

Many people suppose that this new covenant to be made with Judah and Israel means one made with all believers. But where is the believer that can say God has made a covenant with him? He can say God has forgiven him who was a sinner before condemned to die. But could we say those with whom the first covenant was made were our fathers and mothers? did God make a covenant with them? did he bring them out of Egypt? This is sufficient to prove that this covenant does not mean one made already with believers, or one yet to be made with them; it means one which is not yet made, but will be made hereafter with the posterity of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, by which God will be their God, Christ their king, and the land of Canaan their possession and quiet dwelling-place according to God's promise to Abraham.

That this covenant has reference to the land of Canaan and the blessings the Jews will there enjoy of a temporal and spiritual nature is plain from the prophecies of Jeremiah, "And will bring them again into this place, and I will cause them to dwell safely, and I will make an everlasting covenant with them that I will not turn away from them to do them good: yea I will rejoice over them to do them good, and I will plant them in this land assuredly with my whole heart and with my whole soul." One thing mentioned in this covenant, called an everlasting one, is that the Jews shall be planted in the same land they were carried away from when they were led into Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar. It is mentioned in verse 43 that fields should be bought in the land which was then desolate, without man or beast, being in the hands of the Chaldeans.

As it is plain that this new covenant refers to that which the Jews shall enjoy in the land of Canaan when they return there, if I should continue the subject further I will mention some of the prophecies concerning the return of the Jews to their own land or the accomplishment of what God has predicted concerning the new covenant. The idea of the new covenant is very different from that concerning the covenants men have invented and named the covenant of grace, redemption and mercy. Such things have served to distract the world and lead thinking men to conclude the Scriptures are a collection of nonsense because men have collected a heap of confusion and named it from the Scriptures, as though a man should call a heap of rubbish ancient Rome in its glory. ## Letter from Europe.

CHALET BOLDENIES, GENEVA, Sept. 7, 1883.

Editor Restitution:

I fear I have not answered yet your favor dated Feb. 7. The fact is, my health is not at all good, and I must limit my correspondence to a minimum. But I can and do sympathize with your noble work, although the little strength I have left is devoted to the controversy to be sustained in Continental Europe.

My friend Mr. Byse, of Brussells, being fully occupied in pastoral duties, it happens that for the present the burden of meeting the attacks made against our belief, as to life in Christ only, weighs entirely almost upon my weak hands. Nevertheless, I bless God for the task entrusted by him.

My brother, Rev. W. Petavel, pastor at Boveix, Canton of Neuchatel, is the Editor of Le Ami d' Israel, which I had the pleasure of sending, and of which I found an acknowledgement in your paper of Aug. 8.

You will be glad to hear that Mr. Byse's courage is undiminished. Having been deprived of their Chapel, himself and his flock are gathering funds for building another. I shall send you a pamphlet of mine, now in press, in which I plead Mr. Byse's cause.

Believe me to remain, my dear sir, yours in Christian bonds and hopes.

E. PETAVEL.

Editor Restitution:

I enclose $2, which you will please accept in payment for the paper.

We are here alone in the Faith, and THE RESTITUTION is our only preacher, bringing us weekly glad tidings of good things to come, building us up in the Faith, and renewing our strength, enabling us to run with patience the race set before us. The Scriptural doctrine of "Jesus and the resurrection," so ably advocated and so well defended in THE RESTITUTION, is full of comfort to us. It is just one year ago today that we buried our little Minnie, a sweet child about sixteen months old, and as we lingered at her little tomb memory recalled many pieces that we had read in the paper. We love to read of the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of the resurrection of the dead, and look forward to that period of time when we will again meet the loved ones when they come from the "land of the enemy." May God help us to so live that we may again meet our darling in the kingdom where parting will be no more.

We love to read of the glories of the kingdom age so vividly portrayed in the columns of THE RESTITUTION, of that era of peace when Christ our King shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment; when the moon shall be confounded and the sun ashamed; when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously.

We believe, and hope that the advent is an event of the near future, when all those glories that we have so long looked for, and so often read in prophecy and song, shall be realized, and this earth will be again purified, and be the future home of the redeemed of the Lord.

MAN'S EDEN HOME.

Those who consider evil to be inseparable from, or inherent in matter, thoughtlessly ignore the benediction which God pronounced upon it, when he expressed his judgment of the new creation. They judge of matter from what they now see of it, under the curse; but God judged of it from what he saw of it when it existed in its created perfection. And his judgment, mentioned in the Scriptures, surely, must take precedence of that of those who believe in the old Manichean error that "matter is the seat of remediless infirmity and contamination."

"And the Lord planted a garden"—the "garden of the Lord,"—"eastward, in Eden." As its name signifies, it was a "delightsome land," and was afterwards called "Paradise;" and "there he put the man," "to dress it and to keep it." Says Bonar, "It was a land, the like of which has not since been seen on earth: fairer and richer than that which flowed with milk and honey—a land of rivers and streams, a land of sunshine and gladness, a land of flowers and gems, a land of the myrtle and the olive and the palm and vine, a land which was the glory of all lands, which has left its name behind it to all ages, as a name of fruitfulness, and fragrance, and beauty."

To this country seat of the newly created monarch, in token of the Sovereignty which God had conferred on him, he brought unto him "every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air," "to see what he would call them:" Man being created in knowledge after the image of God, as well as in holiness, his knowledge was intuitive; he saw at once the natures of the several creatures, and knew what names were appropriate to them, "And whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof." "And Adam gave names to all cattle, and to the fowl of the air, and to every beast of the field."

Thus man was made only "a little lower than the angels," and "crowned with glory and honor." Said the Psalmist, (viii. 6-9.) "Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; Thou hast put all things under his feet: all sheep and oxen, yea and the beasts of the field, the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas. O Lord our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth."

John Bunyan has piquantly remarked that "None ever saw this world as it was in its first creation but Adam and his wife." We may be unable to have adequate conceptions of its pristine beauty, glory, and magnificence. We may be unable to picture the loveliness in which it rejoiced, when it received its Maker's blessing, and was set as a gem surrounded with heavenly glory; but we cannot, in imagination, over-estimate the excellency of its praise-worthiness.

Very little is said of Adam's heritage in the Scriptures: but we know that there was no sickness nor sorrow there. Heat and tears were unknown. There was no pestilential breezes, nor poisonous miasmas. The air was sweet and pure. The sky was serene, and undarkened by clouds. No storms nor black tempests swept across the plains. It was one perpetual spring, without any chilling winds, or scorching heat to take from man's enjoyment. The earth was spread out with inequalities of valley, mountain and plain, and was covered with green verdure. There were no desert wastes, nor impenetrable morasses; no burning mountains, nor snow-capped summits, nor shakings of the solid earth; but everything was good and beautiful. There "was every tree that is pleasant to the sight and good for food." There were "cedars in the garden of God," "fir trees," and "the chestnut trees"—"all the trees of Eden that were in the garden of God." (Ezek. xxxi. 8, 9. The air was fragrant with the perfume of flowers; and the eye was charmed with their beauty, as they adorned every valley and hill-side. Rivers and streams, coursing through the valley or across the plains, or meandering among the hills, added to the beauty of the landscape. And the sea itself, also pronounced by the Creator "good," was spread forth, in illimitable vastness, beautiful in its "transparent depths of unpolluted blue." Nor was there any discord in "the music of the spheres." Each tribe of living creatures dwelt in peace with every other tribe, and each one in peace with with all of his individual kind. The lion and the lamb, the cow and bear, fellowshiped each other. The vulture and the dove, the hawk and sparrow, had no animosity, knew no fear, feasted on the same fruits, and perched lovingly together on the same branches. Wolves, panthers, tigers, and every animal that is now wild and ferocious, were then tame and gentle. They all came to Adam to receive their names, mingled with the horse and ox, grazed on the same meads, and kids and lambkins sported with them on the verdant plains. The sky above, was the pathway, and the trees around were the resting-places of birds of beauty and of song,—all free from "vanity," and no creature subject to pain or death. And at the head of all these, was man—in all his created innocence, in all his manly beauty:

"Adam, the noblest born of all his sons:
The noblest of all her daughters, Eve!"— knowing no disquietude, and experiencing no fatigue; having fellowship with angels, and enjoying converse with Jehovah.

Thus was the earth adapted to man as a habitation; and man was adapted to the earth as its Ruler and Viceregent.

The Cabinet.

The gate of salvation is called the strait gate, and is not called so without cause. It is always strait, narrow, and difficult to pass through to some persons, and it will be so as long as the world stands. It is narrow to all who love sin and are determined not to part with it. It is narrow to all who set their affections on this world, and seek first its pleasures and rewards. It is narrow to all who dislike trouble, and are unwilling to take pains and make sacrifices for their souls. It is narrow to all who like company and to keep in with the crowd. It is narrow to those who are self-righteous, and think they are good people and deserve to be saved. To these the great gate which Christ made is narrow and strait. In vain they seek to pass through. The gate will not admit them. God is not unwilling to receive them. Their sins are not too many to be forgiven. But they are not willing to be saved in God's way. Thousands have tried to make the gateway wider. Thousands have worked and toiled to enter the kingdom on lower terms. But the gate never alters. It is not elastic. It will not stretch to accommodate one man more than another. Reader, strait as this gate is, it is the only one by which men can enter the kingdom.—J. C. Ryle.

Obituary.

DIED—At West Plum River, Ill., Sep. 8, 1883, Ransom House, aged 72 yrs, 1 mo., 25 days.

Brother House was born in Berkshire Co., Mass., in 1804, was married to Laura Williams Sept. 6, 1825, and moved to Jo Daviess Co., Ill., in 1846, residing here till his death.

He embraced the faith of Christ's second coming, and resurrection from the dead thirty-five years ago, and has led a consistent and Christian life, being not only a hearer of the word but a doer also.

Brother House was the father of 12 children, five of whom are living. He leaves an aged wife to mourn his loss, but not without hope. Words of comfort, based upon the promises made to God's children, were spoken by the writer, to a large and attentive congregation.

M. M. MITCHELL.

DIED—At Priestfield Road, Edinburgh, Scotland, Aug. 22, 1883, Jane Eliza Naismith, wife of James Cameron, and eldest daughter of William Naismith, of Glasgow, formerly of Hamilton, Scotland.

Deceased was a native of America, born at Bridgeport, Con., 1836, whither her parents had removed for a few years shortly after their marriage. At an early period her father became enlightened in the great truths concerning the kingdom of God, and immortality only through Christ, and went to Glasgow in 1848 to hear the late Dr. John Thomas. She was thus taught these truths from her childhood, and was sustained in her last illness by the faith and hope of the gospel—"looking for that blessed hope," the appearing of her Lord.

She was confined to bed in extreme weakness for nearly five months, and felt soothed by the fact of her Savior's sympathy expressed in such lines as these, recited by her the Sunday before her death—

Though now ascended up on high,
He bends on earth a brother's eye
Partaker of the human name,
He knows the frailty of our frame.

A BIRD'S MINISTRY.

MARGARET J. PRESTON.

From his home in an Eastern bungalow,
In sight of the everlasting snow

Thus wrote my friend:—
"I had traveled far
From the Afghan towers of Candahar,
Through the sand-white plains of Binde-Sagar;

"And once, when the daily march was o'er,
As tired I sat in my tented door,
Hope failed me, as never it failed before.

"In sweltering city, at wayside fane,
By the Indus' bank, on the scorching plain,
I had taught,—and my teaching all seemed vain.

"'No glimmer of light (I sighed) appears;
The Moslem's Fate and the Buddhist's fears
Have gloomed their worship this thousand years.

"'For Christ and his truth I stand alone
In the midst of millions: a sand-grain blown
Against yon temple of ancient stone.

"'As soon may level Hi' Faith forsook
My soul, as I turned on the pile to look;
Then rising, my saddened way I took

"To its lofty roof, for the cooler air;
I gazed, and marveled:—how crumbled were
The walls I had deemed so firm and fair!

"For, wedged in a rift of the massive stone,
Most grimly rent by its roots alone,
A beautiful peepul tree had grown:

"Whose gradual stress would still expand
Yon structure, and topple upon the sand
The temple, while o'er its wreck should stand

"The tree in its living verdure!—Who Could compass the thoughts—The bird that flew Hitherward, dropping a seed that grew;

"Did more to shiver this ancient wall
Than earthquake,—war,—simoom,—or all
The centuries, in their force and fall?

"Then I knelt by the riven granite there,
And my soul shook off its weight of care,
And my voice rose clear on the tropic air:—

"'The living seeds I have dropped remain
In the cleft; Lord, quicken with dew and rain,
Then temple and mosque shall be rent in twain!'"

Communications.

RECONCILIATION.

"To wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation. Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God." 2 Cor. v. 19, 20.

Even in social and political matters, reconciliation is a deeply interesting word. How many dark and bloody feuds and tragedies might have been avoided by timely reconciliation! How many long, expensive, and desolating wars between states and nations might have been prevented had white-robed reconciliation stepped between and peacefully disarmed the angry disputants, before they came to blows! It would weary the mind to estimate all the blood that has been spilt, and all the treasure that has been spent in personal and national quarrels from the time of Cain till now.

But it is in religious matters that reconciliation reaches its highest value. It is an indispensible item in the plan of redemption.

The common Version seems to indicate that Paul exhorts believers to be "reconciled to God." But this difficulty is removed by leaving out the italicised you's, which are put in italics to show that they are not in the original. The clause is more accurately rendered by the American Bible Union, —"as though God were beseeching by us; on behalf of Christ we pray: Be reconciled to God." Paul is here describing the manner in which he and other Apostles addressed sinners in the general ministry among the nations. And the gospel is "the word of reconciliation." This reconciliation or at-one-ment must mean the removal of the bar that separates God from sinners. His righteousness interposed that bar, and His mercy provided for its removal. So infinitely above us is the holiness and glory of God, that when Messiah, invested with a portion of that glory, shall be enthroned on Zion, even the Seraphims who themselves are burning ones, holy and princely, shall stand in his presence they will humbly veil their faces and cry "Holy, holy, holy," that is, superlatively holy, "is the Lord of hosts!" Isa. vi. 2 with Jno. xii. 41.

But although "the high and lofty one that inhabiteth eternity," is so far above sinful men, yet the first step towards restoring peace between us was on God's side. Enmity began with man, reconciliation began with God. "We love him because he first loved us." 1 Jno. iv. 19. "God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." Rom. v. 8. "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life!" Jno. iii. 16. He "spared not his only Son but delivered him up for us all." Rom. viii. 32. If he had not loved sinners and desired their return he would never have given that dear Son to die for them.

Among men it is not usual for the offended party to be the first in seeking reconciliation; and perhaps this is why some are so slow to comprehend and submit to the plan of reconciliation which the gospel reveals. This plan shows clearly that God, the offended one, has made the first step, and that it is man, not God, who now needs to be reconciled, and to lay aside his enmity against God.

I cannot think that the Heavenly Father ever hated humanity except in a legal sense. A judge is not supposed to cherish any personal hatred against the culprit brought before him, for that culprit may even be a son whom he tenderly loves. And such a judge rejoices if any way is found by which his son can be legally released, and all the claims of justice fully satisfied. Now, it is "in Christ" that the Heavenly Father has found a way of reconciliation by which we may be released, and at the same time the claims of justice be fully satisfied—"that he might be just and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus." Rom. iii. 26. Glorious discovery! What a stream of light and joy comes pouring in through that wide-open door that offers release and salvation to imprisoned and guilty man! And the pass-word that bears us triumphantly through that open door is "Believe in Jesus." Every one who has passed those portals of reconciliation on such terms, may exclaim with rapture, It is God that justifieth, who is he that condemneth?"

But let us be sure that we understand the terms, and comply with them. In order to become justified we must believe in Jesus. And this does not mean simply believing that such a personage exists, for I believe that the pope of Rome exists, but yet I do not believe in that pope,—I don't accept his teachings as my rule of faith, for that would make me a papist. I believe that such a character as Mohammed once existed on earth, but I do not believe in Mohammed,—I do not believe what he preached, for then I would be a Mohammedan. Believing in Jesus means believing what Jesus preached, what is, "The gospel of the kingdom." Read Mat. iv. 23: ix. 35; Mark i. 14: Lu. iv. 42: viii. 1.

The gospel does not consist merely in the death, burial, and the resurrection, for after the apostles had been a year or two preaching "the gospel," the master one day said to them: "Behold, we go up to Jerusalem," and all things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of man shall be accomplished. For he shall be delivered unto the Gentiles, and shall be mocked, and spitefully entreated, and spitted on; and they shall scourge him, and put him to death: and the third day he shall rise again." And what was their reply to this? did they say, Yes, Lord, we are well aware that you are to die, and be buried, and rise again; we have been going about preaching these very truths?" No, they said no such thing. On the contrary, it is testified that "they understood none of these things: and this saying was hid from them, neither knew they the things which were spoken." (Compare Luke ix. 6, with xviii. 31-34). And do you not remember how slow these gospel preachers were to believe in his resurrection even after it had become an accomplished fact? How that when holy women told them of it "their words seemed to them as idle tales, and they believed them not?" And how that one of them said, "Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe"? Luke xxiv. 11; John xx. 22. Since his death, burial, and resurrection, however, these three great facts constitute an essential part, though not the whole of it. Pity that A. Campbell, of Bethany, Va., making such great claims to fairness of interpretation, did not acknowledge, in his public teaching, this plain and logical truth. Pity, too, that his followers, to this day, (by perverting 1 Cor. xv. 1–4), are deluding some into the notion that the death, burial and resurrection, constitute the gospel. From the version which Campbell himself published in 1832, it is abundantly evident that Paul did not preach these "three facts alone but included them "among" other primary truths. Instead of "I delivered unto you first of all," etc., that version reads, "I delivered unto you among the first things," etc. In Ephesus Paul preached "the kingdom of God," and to say that he did not preach the same in Corinth would be a gross perversion of Scripture, for it would be trying to set Paul against himself, and to accuse him of preaching two different gospels. Acts xx. 25. To preach "the kingdom of God" is to preach the Gospel of the kingdom of God, for the Savior, who was sent to "preach the kingdom of God," fulfilled that part of his mission by preaching "the gospel of the kingdom of God." Luke iv. 43, with Mark i. 14; Matt. iv. 23. It must be remembered that the gospel, from its earliest germ in Eden (Gen. iii. 15), was a growing system of truth, gradually revealed in successive installments, until its completion by the descent of the Spirit at the day of Pentecost. From that time forth the gospel in its completed form sets before us the kingdom as the great end and aim of our desires, and the death, burial and resurrection of Christ as the means by which that end is made obtainable, on the appointed conditions. Without this sacrificial atonement we could have no hope of inheriting the kingdom and its eternal joys.

It is, therefore, our solemn duty and blessed privilege to accept the reconciliation which God has so mercifully offered, and to accept it on his terms, that is, to believe in Jesus—to believe the gospel of the kingdom—with a living faith. By such a faith I mean one which works by love and purifies the heart; for "the faith without the works is dead," a mere corpse-like form. It seems to me as unreasonable to expect salvation by a "dead" faith, as to think of being rescued from drowning by a floating corpse. Read Gal. v. 6; Acts xv. 9; James ii. 20. This assertion does not conflict with justification by faith and salvation by grace. Let me illustrate this point. It is said that when the Scotch insurgents had been some time warring against William III., he desired to prevent any further bloodshed, and offered exemption from penalty to those who would take the oath of allegiance before a certain day. But the head of one of the clans was so tardy in coming to the appointed place and taking the oath, that he was finally prevented by accident from reaching there in the time limited, and was put to death in consequence. Now, it was an act of mercy in William III. to offer that conditional pardon, and on the part of the insurgents it was faith in his promise that led them to comply with the terms. So that their political salvation was by grace and by faith, although not without conditions or works to be performed, for their chief who failed, even by accident, to perform those conditions, was slain. And so with regard to our eternal salvation; we are saved by grace and by faith, but not unless we comply with and perform the conditions of salvation. All of our performing power, however, is by the aid of divine grace, "for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure." Phil. ii. 13: A man is drowning, a feeling of mercy prompts an observer to throw him a rope, and the laying hold of the rope saved him: one man who witnesses it says, "I saw a man drowning, but he was saved by mercy." Another says, "I saw a man drowning, but he was saved by a rope." A third says, "I saw a man drowning, but he saved himself by laying hold of a rope." All spoke truly, for each of the three causes was necessary to his deliverance. This may serve to illustrate the beautiful harmony existing between grace, faith, and works, each holding its necessary place in the divine plan of reconciliation.

Notice that Paul's language does not represent him as beseeching God to be reconciled to men, but men to be reconciled to God. "Be ye reconciled to God." Where then is any room for the modern "mourners' bench," at which such prayers are made as would indicate that God is unwilling to bestow pardon on the penitent sinner? Man is not more willing to accept mercy than God is to confer it. And not only are the terms of pardon "easy," but the Heavenly Father gives us strength to comply with them. And what wonderful condescension and depths of mercy are here displayed! Is it customary for the judge to beseech a condemned criminal to accept pardon? or the creditor to beseech a ruined debtor to accept an acquittance in full? Yet our eternal Judge not only offers these blessings, but invites, entreats and beseeches us not to reject them. These considerations ought to constrain every sinner to believe "the word of reconciliation," gladly accept the terms of mercy, and be "reconciled to God."

Reconciliation to one's neighbor is sometimes put off until the dying hour, but reconciliation to God is too great a matter to be left to the uncertainties of such a season. We should endeavor not only to die at "peace with God, but also to live at peace with him, however many may be the years of our pilgrimage. Besides, we know not how soon the dying hour may come. One may think that not being on a field of battle or stormy ocean, his life is secure; but many a returned warrior and seaman has perished by some trivial accident at home. It is related that Wellington, having escaped safely through the battle of Waterloo, dismounted from his horse, but the vicious brute at that moment throwing up his heels with great force, barely missed the temples of his master; and the latter remarked that he was in more danger then than while the battle was raging. A thousand ills continually beset our path and threaten to snap the brittle and attenuated thread of life. Oh, then, be warned in time, and follow the example of the Psalmist, who says, "I thought on my ways, and turned my feet unto thy testimonies. I made haste and delayed not to keep thy commandments." Amen.

The Little Light.

The light shone dim on the headland,
For the storm was raging high,
I pitied my eyes from the inky stars,
And gazed on the wet, gray sky:
It was dark and lowering; on the sea
The waves were booming loud,
And the snow and the piercing winter sleet
Wove over all a shroud.

"God pity the men on the sea to-night!"
I said to my little one,
And we shuddered as we heard afar
The sound of the minute gun.
My good man came in, in his fishing coat,
(He was wet and cold that night),
And he said, "There'll lots of ships go down
On the headland rocks to-night."

"Let the lamp burn all night, mother,"
Cried little Mary then:
"'Tis but a little light, but still
It might save drowning men."
"Oh, nonsense!" cried her father the
Was tired and cross that night).
"The lighted light-house's enough"—
And he put out the light.

That night, on the rocks below us,
A noble ship went down,
But one was saved from the ghastly wreck,
The rest were left to drown.
"We steered by a little light," he said,
"Till we saw it sink from view;
"If they'd only a left that light all night,
My mates might be here too!"

Then little Mary raised aloud,
Her father blushed for shame,
"I saw our light that you saw," he said,
"Was a little light—how small a thing!
And trifling was its cost:
Yet for want of it a ship went down,
And a hundred souls were lost.

Shun Them.

"Young women, in treating dissipated young men as equals, do a wrong that they can scarcely realize. Such men should be made to feel that until they redeem themselves, until they walk with correctness and honor in the path of right, good people will stand aloof from them. Girls who respect themselves will not be seen with such young men, and will decline to receive them on the familiar footing of friendship. It is a mistaken kindness to politice when caustic is needed, and I think that a little sharp decision on the part of the young girls today, would go far to correct the general looseness of morality among young men."—Women's Journal.

The Drunkard's Brain.

Hyrtl, by far the greatest anatomist of the age, used to say that he could distinguish, in the darkest room, by one stroke of the scalpel, the brain of the inebriate from that of the person who had lived soberly. Now and then he would congratulate his class upon the possession of a drunkard's brain, admirably fitted from its hardness and more complete preservation for the purposes of demonstration. When the anatomist wishes to preserve a human brain for any length of time, he effects his object by keeping that object in a vessel of alcohol. From a soft, pulpy substance it then becomes comparatively hard. But the inebriate anticipating the anatomist, begins the indurating process before death—while its delicate and gossamer tissues still throb with the pulses of heaven-born life. Strange infatuation, thus to desecrate the God-like! Terrible enchantment that dries up all the fountains of generous feeling, petrifies all the tender humanities and sweet charities of life, leaving only a brain of lead and a heart of stone!

Only a Little While Ago.

Our youthful readers can scarcely form an idea of the world as their grandfathers saw it, in the days when John Quincy Adams was President.

Boys who went to boarding-school thirty miles from home had a stage ride of five or six hours to endure or to enjoy—according to the weather—for boys were apt to perch on the outside seats. In muddy seasons, the five or six hours would stretch out to ten, with a possible alleviation of a dinner at the Half-way House.

If they were homesick, or wanted a box of good things for solace, they paused before writing a letter to reflect that their "Honored Parents" would have to pay twenty-five cents postage on the epistle. Now, honored parents who paid so much for a letter expected it to contain a good deal of matter, correctly spelled, on a large and clean sheet of paper.

Envelopes were not then used, because they would have made the letters count twenty-five cents postage.

Hence, very large sheets of letter-paper were used, especially by affectionate mothers when writing to their sons at school. Often, when the tender soul had filled four immense pages with family news and good advice to "my dearest boy," she would still have something more to say, and then she would cross her writing to save an extra postage. This crossing was a sore trial to the impatient youth, who did not in those days read any writing with perfect facility.

It was high art then to fold a letter nicely. Years elapsed before a boy could tuck in the outside lap without any bulge at the ends, and make a neat, compact, well-shaped packet. Some clumsy-fingered fellows never could get the knack of it. To all such, the envelope was indeed a precious boon.

It was considered a frightful vulgarity sixty years ago to seal a letter with anything but sealing wax. This was a very awkward article in a Southern or East Indian mail-bag, as at a high temperature it melted and stuck the letters together. The operation of sealing, too, was one that baffled the school-boy and often burned his fingers. It had to be done, however, even after the post-office chiefs had given public notice of the inconvenience to which it subjected them. It was only the envelope that ended the wax nuisance.

Everything was more difficult then than now. In 1824, the daily stage for the city of Washington left New York at three in the morning, and a man went round the town at two to call up the passengers; so that when the stage came for them, it might not be kept waiting very long. If all went well, the passengers reached Washington the next morning soon after sunrise.

Those were the times when college students were fined ten dollars for going to the theatre, and it was reckoned unbecoming in a clergyman to have a copy of Shakespeare in his house.

At that remote period, before the Erie canal was finished, what was the largest inland town in the United States? It was Lancaster in Pennsylvania, with a population of something less than four thousand.—Youth's Companion.

Jerusalem.

We continue Mrs. Davis' Journal for our young readers. In this number, we reach the conclusion of what has been published in the Age-to-Come Herald. The journal is to be continued in that paper. We are expecting some communications directly from Jerusalem before long. All that comes from the land of sacred story will not only be read with pleasure by our young readers, but by all that take THE RESTITUTION.

March 3. The tourists have gone to the Jordan. It is raining, and the wind blows a gale; but they go all the same, and seem to enjoy the rain, hail and sunshine alike.

The Lord provides for me here. How wonderful are all his mercies; how great his goodness. Paul proclaims it as verified in his case. "I was a blasphemer," he says, and a persecutor and injurious. But I obtained mercy because I did it ignorantly in unbelief. And the grace of our Lord was exceeding abundant with faith and love which is in Christ Jesus."

March 4. We have got a big snow storm; about six inches fell in the night. I am feeling badly because the beautiful flowers are under the snow. The little birds come to my window entreating food, and I feed them as I would chickens. These birds are very tame, and often fly into my window and chatter to me as I am writing.

March 7. The snow has all gone, and I find my flowers are all safe and bright as ever. We have had no frost this winter as we did last.

Somehow the more I study the subject the better satisfied I am that those who come here should have one purpose. The advantages of a colony are apparent. There can be no failure. When I walk out and see the German village, so beautiful, and everything looking so prosperous, I say to myself, "If these people can do this, what might an American colony do?"

March. 12. I have had a fine opportunity to see and judge of these Jewish people. I find that while God has chosen them to be the head, they actually possess characteristics which, when the veil is removed from their heart, they will fill the place of headship. They do possess principles of integrity and a firmness of purpose that we fail to find in any other people. May God hasten the time when they shall be restored, and put in their true relation to other nations. They will indeed be a blessing to the world.

Today is as warm as a common July day in New England. Just one week ago we had a violent snow storm, and now we are having summer heat.

Strange things occur here. The people awoke the other morning to find asafœtida all about on the houses, indelibly stamped in letters about six inches long, this ominous "hand writing on the wall:" "666 Dominican." This interpreted means, "Antichrist and the number of the beast." It is not known who wrote it.

Mr. Oliphant, of England, is now in this country in the interests of Jewish colonization.

It is said by those who profess to know, that many of the inhabitants are really descendants of the crusaders. I am strongly inclined to believe it.

The Bedouins, like our North American Indians, seem to be fated to remain as they are and have been.

They do not appear to have any higher aspirations for a higher state of civilization.

We can buy six large, nice oranges now for four cents; and the producer makes a good profit at that. They are so plenty that we do not seem to care for them.

April 10. It is now nearly two years since I left Boston; but it seems only as many months. The grain is looking well, but no need rain now. It is quite hot and dry. I think the perihelia of the planets reaches, even here.

The Armenian Bishop was lately found dead in his bed. A Jewish Rabbi also died two weeks ago. He was a good man. About ninety families mourn his death. It is said that if complaint was made to him against another person he would say: "I think he must be a good man, or so much would not be said against him." He always refused to hear evil reports of anyone. The Turks mourn for him, and that is not common.

A rich German gentleman came here to see Jerusalem, was taken sick and died. He was to have been married on his return. He sent a telegram for his intended bride, but died the next day; and she is now on her way here. Still another, a Mr. Hope from London, came to visit the Holy Land and died here. He had long desired to come, and finally told his family that he had decided to make the visit. His wife and children had a premonition that he would not return, and pressed him to abandon the undertaking. But it was his fate to die here. He was a great organist. Poor man; he suffered much in thinking how terribly the blow would fall upon his beloved family. However, death here is a rare occurrence.

April 16. I have so many letters I cannot answer all. I must let some pass. I suppose the friends think I ought to answer all their questions, but it is impossible. Time hover flew so fast before.

Our Consul and his wife have just returned from Moab. She told me that I had no idea of the beauty and fertility of that country. It is a perfect paradise of forests, green fields, and flowing rivers. Mr. Merrill likes the Jordan valley so much that he is not in favor of having it filled up by cutting a canal through from the Mediterranean.

My health is good.

April 22. This is Passover Week with the Jews. This religious people, of such wonderful endurance, have not forgotten that the Lord passed over their fathers when he slew the first born of the Egyptians. He made a difference between the Egyptians and the Israelites. It was not because of their righteousness that he spared Israel; but because he had chosen for them a definite place and work, as he does everyone.

We are also having another festival of the Moslem faith. For the last six or seven days the Dervishes have been marching through the streets, accompanied by instrumental music and singing, with a great display of banners and flags. The Dervishes dance and go through all kinds of fantastic movements, which appears very strange for religious exercises. I find, however, that religious fanaticism is about the same everywhere. When men leave the truth for fables, a Christian, so called, will believe and act as intolerant as a Hindoo or Moslem! They have now gone to Nebby Moses, or the tomb of Moses, as they believe, where they remain a week to pray and judge by the great celebration that the Moslems worship Moses as a God. They pay the same homage to Abraham, or Father Abraham, as they call him.

We also have the Greek celebration of the holy fire this week, which is ridiculous, and more blasphemous, than any other celebration.

May 3. I have been sick for three days but am now quite well. I have good news to tell you. I received a letter from a man in Omaha, Nebraska, saying that he had started for the Holy City; and I was still more joyfully surprised two days after receiving this, by the actual arrival here of his wife and child.

He is a Jew (P. H. Winterstein) and one of the readers of the Age-to-Come Herald. His wife seems dear to me; and I trust our interests will be mutual, and that she will be a comfort and help in the great work upon which we are just commencing.

May. 17. Under this date Mrs. Davis says of the new-comer to Jerusalem: I like the old Jacob plank of this man, who could start for Jerusalem with an empty purse. (He had $4.00 upon his arrival there.) At this date she also said that it was getting quite dry in Palestine.

Editor Restitution:

Brother W. S. Flint, of Topeka, has notified me that he will be here Sept. 13, and hold a meeting of days in this county. There are some brethren in the eastern part of this county who may be glad to meet with us and share the good feast, and make arrangements for meetings in their parts, as Brother Finn wishes to stay in this region for some time. Therefore I say to the scattered ones, come and hear him. Meeting will commence Sept. 15, at the Schoolhouse near Bro. Huffman's, where Bro. Foore had meetings last May, and we will arrange for future meetings. All who have been wanting meetings can now have them.

BOX OF PRECIOUS OINTMENT.
John xii. 3.

To the hall of the feast came the sinful and fair;
She heard in the city that Jesus was there;
Unbidding, for splendor that blazed on the board,
She silently knelt at the feet of the Lord.

The holy on her forehead so sad and so meek
Hung dark on the blushes that burned in her cheek.

And so still and so lowly she knelt in her shame,
It seemed that her spirit had left her frame.

The frown and the murmur went round through them all,
That one so unhallowed should tread in that hall:
And some said the place would be object to more
Per the wealth of the ointment she poured on his feet.

She heard but her Savior, she spoke but in sighs,
And she dared not look up to the heaven of his eyes;

And the hot tears gushed forth with each heave of her breast,
While her lips to the sandals were throbbingly pressed.

In the sky, after tempest, as shineth the bow—
So the glance of the seat came as mirth to his brow.
He looked on that lost one, her sins are forgiven,
And Mary went forth in the beauty of heaven.

PERPETUITY OF THE EARTH.

Whatever new convulsions or disasters are yet to befall this planet, we are assured that they will not be as destructive even as Noah's flood; for God covenanted then, and said: "I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake, neither will I again smite any more every living thing, as I have done," (Gen. viii. 21–22.) It is specifically promised that "the meek shall inherit the earth," and that "the righteous shall dwell in it for ever." (Matt. v. 5; Ps. xxxvii. 9, 11, 29, 34; Is. lx. 21; Rom. iv. 13.) And if the righteous are to inhabit it for ever, it must exist for ever. The kingdom of which Daniel prophesied is to be an everlasting kingdom, which shall stand for ever. This kingdom is located under the whole heaven, and takes in among its subjects "peoples, nations, and languages," and has its seat upon the earth. (Dan. ii. 44; vii. 14–27.)

But if the earth is to have an indestructible kingdom, it must itself be indestructible. John describes the sovereignty of this world as finally assumed by the Lord, even Christ, who is to hold and exercise it to the ages of the ages. (Rev. xi. 15.) But how can Christ reign for ever in a world which is presently to cease to be? God has specifically and repeatedly covenanted and promised a certain portion of the earth to a certain people for an "everlasting possession" (Gen. xlviii.), in which they are to "dwell, even they, and their children, and their children's children, for ever" (Ezek. xxxvii. 25), and not cease from being a nation before him for ever (Jer. xxxi. 36). How can this be fulfilled if the earth is to be annihilated?

A peculiar consecration rests upon the earth which makes it revolting to think of its being handed over to oblivion. The footsteps of the Son of God upon its soil, the breathing of its atmosphere by his lungs, the saturation of its mould with his sweat, and tears, and blood, the wearing of its dust upon his sacred person, the warming of its fluids in his arteries, ought to be enough to satisfy us that neither the Devil nor destruction shall ever possess it. It is the place where God's only begotten Son was born and reared, and where he taught, and slept, and suffered, and died. It is the territory on which Divine love and mercy have poured out the costliest sacrifice the universe has ever known. It is the chosen theatre of the most momentous deeds that ever attracted the adoring interests of angels. It has furnished the death-place, the grave, the scene of the bruising and the triumph of Jesus Christ. And how can it ever be delivered over to everlasting nothingness? Perish what may, a world so consecrated can never be blotted out, or cease to be one of the most cherished orbs in God's great creation.

I.—OVERLIVE THE SCENE OF THAT WORLD.

"Heaven new"—not destroyed but; not morph into nothingness, but retouched, changed, elevated, cleansed, and brightened up from all its old disorders and imperfections. The heaven over us now is very charming and beneficent. How beautiful and blessed the never-ceasing procession of suns, and moons, and stars, and clouds, and seasons, and days, and nights, and showers, interminglod as they are with heat and cold, storm and calm, gloom and brightness! This old garment of things is still full of rejoicing, and glory, and scenes and thoughts to touch, inspire, and lift, and discipline, and make glad the heart. What, then, will that new investment be, to which it is to give place? We cannot describe the meteorology of the new heaven; but it will be a heaven which no more rebels itself in angry tempests and menacing blackness; nor ever flashes with the thunderbolts of wrath; nor casts forth plagues of hail; nor rains down fiery judgment; nor gives lurking-places to the Devil and his angels; nor is disfigured with dread portents; nor is subject to commotions breeding terror and disaster to the dwellers under them.

We often look at the blue sky that arches over us, as the rosy morning's welcome to the king of the day, at the high noon's flood of brightness, at the mellow glories of the setting sun, at solemn midnight lit all over with its twinkling star-gems, and we are thrilled with the perfection and beauty of Jehovah's works. What, then, shall it be when the great Architect, set to do honor to the love and faithfulness of his only begotten Son, shall put forth his hand upon it the second time, to renew it in a fresh and eternal splendor!

The earth is now full of ailments and disorders, and in deep captivity to corruption, yet it has much attractiveness. Most men would prefer to stay in it for ever, if they could. Ah, this homestead of our fathers for so many generations, carpeted with green, and flowers, waving with pleasant harvests and shady trees, girded with glorious mountains, gushing with waterysprings, gladdened with laughing brooks, ribboned with rivers that wind in beauty about the rocky promontories, varied with endless hills and valleys; and girded about with the crystal girdle of the rolling seas,—these numerous zones, and continents, and islands,—these youthful spring-times bursting out with myriad life under all their dewy steps,—these blazing summer glories,—these gorgeous mellow autumns,—these winters, with their snowy vestments and glazed streams, and glowing fire-sides,—and living nature in its ten thousand forms, singing and dancing, and shouting, and frisking, and rejoicing all around us,—what pictures and memories, and histories, and legends, and experiences have we here, to warm our hearts, and stir our souls, and make our tongues, and put fire and enthusiasm into our thoughts, and words, and deeds!

But this is only the old earth in its soiled and work-day garb, where the miseries of a deep, dark, and universal apostasy from God holds sway. Think, then, what earth's regeneration must bring! an earth which no longer smarts and smokes under the curse of sin,—an earth which needs no more to be torn with hooks and irons to make it yield its fruits,—an earth where thorns and thistles no longer invest the ground, nor serpents hiss among the flowers, nor savage beasts lay in ambush to devour,—an earth whose sod is never cut with graves, whose soil is never moistened with tears, or saturated with human blood, whose fields are never blasted with unpropitious seasons, whose atmosphere never gives wings to the seeds of plague and death, whose ways are never lined with funeral processions, or blocked up with armed men on their way to war,—an earth whose hills ever flow with salvation, and whose valleys know only the sweetness of Jehovah's smiles,—an earth from end to end, and from centre to utmost verge, clothed with the eternal blessedness of Paradise restored! the New Jerusalem.

A new city. Occasion will offer to consider this when we come to the special vision of it in the after portions of the chapter; but it here presents itself as the crown of the regenerated world. It is called by the old Hebrew name of Jerusalem "Jerusalem" and not by the Greekanized name of the earthly city "Jerusalem." If the heaven, the earth, and the sea be literal, then certainly must this also be a literal city. The harlot Woman was finally developed and embodied in a literal city, and it is to the Lamb with the true woman. It is the Bride, the Lamb's Wife, who appears in this new city for eternal blessedness; as the old adulteress appeared in the new Babylon for everlasting destruction. That was man's glory proudly lifting itself in defiance of heaven; this, is the Lamb's glory, graciously descending in benediction to the earth. That was the consummation of this world's progress, and finished this is the consummation of the achievements of divine grace, and its memorial for ever.

It is a new city, one which never appeared before, one of which all other cities are but the poor preadumbrations, darkness as compared with which all present cities will sink out of mind and memory. It is new in its materials, in its size, in its location, in its style, in its permanence, in its moral purity, and in everything characteristic of it. It is heaven-built; jewelled in its foundations, walls and streets; perfected in everything that is charming and beautiful, "as a bride adorned for her husband," lighting the nations with its brilliancy, itself ever luminous with the glory of God and the Lamb; the true "Eternal City;"—the imperishable palace of the immortal kings of the ages.

II.—OBSERVE THE BLESSEDNESS OF THAT WORLD.

There is a long list of negatives, telling the life from which it brings relief.

Every tear is wiped away. He who dries them off is God himself. Human hands are poor at drying tears. If they succeed in removing one set, others come which they cannot wipe away. Earthly power, however good and kind, cannot go far in the binding up of broken hearts. Only the hand that made the spirit can reach the deep sources of its sorrows, or dry up the streams that issue from them. The springs of grief yield to no other potency. But then his loving Almightiness shall wipe every tear. "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you, and ye shall be comforted," saith the Lord. "Every tear," for they be many—tears of misfortune and poverty, such as Job and Lazarus wept; tears of bereaved affection, such as Mary and Martha, and the widow of Nain shed; tears of sympathy and mercy, such as Jeremiah and Jesus wept over the sins and calamities of Jerusalem; tears of persecuted innocence; tears of contrition and penitence for faults and crimes against the goodness and majesty of Heaven; tears of disappointment and neglect; tears of yearning for what cannot now be ours;—these, and whatever others ever course the cheeks of mortals, shall then be dried forever.

Oh, his reign of death! Whom has it not touched? What circle has it not invaded? What home has it never entered?

"The watch-dog's bark, however watches responded,
Nor one dead family is there.
There is no fireside, howsoe or defended,
But death one vacant chair."

Around our churches lie our graveyards, and all the highways are lined with cemeteries and depositories of the dead. We can scarcely open our eyes without seeing the gloomy hearse, the funeral procession, the undertaker's warehouse, the shop full of mourning goods, or the stone-cutter chiselling epitaphs. Every newspaper we pick up has its obituary lists, and every week brings forth its bills of mortality. On the right hand, on the left hand, before us, behind us, around us, beneath us, in all seasons, in all climes, everywhere, is death. We ourselves are only waiting, not knowing what day or hour we shall fall beneath its stroke. Physicians are sent forth by hundreds and thousands every year from our colleges and universities, and myriads of hands are ever busy collecting and preparing medicines for the sick; and yet there is no check, no restraint, to the career and reign of death! But, at length, and an end to his fell dominion comes. The time will be when death itself shall die, not by the power of man, not by mortal skill or earthly medicines, but by the great redemption of God. When the sunlight of the new genesis dawns upon this stricken world, the grand thanksgiving shall ring out over every zone, from the equator, to the poles, that "Death is swallowed up in victory." Never another dying bed shall then be seen again. Never another grave shall then be dug. For "Death shall no longer be."

Thousandfold are the heartaches and the griefs which now blast and torment the children of men. Choose what path of life we will, we cannot escape them. They follow us like our shadow. Bright as the lives of some may seem, each heart knoweth its own bitterness. Martyrs suffer where no faggots or flames are visible. But there is a boundary line over which no sorrows ever pass—the line which divides between the new earth and this. There, hearts no longer bleed in secret; there, the cold shadows never again fall on sensitive souls; there, the killing frosts no more settle on the springing plants or blooming flowers of human peace. Christ drank the cup of sorrow for our world, and it will then be found empty.

Sore complaining is the commonest sound on earth. It is often without just cause; but there is no stoicism from which it is never wrung. Man comes into the world with a cry, and goes out of it with a groan, and all between is more or less intoned with hopeless wailing. The cry of pain and passion; the cry of fear and strife; the cry of wrong and oppression; the cry of wish, and harm, and danger; the cry of torn affection and blasted hopes; the cry of weariness and disability; the cry of suffering and of death; the cry of a thousand unnamed distresses—how it vibrates on every breeze in every land! But the Hallelujahs of the renewed world will drown out the voice of woe for ever.

Neither shall pain any more be. Oh, the racking torments to which these mortal bodies are exposed! Oh, the ills and aches, and sharp distresses, which come upon us through these earthly tenements! But they shall come no more when the new world comes. There are all blessed exemptions, but there is greater good.

Life is there,—life that is life,—life in its highest fullness and noblest activities and associations,—eternal life,—for all who tread the soil and breathe the air of that new world. "The water of life" flows there, free and plenteous for each and all. What that water is, is more than we can tell; but it is a water of freshness, purity, and refreshing—a water that slakes all thirst—a water that revives against all symptoms of age or decay. Though years heap on years, centuries on centuries, and cycles on cycles, never shall they dry up the moisture of immortal youth and beauty which those blessed waters give. They are the life-waters which gladden eternity, and which make eternally glad.

A soul-satisfying worship is there. The children of men there join in sublime fellowship with heaven; for it is "on earth as it is in heaven." The tabernacle of God with Deity visible and approachable, as when Adam talked with his Maker as a friend and companion, shall be there, with its living oracles of unveiled truth; and assemblies of the sons of God into which Satan can no more insinuate his foul presence, or introduce a doubt, or jar, or imperfection in the flow of unsullied adoration. And with it all is the possession of God himself. Jehovah is the highest good, the sum of all good. Union and intercommunion with him, the possession of him is the crown of human blessedness and glory. To have God with us as our God, to know him, and see him, and enjoy him as our own, is the very height and coronal of all human attainment and possession—the focal point of all the promises—the fruition of the sublimest hopes. In this, eternal life reaches its acme and fullest bloom. In this, man reaches the superlative of glory; for in it he inherits all things. Such then, and so transcendent, is the blessedness of the new world, never more to end.

III.—THE OCCUPANTS AND POSSESSORS OF THAT WORLD.

Not the "cowardly," who shrink from the conflict with sin, ashamed or afraid to avow and maintain their faith in God and his Christ. Not the "unbelieving," who set at nought the testimonies of their Maker, scorn to trust for salvation in the merits of a crucified Savior and will not have Christ to rule over them. Not the "polluted," who basely degrade themselves with their uncleanness, bestiality and abominations. Not the "murderers," whether such by outward act or inward malice. Not "fornicators," whether of the body or the cherished lust of the soul. Not "sorcerers," practitioners in the black arts, conjurers, necromancers, and seekers and exorcisers of powers such as God has forbidden. Not "idolators," whether in the form of pagan worship, or the giving of the heart to covetousness, selfishness, Mammon, or what is not God. Nor any false ones, who make, or love, or act lies. For—"The cowardly, and unbelieving, and polluted, and murderers, and fornicators, and sorcerers, and idolators, and all the false, their part (shall inherit) in the lake burning with fire and brimstone, which is the second death." Not one of all such characters ever comes into the new heaven and earth.

The Church of the first-born—the holy people of God from Abel to the last martyr under the Antichrist. Jehovah has had a people in every age—a people called out from the world, marked with holy signs, pervaded with a holy spirit—a people signalized as pilgrims and strangers on the earth ever seeking for a firmly founded and continuing city whose maker and builder is God. Such were the patriarchs of the early ages, who saw the promises, and embraced them, and lived on earth as citizens of another and heavenly country. Such were the prophets who prophesied beforehand of the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow, and searched out and inquired into those blessed things which the angels also desired to look into. Such were those in the first centuries of the Church who held fast the name of Jesus, and denied not their faith in him, even amid the roaring flames, and when the blood of his confessors flowed like water. Such were those who sighed and cried through the gloom of the Middle Ages, like souls under the altar, and those who afterwards shook the torch of Jehovah's truth afresh, to light the modern nations into life. And such are those in every land, of every tongue, of every age, who show by their lives and testimony that they seek a city yet to come.

All these are there, not in flesh and blood, not returned to any earthly corporeal life, but in resurrection transfiguration, made like to the angels, like to their Redeemer now in glory, and having their home-place and palace in the golden city for which they looked, and wrought, and waited, and suffered when on earth. These are there, as occupants of the new heavens, the dwellers in the new city, the sublime and heavenly kings and priests of the eternal nations and generations.—Dr. Seiss in Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman.

RETURNING TO PALESTINE.

HAIFA, July 30.—Next to Jerusalem, the city most highly venerated by the Jews in Palestine is Safed. I had occasion to visit it a few weeks ago on my way to a colony of Russian and Roumanian Jews which had been established in the neighborhood. Perched on the summit of a mountain nearly 3,000 feet high, is one of the most picturesquely situated towns in the country; and there is a tradition to the effect that it was alluded to by Christ as "the city that is set on a hill cannot be hid," when he preached the sermon on the Mount.

The whole of this district is indeed full of romantic scenery. It is a country of vast gorges and huge precipices, which escape the attention of the traveler, following the beaten routes; and to most of them associations are attached, investing them with an interest beyond that of a mere scenic character. There is, for instance, the Wady Hammam, where the bluffs are about 1,200 feet high, perforated with caves, communicating with each other by passages concealed in the rock, once the abode of robbers who lived like eagles in their eyries. Looking up at these holes in the cliff some seven or eight hundred feet above me; I tried to picture the terrible battle which was once fought in mid-air between the denizens of these cave and the soldiers whom Herod let down the face of the cliff in baskets to attack them. The desperate nature of the struggle as the soldiers strove to make good their foothold on the edge of the caves and the frenzy with which the robbers, who had no loophole of escape, must have defended themselves as they endeavored to hurl their assailants from their baskets, suggested a scene which was quite in keeping with the gloomy character of the surroundings. Some of the more accessible of these caves have been occupied at a later period by hermits, and they may have been utilized for military purposes at the time of the crusades, but they have never been thoroughly explored.

Just before reaching Safed there is a rock called Akkbera, which rises 500 feet sheer up from the path, and is also full of similar caves. Josephus mentions having fortified it. However prepossessing Safed may look from a distance, it does not bear a close acquaintance. Down the centre of every street runs an open sewer, which renders it the most odoriferous and pestiferous place that it has ever been my fate to sleep in. The aspect of the population is in keeping with the general smell. One seems transported into the ghetto of some Roumanian or Russian town, with a few Eastern disagreeables added. The population here have not adopted the Oriental costume as they have at Tiberias, but wear the high hats, greasy garbardines, and oar curls of Europe. Instead of Arabic one hears nothing in the streets but "jargon," as the dialect used by the Jews in eastern Europe is called. The total population of Ashkenazim, or German Jews, who are hived in this unenviable locality, is between five and six thousand; besides this there are about 1,200 Sephardim, or Spanish Jews, who wear Oriental costumes, and in the other quarter of the town from six to seven thousand Moslems, making the total number of inhabitants about 14,000.

As there is nothing approaching to a hotel or boarding house in the place, one is of course dependent on the native hospitality for board and lodging, and is thus able to acquire an insight into the mode of life of rather a curious section of the human family. The majority of the Jews here are supported by a charitable fund called the Haluka, which is subscribed to by pious Jews all over the world as a sacred duty, for the purpose of providing support to those of their coreligionists who come here or to Jerusalem to pass the last years of their lives in devotional exercises and to die on the sacred soil. The practical result of this system is to maintain in idleness and mendicancy a set of useless bigots, who combine superstitious observance with immoral practice, and who, as a rule, are opposed to every project which has for its object the real progress of the Jewish nation. Hence they regard with alarm the establishment of agricultural colonies, or the inauguration of an era of any kind of labor by Jews in Palestine. They are bitterly hostil to schools in which any secular teaching is carried on, and agree with those Western Jews who consider that any scheme for developing the material resources of Palestine by means of Jewish industry is fantastic and visionary. It is due to the Jewish population of Safed to say that this spirit does not prevail among the younger members of it. There are about a hundred young Safed Jews who actually work as day laborers on the farms of Moslems and Christians, and I was informed by one of the most liberal of the rabbis, the only one in fact who was inclined to promote Jewish agriculture, that about two hundred families in Safed were desirous of being established on farms, while several had owned land and cultivated it, and only abandoned it at last for want of protection against the extortionate demands of Turkish tax gatherers. It is true that most of the Jews of Safed are under the protection of some European power, but until lately no power has taken sufficient interest in the race to raise a Jewish question with the Turkish government. Now that important political interests are to be subserved by doing so, and the destiny of Palestine is likely to become a crucial point in the Eastern question, both Russia and France are serving every excuse for interference and complaint, and the questions which are constantly arising in regard to their Jewish protegé both in Tiberias and Safed, are likely to furnish them with the pretexts they desire.

When I was in Safed, Russia was actively espousing the cause of a young Jew who had accidently shot a Moslem, and over whom the Turkish Government claimed jurisdiction, on the ground that, though a Russian, he had repudiated his allegiance to Russia. As the youth was not of age at the time, the Russian Government still claimed the right to protect him in Turkey, though it had not exercised this right in Russia itself, from which country he had been compelled to flee for his life. As I rode through the village where the accident had taken place, in company with some Jews, we were pelted by the Moslem population, and although the release of the boy is now certain, he will probably be compelled to leave the country, unless the relatives of the deceased Moslem can be pacified with the blood money that has been offered them.

CIRCULAR.

To the Students of Prophecy throughout the World:

The undersigned proposes to issue from the press, either in Chicago or in New York City, as circumstances may decide, the following works, to-wit:

"I. The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. In the first division the nature of the Coming Age is fully discussed, as to its physical and moral character: 1. That the earth itself has a crowning age, in which it shall be perfectly adapted to be the residence of man in his highest type; 2. That man, in that resurrection state, will be under the endless reign of the Personal Messiah; 3. In establishing the proximity of that age, the prophecies of Ezekiel, Isaiah, Daniel, Zechariah, Christ, Paul, Peter, and the Apocalypse, are critically examined, relative to its rapid approach.

II. The second work will be devoted to the investigation of the various phases of the Eastern Question:—1. The Egyptian phase, 2. The British phase, 3. The Russian phase, 4. The Ottoman phase, 5. The Hebrew phase, 6. The American phase, 7. Lesser phases of the Eastern Question, 8. The location of each of the Great Powers in the coming contest, 9. All nations marshal under the banners of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. These powers are traced in history to the present time. All the great national issues are fully investigated.

If all that are interested in these great and most sublime topics will aid, they will be issued immediately. They will be printed and bound in a form that will do credit to the vastness of the subjects, and put to subscribers at prices quite reasonable. The books will contain about 500 large royal 8vo. pages each.

Selections.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.--Second Series, Number 20.

JEZREEL.

On approaching the little village which occupies the site of the ancient city of Jezreel, I rode through a modern cemetery, which lies upon and neglected on the hill-side. There I saw a troop of dogs burrowing into a new-made grave, while two huge vultures were perched on a cliff not a hundred yards distant. The place seemed deserted; there was none to "fray them away." Did it not look like an illustration of the prophetic curse and the historic narrative given in the Bible? "In the portion of Jezreel shall dogs eat the flesh of Jezebel." 2 Kings ix. 10, compare 1 Kings xxi. 23. That was not the only place in Palestine where I saw dogs and vultures holding a horrid carnival among the tombs.

There is not a vestige of royalty in Jezreel now. A few miserable houses clustered around a shattered tower are all that mark the site and bear the name of the capital of Ahab. With the exception of a large sarcophagus and some caves hewn in the soft limestone of the hill, there are no traces of antiquity. The city is literally ruined. Its very ruins have disappeared. Its vineyards, too, are all gone, and the slopes immediately around the village are bare and barren as a desert. The blood shed, and the crimes committed there, would seem to have brought a double curse upon Jezreel. Looking on that scene of desolation, in the center of one of the finest plains in the world, I thought of the murder of poor Naboth, that of Jezebel, and of the infamous Jezebel, that of the whole royal family. 1 Kings xxi.; 2 Kings ix., x.

I looked at the site for a third one, worthy of a royal city. It is a little hill at the western extremity of the Gilboa range. The green plain to which it gives a name sweeps boldly all round its base. Standing on the top of the knoll, I saw the whole panorama of Esdraelon, from the Jordan valley below Beth-shan away to the dark ridge of Carmel, and from the mountains of Samaria on the south to the wooded heights of Galilee on the north. I there read with new interest the graphic narrative of the ninth chapter of 2 Kings. It was from these eastern mountains, from Ramoth in Gilead, Jehu came up that vale the watchman on Jezreel's tower saw the horsemen and chariots charging, and he called out, "The driving is like the driving of Jehu the son of Nimshi; for he driveth furiously." Joram went out to meet him in his chariot, and Ahaziah accompanied him in his chariot. They drove down the steep descent to the valley. There they met Jehu, and there Joram was slain, and his body thrown into the vineyard of Naboth. Ahaziah turned and fled southward along "the road to Engannim" (incorrectly translated in our version "by the way of the garden house," ver. 27). But he too was fatally wounded, and they took him across the plain to Megiddo, and there he died.

BATTLE-FIELD OF MEGIDDO.

It was noon when I left Jezreel. The sun was blazing in the center of a cloudless sky. The plain, usually so silent and desolate, was all astir with the flocks and herds of Bedawin, who had crossed the Jordan two days previously, like locusts for multitude, and like locusts for destruction. I found one of the petty sheikhs at Jezreel, and engaged him to ride with me to Carmel, to prevent annoyance and perhaps danger, for his tribe were not of good repute. He was a fine specimen of the Ishmaelite--wild, free, and generous. He was finely mounted, too, and quite willing to show off by word and act the matchless perfections of his mare. He asked me of my country, especially of what he called the "fire-ships" and "fire-horses," of which somebody had given him an account, though he had evidently not believed a single word of it. After I had described as well as I could the construction, and power, and speed, of steamboat and locomotive, he came close up, and laying his hand on my arm, and looking with eagle glance into my face, he said, in a deep, impetuous voice, "In beg! by the life of the prophet, are you laughing at my beard, or is it truth you tell?" Of course I assured him I was stating simple facts. He shook his head and turned away, half perplexed, half disappointed. He rode on in advance for nearly ten minutes without saying a word; then turning he related with perfect gravity a story of his uncle, who had ridden on the back of a Jann from Bagdad to India and back again in a single night. There was a great deal of quiet irony in this. I didn't believe a word of his story, and he didn't believe a word of mine.

A sharp ride of an hour and a quarter brought us to the village of Taanuk, the representative of the old city of Taanach. It stands near the northern base of the mountains of Samaria. Beside it is an isolated hill covered with ruins.

We were now approaching the field on which Barak gained his famous victory--"The kings came and fought, then fought the kings of Canaan in Taanach by the waters of Megiddo." Judges v. 19. We rode across the plain, through luxuriant corn fields and verdant meadows, and in less than an hour were on the site of Megiddo. The old city has almost disappeared, and its name has long since been forgotten. It is now called Lejjun, a corruption of the Roman Legio, which took the place of the Jewish Megiddo. The ruins of a large mediæval castle, and two or three miles in a wady near it, some columns, and rubbish heaps, and building stones along the banks of a little stream--such are the only vestiges of the royal city of the Canaanites. They lie in a quiet nook at the foot of the hills, on the border of Esdraelon. A short distance north is a large tell or hill, isolated; it was probably the site of a fortress or citadel. The stream flows past it and falls into the Kishon two miles northward. There are unquestionably the waters of Megiddo, beside which the battle was fought.

Rising to the summit of the tell, the battle-field was before me. Taanach was visible, and the intervening plain was spread out like a map. The details of the battle were now intelligible. It would seem that Sisera had marshalled his army, with his nine hundred chariots of iron, on the south bank of the Kishon, between Taanach and Megiddo, with the purpose probably of invading the territory of the southern tribes (Judges iv. 13). But news arrived that the northern tribes had assembled on Tabor. Sisera turned to meet them--he was drawn into battle as Deborah had predicted (ver. 7). Deborah gave the signal; Barak charged down the mountain side. Probably the repulse of the van took place between Tabor and Rudor, Ps. lxxxiii. 10. "At that critical moment, as Josephus tells us, before the Canaanites had time to rally, a tremendous storm of rain, hail, and thunder from the east burst upon the battle-field and fell in the face of the foe. Horses, men, chariots, were driven back in full confusion. They fought from heaven, the stars in their courses fought against Sisera." Judges v. 20. "The plain became a marsh; the Kishon rose rapidly; its alluvial banks were converted into a quagmire. The river Kishon swept them away; that ancient river, the river Kishon" (verse 21).

In the spring of 1858 I saw the low parts of Esdraelon particularly hard and dry, turned into a dangerous morass by a few hours' heavy rain; and the Kishon was swollen to such an extent as to render it altogether impassable at the ordinary fords.

Six centuries later another battle was fought on the plain of Megiddo. And then, instead of a song of triumph a death-wail re-echoed through the mountains of Israel.

Pharaoh-necho, marching against Assyria, passed along the plains of Palestine. King Josiah rashly attempted to oppose his progress. The Egyptian monarch gave him a friendly warning: "What have I to do with thee, thou king of Judah? I come not against thee this day, but against the house wherewith I have war; for God commanded me to make haste. Forbear thee from meddling with God, who is with me, that he destroy thee not." 2 Chron. xxxv. 21. The warning was unheeded. Josiah posted his troops at Megiddo, so as to attack the Egyptians when defiling through the pass from Sharon. But the archers of the enemy, perhaps from some hill-side or rock, gave Josiah a fatal wound, and that decided the battle. The king was carried away from Jerusalem to die; and the whole land mourned robitterly for the good king that the mourning became a proverb, to which Zechariah thus alludes: "In that day there shall be a great mourning, as the mourning of Hadad-rimmon, in the valley of Megiddon." Zech. xii. 11.

It may be that this great plain of Megiddo, this great battle-field of Israel and of Palestine, was before the mind of the apostle John in Patmos when he figuratively described the conflict between the powers of good and evil, who were gathered "to a place called in the Hebrew tongue, Armageddon," that is, "the city of Megiddo." Rev. xvi. 16.

From Megiddo I rode westward along the south bank of the Kishon, passing the adorable site of Jokneam, then along the base of Carmel to Haifa, then up the steep path to the convent, which I reached at length, weary and way-worn, after one of the longest and hardest rides I ever had in Syria.--*S. LATTER DAY WARNINGS.

We give our readers this week the two following thrilling descriptions of the great earthquakes that have occurred recently--one in Ischia, in the Bay of Naples, Italy, and the other in the East Indian Islands, Java and Sumatra. Our Savior's prophetic warnings assure us that just such terrestrial perturbations will attend the close of Gentile times. He says: "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring." Luke xxi. 24, 25. In a preceding verse he says: "And great earthquakes shall be in divers places." The evidence that Gentile times are on the very eve of expiring is of the most conclusive character. The last oppressor is fast losing his power of treading down Jerusalem. The Israelitish fig-tree is fast coming into leaf, and the exiled nation is gathering back to the loved Fatherland. The world's great prophetic empires have run their predestined course, and our existing generation is the last one within the limits of the seven mystic times. So then we, ourselves, are living in the very period of this world's history where the frightful events, in fulfillment of our Redeemer's words, are to transpire. They are coming with startling rapidity, and the end is not yet. Alas! there are but the beginning of sorrows in the great tribulation. Unprecedented calamities are in the future. We shall try to keep our readers posted on the "signs of the times." The pieces below are a thrilling commentary on our Savior's predictions.

AN EARTHQUAKE NIGHT.

A Boston woman who escaped as if by miracle from the earthquake at Casamicciola writes the following account to her friends in this city. For personal reasons the name of her husband is changed to John. Her letter bears date of August 12, and the earthquake was on the evening of July 28. Parts of the epistle are as follows:

It is more than a week since I wrote my last letter, which has, without doubt, filled you with sad apprehensions; and I feel that I ought not to leave you longer without news of me. Still, I hardly feel able to write, for I feel stupefied by this dreadful event. I have hardly the courage to revive in my mind its horrors by repeating them. I doubt if I ever shall be able to make you understand how terrible it was until I have seen you, and perhaps not then, for an earthquake is one of the things that baffle description.

We had been in Casamicciola six days, arriving there on Monday, and on Saturday evening, the 28th of July, at 9:30 o'clock, was the catastrophe. On Saturday morning when I awoke I did not feel quite well. I had a nervous headache. The weather was beautiful--so beautiful that every one remarked it. The air was clear and transparent, and so pure that all Ischia seemed changed into music. Many times that morning I went to the balcony and looked around on that lovely scene, and wished you could see this place. My head continued to ache, and after breakfast at 12 o'clock I had to give up and go to bed. I remained there till 3 o'clock. Then I got up, but did not dress myself, saying I did not feel able to go to dinner. It was this indisposition of mine which saved our lives. John, who was suffering with the toothache, was glad enough to join me in our little parlor that looked out over the beautiful valley toward the mountains. We dined at 6:30 o'clock. Then I walked up and down the piazza in front of our windows, John reading his papers. Everybody was in the dining-room, dining. The dinner was at 7:30 o'clock. There was to be music in the parlors, and everybody was gay and gayly dressed. When the first sounds of music came up I felt lonely, and wished that I had gone down, notwithstanding my headache. If I had, I should not be writing you this sad story for all that gay company were killed.

When the night came on John called me to come in, fearing the evening air. It was then almost 9 o'clock. Until 11 I felt ill. If I should go to bed. He begged me not to go so early, saying the night would be so long and tedious. He said he would play a few games of chess with me. We accordingly sat down on the sofa in front of the chimney, taking the board on our knees, and began our game. We played through the half-hour that brought us to the terrible moment, little thinking that death was so near to us, reaching out with his terrible arms toward us, and preparing to fold us his cold embrace almost everybody about us. I can never tell you what followed.

It commenced like the most terrible thunder. Then everything swayed backward and forward, as if swayed by a giant's hand. Falls fell in with a crash like ten thousand thunders. The mountains opened, sending forth flames of fire, rolling down with the tumbling houses toward the valley, while the valley in its turn exploded, sending everything into chaos. Not one house was left standing. In the midst of this dreadful noise, wild shrieks, then came darkness and the silence of the grave. The noise lasted only a few seconds, and the silence a few more, which seemed an eternity. Then the smoke began to clear away, and the terrible cries of the wounded and dying filled the air as if truly coming from the bowels of the earth. Oh, how little this gives you an idea of what passed. When the sound first began John knew what it was, and said, "Great God! an earthquake!" With one bound we reached the window-way, it being considered the safest place, which proved true. Had we remained sitting we should have been instantly killed. A falling wall enveloped the sofa where we sat. The whole world seemed dissolving around me. I had no hope of life from the first sound, and I turned my thoughts heavenward. It was not till I heard the dreadful cries of the wounded and dying that I trembled with fear, thinking of the suffering which my poor body might endure before I should reach the other side. But I did not lose courage, and prayed for strength to help me through. Heaven did not grant my prayer.

After the shock John said: "We will try and save ourselves out of this ruin before the second one shall come." (There are always three shocks in an earthquake.) The darkness was still so great that we could not see whether the floor had been carried away, or whether the wall where we were standing alone remained. We must find a light. John remembered that there were matches on a little table near, and by feeling with his feet, he took a few steps into the room and found them, lighted one, and with its flickering light we looked about us. The parlor where we had been was nearly destroyed. The bedroom was still standing, although torn and separated into a thousand pieces. The floor was apparently good. We entered cautiously, took a shawl for me, and a coat for him, and a package of candles to give us the light necessary for finding our way out of this destruction. We went out by the window where we had stood on to the piazza, which was also partially destroyed.

This piazza was on the second story, with a flight of stairs on each end leading to the piazza below. We turned to the left, being a little nearer that way, but soon found our way cut off. All was in ruin, and from that ruin came a voice calling to us in English, "Save me; I am dying." It was an American girl, a Miss Van Allen, who was there for treatment of the rheumatism. I had to answer her back over that terrible gulf, "We cannot reach you now." She died. We turned back, passing our windows, then on to the other end of the piazza. There also was ruin, only a portion of the stairs remaining standing, and that portion ready to fall. But it was our only way out. We passed, how, I cannot tell. Hanging on to the broken fragments, and clinging to each other, we at last reached the floor below, where we found, after much difficulty, the door leading to the road. Feeling that here we should be safe, we hurried on, climbing over mountains of stones, and arrived at last outside the door, where the space was just large enough for a small carriage to turn around in. We could go no further. The narrow little road leading around the mountain side to a small opening called Calvary had been carried away, with all the houses on the side of the mountain higher up, down into the valley below.

In the darkness, lighted only by the feeble light of the candle, we could see nothing but a dark gulf filled with fallen houses, trees and rocks, out of which came cries that broke one's heart. On the other side of this space where we were was a high wall, twenty feet from the road, filled all full of great openings. Behind us was the angle of the hotel, which remained standing. On the fourth side the road had opened wide, and to the bottom of this opening no one had courage to look, for it looked like a great grave--ours, perhaps. After a little time five others found their way to this place. Half naked, wounded and suffering they came, but without murmuring, only too thankful for this comparative safety. Cold and trembling we huddled together, embracing each other who were strangers only an hour before, and silently praying. We remained like this till nearly 2 o'clock--five long hours. Then the angle of the hotel took fire, and our position became again very dangerous. John said we must make an effort to get across the space that divided us from the little opening called Calvary, of which I had already spoken, feeling sure that where we were death awaited us. We decided to make the effort. So we left this place, where we had hoped to remain till daylight should aid us to find our way out. The wounded ones had no alternative but to remain. We started, followed by two ladies and a merchant, who carried a candle. Climbing, slipping, falling, clinging, grasping at stones that did not hold, but went rolling into the darkness below, at times buried in the soft earth nearly to our middles, we struggled for life for half an hour. We arrived at last at this Calvary; Calvary indeed! What a scene, lighted by a great fire made by the fallen trees, and doors of ruined houses--their houses! Almost stunned, though wounds and feeling were chilled, children, broken, bruised and bleeding! Oh, it is not possible to describe it! One only of the many scenes would break one's heart to see. I almost wished for a second or one that would absorb my mind and prevent my mental agony. But it was without a scratch.

But one terrible incident must still be told. Calvary to relate, because I should try to tell you all I saw heart-rending. I should never finish. There was a handsome young man, about 24 or 25 years of age, a peasant, who, when he heard the shock, got his little 8-months-old baby in his arms, and with his young wife tried to escape from the falling house. Buried in the debris, but still protecting his baby, he struggled on, leading his wife. At last she fell. A great stone rolled over and buried her. He struggled on, and faint, bruised and bleeding, he reached the place called Calvary holding in his arms his baby, which, but crying pitifully. During the long hours of that fearful night he tried to console and hush it, crying not thinking once of himself or his bleeding wounds. When I saw him at 3 o'clock, he sat by the great fire with it in his arms, swaying backward and forward, singing softly--a singing which was by far sadder than any crying. The baby's dear little face and white night-gown were all bathed in blood that flowed from its father's wounds. Worn out at last the little one slept. He parted it, without a word, into the hands of a poor woman whose husband and seven children had, in that dreadful moment, passed from this world to the other, and whose tearless eyes alone showed the intensity of her agony. The poor young man could not yet feel his bodily pains, but threw himself on the ground, crying, "My wife, my poor wife!"

In the midst of this sad group, also, seated on the ground, we awaited daylight. Slowly it came, as if it was afraid to open the window of light on such a dreadful day. We were still a long way from the sea, and had to cross all the ruined town, but by this way alone could we leave the place. With misgivings we left and began the descent. What we went through during this painful march to the sea it is impossible to relate--over mountains of stone, over fallen walls, the way strewn with the wounded, dying and dead. We were four when we left Calvary. The other two were left behind--about half way. I have not heard from them since, and they are probably dead. Arriving at the wharf, we took the first boat leaving. It was then 6 o'clock in the morning, and we reached Naples at 8:30 o'clock.--Boston Advertiser.

JAVA AND SUMATRA.

The scene of the recent appalling phenomena are two considerable islands under the government of Holland, and situated in the Indian Ocean, to the south of China, Burmah, Annam, and Siam. They are separated from each other by a very narrow piece of water called the Strait of Sunda. On Saturday, August 25 last, more than a third of the forty-five craters of Java broke out into active eruption.

Just before dusk a great luminous cloud formed over Gunung Gentur, and the crater of that volcano began to emit enormous streams of white lava, which were rapidly succeeded by explosions, followed by tremendous showers of cinders and enormous fragments of rock, which were hurled high in the air and scattered in all directions, carrying death and destruction with them. With these terrible eruptions came sympathetic demonstrations from the sea. Overhanging clouds were so surcharged with electricity that at one time more than fifteen huge waterspouts were seen. Men, women, and children rushed in terror from their tottering dwelling-places, filling the air with shrieks of horror. Hundreds were unable to get out before the houses fell, and were buried beneath masses of rocks and mud.

On Sunday evening the shocks and eruptions increased in violence, and Java seemed threatened with submersion. At the same time enormous waves began to dash with greater force upon the shores, coming in some places far up into the interior, and great chasms opened in the earth, threatening to engulf the people and buildings. About midnight the most frightful scenes of all took place. Suddenly an enormous luminous cloud, similar to that over Gunung Gentur, but much greater in extent, formed over the Kandang range of mountains, which skirt the southeast coast of the island. This cloud gradually increased in size, until it formed a canopy, lurid red and whitish gray over a wide extent of territory. During this time the eruptions increased, and streams of lava poured incessantly down the sides of the mountains into the valleys, sweeping everything before them.

About two o'clock on Monday morning an enormous tract of land disappeared, covering about fifty square miles. Here were situated the villages of Nygery and Negery Habuwang. None of the inhabitants of these places escaped death. This section of the island was less densely populated than the other portions, and the loss of life was comparatively small, although it must have aggregated 15,000. The entire Kandang range of mountains, extending along the coast in a semicircle for about 60 miles, had gone out of sight.

On Monday night the volcano of Papandayang was in an active state of paroxysmal eruption. A whirlwind accompanied this eruption, by which house-roofs, trees, men, and horses, were carried into the air. The quantity of ashes ejected was such as to cover the ground and the roofs of the houses to the depth of several inches.

Suddenly the scene changed. The mountain was split into seven parts without a moment's warning, and where Papandayang had stood alone were now seven distinct peaks, in the opened seams of which could be seen great balls of molten matter. From the fissures poured forth clouds of steam and black ejected lava, which, flowing in steady streams, ran slowly down the mountain sides, forming beds two or three hundred feet in extent. One of the most singular incidents was the sudden rising on the foreroon of Tuesday of fourteen new volcanic mountains in the Strait of Sunda, forming a complete chain in almost a direct line between Point St. Nicholas on the Java coast, and Hoga Point on the coast of Sumatra, almost on the tops of what had been Merak and Middle Islands, which sank into the sea on the previous day. At the entrance to Batavia was a large group of houses extending along the shore, and occupied by Chinamen. This portion of the city was entirely destroyed, and of 25,000 Chinese who lived on the swampy plains, 20,000 are supposed to have perished. They stuck to their homes till the waves came and washed them away, fearing torrents of flame and lava more than torrents of water.

Of the 3,500 Europeans and Americans in Batavia, 800 perished at Anjer. The European and American quarter was overwhelmed by rocks, mud and lava from the crater, and then the waters came up and swallowed the ruins, leaving nothing to mark the site, and causing a loss of about 200 lives of the inhabitants and those who took refuge there. Bantam was entirely covered by water, and 200 to 1,000 are believed to have been drowned. The island of Serang was completely inundated, and not a soul survived. At Cheribon the loss of life and property by falling rocks and lava was considerable. Bitzinzong suffered seriously, as did Samarang, Jogjaketta, Sourakerta, and Sourabaya.

The thousand temples at Brambanan were greatly damaged, and some of them destroyed. The dome of the noted temple of Borobodo was crushed in by the falling rocks. The town of Tamerang was swept away by lava, and fully half the population, mostly Javanese, numbering about 1,800, perished. At Speuwyk red hot rocks set fire to the houses, and swept away all the thickly settled portions of the town.

In Batavia the roof of the Governor's house was washed in by a mass of mud, and three servants were killed. Midah Island, ten miles off on the coast of Java, was almost wholly engulfed. From all over the island come reports of loss of life and property, and it is thought that by this volcanic convulsion probably more than fifty thousand people have perished.

The entire region is singularly destitute of evangelistic agency and Christian enterprise. Since the opening of China to the foreigner, to which we have referred in our life of Dr. Muhurst, the only work for Christ, so far as we have been able to discover, which has been done in Malaysia has been under the auspices of the Dutch Baptists, the Netherlands and Rhenish Missionary Societies, and by the colportage agency of the British and Foreign Bible Society. There is an immense field for work among the populous islands of the Archipelago, with about 20,000,000 people, as well as on the contiguous mainland.

Referring to the disastrous phenomena described above, a contemporary not particularly distinguished by its predilection for the literal interpretation of the prophetic Scriptures is constrained, somewhat reluctantly, we imagine, to pen the following statement: "It may be easily imagined that not a few of the many thousands who have perished, together with not a few of the witnesses who have survived, must have thought that 'the last day' of the world had come. If John Foster could write of the fire which consumed the altar and all it contained on Carmel, as 'a precursory sparkle and beam, and specimen of that fire to which, one day, the globe shall be a sacrifice in contempt of all its oceans,' we need not be surprised if those who have spoken of our times as immediately preceding the period of the great tribulation should find 'precursory' signs in the terrible events now transpiring."--London Christian Herald.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Oct. 3, 1883.

We are compelled to let some communications go over to future numbers.

Our friends who wish to visit Chicago on business, or otherwise, will notice that the last opportunity of going at cheap rates will occur next week. See advertisement.

BITTER feeling against France is reported to have been caused throughout Spain in consequence of insults recently offered to King Alphonso on a late visit to Paris.

NOTWITHSTANDING the unfavorable weather our meeting in Huntington County, near Brother Guffin's, was quite well attended. From every indication, all our brethren and sisters present seemed to enjoy the privilege of Christian association, and the presentation of our themes secured good attention on the part of the audience.

THE Western Rural and American Stockman for Sept. 22, is received. We have had but little time to look over its pages, but it requires but little time to ascertain that it is an excellent paper. The Editor has the peculiar qualification of giving that pleasing and instructive variety so essential to make any journal interesting and profitable to its readers. It has one valuable feature, in addition to several others, which is—it exposes frauds and swindles, such as lotteries, and much of the life insurance management. Price $1.65 a year. Address 165 & 167 Dearborn St. Chicago.

THE Phrenological Journal for October contains a likeness and life sketch of Montgomery Blair—True Basis for the Statutes of Mind—so illustrated article on the St. Gothard Railway—a likeness of the late Captain Matthew Webb, and a brief account of his fatal attempt to swim Niagara Rapids, and numerous other articles of instructive interest. ## ES IST GESCHEHET.

This is preceded is the meaning of the Addee German expression if we rightly apprehend its signification. It will be noticed that these words are at the close of the following article which we clip from The Independent of Sept. 27, in which the kind proffer is made to "Restitution and Second Advent Friends" of a supposable explanation of the fulfillment of some prophecies contained in Ezekiel and Jeremiah. We thankfully accept the proffer, though evidently made with feelings of playful doubtfulness on the part of the generous donor. The prophecies are on the inspired page, and their literal fulfillment is certain, whether fulfilled in this supposable manner, or in some other way. For ourself we most assuredly believe in the restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. The waters of the Dead Sea will be healed, and desert lands will become "like the garden of Eden." May God hasten onward the "Restitution Age."

THE PROFFER.

There is a proposition before the British public for a canal between the Mediterranean and the Dead Sea, following the great depression of the Jordan Valley. There is no great prospect that it will ever be made; but the sudden and hot objections against it, poured out in letters to The Times, The Guardian, and other papers, show that the idea that a canal may have locks has not occurred to the objectors. If it did to the projectors. They complain that the waters of the ocean, once let in, would cover to a depth of hundreds of feet the whole valley of the Jordan, obliterating forever not only the river itself, but effacing every sacred site along its course from Tiberias, Capernaum and Bethsaida to Jericho, with the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. That would be a very serious thing; and no wonder that they petition the British Government not to give the loan of forty million dollars at three and a half per cent., which the secretary of the "Jordan Valley Canal Company" has asked for. But there is another side to this. What if it should turn out that there is a prophecy of the Jordan Valley Canal Company in the Bible? Indeed the Rev. W. J. Stracey, of Buston Vicarage, Norwich, has discovered one; and, remembering "that no prophecy of Scripture is of any private interpretation," but concerns all nations, he thinks the canal will be made. For read the forty-seventh chapter of Ezekiel, and see what it means, bearing in mind that Jerusalem stands 2,400 feet above the Mediterranean, and the Dead Sea 1,300 feet below the same level. Were the canal to let the waters of the Mediterranean into the Jordan Valley they would flow far up the Kedron Valley toward Jerusalem, first "to the ankles," to one coming down from Jerusalem, as did Ezekiel and the angel in vision, then "to the knees," then "to the loins," then, "waters to swim in, waters that could not be passed over." And be it further observed that Ezekiel (vss. 8–10) says that the waters shall flow in such abundance into the Dead Sea that its deadly waters shall be healed, and fish shall live there, "as the fish of the Great Sea," that is, the Mediterranean. Certainly that would be the result, though Mr. Stracey does not explain some difficulties, such as the representations of the prophecy that the waters were to flow out from under the threshold of the rebuilt temple at Jerusalem. But such little difficulties as that we have noticed never trouble a determined expounder of prophecy. They who are on the lookout for the fulfillment of prophecy will always find prophecies to fulfil. And does not Zechariah (xiv. 8) tell us that there shall be water communication from Jerusalem with both the Mediterranean and the Dead Sea, never failing, "in summer and winter," alike? The fulfillment of prophecy is more important than any sentiment about the preservation of sites. Let us have a canal without locks, and we make a present of this interpretation of prophecy to our Restitution and Second Advent friends.—Es ist geschehet.

ISRAEL'S COMING GLORY.

What a lack and what a gap in all our prophetic conceptions, and consultations, if the coming glory of Israel be wanting! In our morning readings it is refreshing to read God's memory of the land where comfort and beauty are to come in the latter days—and are not these the latter days? Have they not begun? Oh, yes! Blessed be the land and the people that God hath blessed!

"And when I read how wide and great this grace shall be—when I read that these bones are the whole house of Israel"—when I meditate upon the resurrection and restoration in its plying largeness of love, I think? So then his mercy endureth forever, and teacheth out and down to the last and dead of Abraham's race; and I can believe and rejoice (with trembling) that Christ is the Savior of the world."

Yes, in his times he shall show "wonders." In that resurrection are the pyramidal five, to-wit: of bones, and sinews, flesh and skin, and breath. Is not the pyramid resurrectional, in that it speaks with that mouth most eloquent, of the well, which shows the coming again from the dead of our most powerful and mighty Lord? And so all Israel shall be saved—as it is written, "There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob."

Read God's address to the mountains in Ezekiel. Majestic Speaker and majestic speech, and noble audience, because of Divine power, of wondrous history and grand intention. O mountains, your Gracious Maker will redeem you, yes, you, and all your fraternity of hills and valleys, and rivers, and desolate wastes, and forsaken cities. Thrill, O mountains, through all your dimly deeps, for the Lord hath spoken. In high quarters, at headquarters, a seal according to knowledge, and according to power, and according to pity, is nascent and incandescent, that is, is born and burning, for you, O mountains, and rivers, waters and pinnacles of Israel's old commonwealth. God speaks. What saith he? Ignorance shall not rule you. The posterity of Esau shall not oppress you. And what light is this I see? The Lord lifteth up his hand to swear. Be thou attention, company, attention, O congregation. The power now dominant must be abased; that is declaration initial and introductory. You mountains shall have your fertility restored and developed, that is point second. And it shall be for Israel, God's Israel, and they are ready for you and you for them, in the great, grand, pregnant, electric hive; that is note third. And you, mountains and hills shall be filled, and fruitful, and the people shall multiply, and the solitudes be populous and social, and the old wrecks and wastes, the ruins and desolations, shall be rebuilt, and the fields shall have the sweet ornament of grazing herds; and the children of promise, after long roving and roaming, shall be settled, yes, settled—settled as in ancient times when the wheat was white and plump, and the vineyards were fat with clusters of imperial grapes—and—yes—God will do and deal better with you than in the beginning—not only as well, but better. That is good and comforting and generous, and like the foreseeing and farseeing God, like him who looks ahead, like him who has a plan of such grandeur that we who have such small eyes and such small sight, know nothing so wisely and well, perhaps, as to know how little we know, or at least have known. I have said, here at home, speaking reverently—"You see, God is so long-headed, he has such a tremendous long look ahead, and his plan will be always unfolding, and many a one thinks he sees pretty near all there is, but that is a mistake."

Now, you mountains, you were made not only to be looked at and loved for your grace and stateliness, but made to be walked upon, and men shall walk upon you, and possess you, and you shall not devour people, and simply loom up as monuments and memorials of human folly. No, that is past. You—you—O land of story, shall be a land of glory! Thou land of grief shall be a land of gladness! Sing, clap your hands, O mountains. Take a timbrel and sing a psalm, O land once battered and blasted, but now to burst into bloom, and to laugh in sunshine, and teem with abundance. Sweet shall be thy peace, and deep. Blessed will be the balm of thy recovery. Call all this note fourth.

Now we see the special specification, bar and barrier against mistake. See, I say, see! The Lord's Israel cometh from all countries—not from Babylon only—for that is in the time-long ago. Not from Assyria or Egypt, but from all abroad. This is our guard against the unscholarly and unreasonable idea that this prophecy has got itself accomplished in other ages. Ah, it is future, it is nigh to come. And thou, Carmel, shall be an organ-pipe; and thou, Hermon, and Tabor, and Gilead, Ephraim, each of you, a harp, a flute, or any instrument of pure and curious mechanism to sound the praise of God. Out of all countries the dispersed come. And this is note fifth.

And yet again! You, Israel—you, lost but loved; lost but saved, lost but restored, shall have one thing unutterably precious and blessed done to you, and done for you. You shall have a new heart given you. You shall have heaven wrought in you, as well as wrought around you. You shall have that sweet wonder of a new heart. That is a mechanism of indestimable worth. How easy will obedience be then! Life will be a joy, because love and truth have twin dominion in the most interior and ground-springs of the will. God will do it, and therefore it will be well done. No rain ever fell finer than that down-pour of power, the Jinee rain of regeneration, whereby all old and mournful naughtinesses shall be washed away. But God is able. There are untold wonders in his hand, and his hand is the executive of his heart. Why should I not rejoice with you, O my brother Israel? And now with your new heart, with your new spirit, a new disposition, new affections, with a soul as loyal to your wonder-working God, as the needle is loyal to the north, you will be reminiscent. You will have a regret as profound as your memory is faithful of your old wrong thinking, and wrong walking, and wrong living. Yes, you will remember and be sorry. This will be the speech of your new heart. This will be your new and true self—so regretful of old derelictions that by your very memories you will be taught. Yes, by your experiences you will be wise. By your lessons of suffering you will be learned. And now with your new, renovated mind, you will live to remember your Savior, and love your affluent, restorative, kindly-thinking Father, and wonderfully loving. Is not all this great note sixth?

And all this miraculous resurrection and transformation will be for the Lord's own glory—for the very reason that the eternity of his own self, and the unsullied honor of his name, synonym of himself, is really the sole cause and ground of all bliss and being, its guaranty and constitutive force and energy. For his glory's sake all abroad, for the heathen's sake who see this miracle, and who shall be blessed by it and on account of it—these things shall be done. The heathen shall know the Lord through you, O Israel—first by the church immortal, the Lord's bride, and then through thee, thou saved seed of Jacob—saved and wondered at. Through the bride elect the world shall know that Jesus was Messiah, and through Israel restored shall the world shall learn, and glory go like sunshine into the remotest land. This is a duplicate—the glory of God and the salvation of the heathen—and may be seven and eight together.

And last of all in this princely chapter comes prayer—comes inquiry—for he shall be inquired of to do these great things.

And now in conclusion and review, is it not apparent that Israel raised from the dead hath a part in this wonderfulness? First there is a remnant, then all Israel, for so readeth first Romans ix., and then Romans xi. And, though I say it kindly, not all with me therein so agreeing, yet I say it with humble hoping and believing, more besides Israel may live. Elect and pure, single and eminent, is the bride, partner with her great chief. By the skill and power of God, by grand transactions, wonderfully cometh forth this queen. This dispensation past, with its possibility of queenship (so to speak) with Jesus lost, shuts out forever from its pure imperial light and height a great multitude. This dispensation hath its condemnations and rejections—its aionial cutting off. It has its language and it utters it; its condemnation and it pronounces it; its rejection and it executes it. But is there no hope for any hereafter? Is there no resurrection to a lesser blessing? Is there no voice going forth from a new aion? Is mercy clean gone forever? Is Christ's wonderful work no more fruitful when ten thousand millions are still lying lifeless? Doth pity no more bestir herself? Hath salvation no more trophies? Doth not the Lamb of God take away the sin of the world? Will not Christ draw all men unto him? And who shall say what God in coming ages will show of Ophir—opulent riches of grace? When an aion hath done its work, its aionial work, the work appropriate to it, and hath no more it can do, then we await the coming and work of its successor. So God's plan is a plan of the ages, and he himself is God of ages, aeonial God, Lord of revolving cycles as he is also of revolving worlds and constellations.

Conference Report.

The annual meeting at Winchester, Va., took place according to the announcement in THE RESTITUTION, at "The House of the Brethren," which was the scene of more than usual stir during the week commencing Sept. 9th. On Saturday the brethren arrived from all quarters. We had representatives from the distant cities of Brooklyn, N. Y., Philadelphia, Pa., Baltimore, Md., Frederick City, Md., and from the less remote places such as Paw Paw, Md., Mt. Zion, Md., High View, Va., Powell's Ford, Va., Brownstown, Va., Capon Roads, Va., Forks of Capon, Va., etc.

On Saturday evening the meeting was called to order, Samuel Wilson in the chair, and letters were read from the Churches at Brooklyn, Philadelphia, and from [illegible], Dexter, Dallas Co., Iowa. The chief object of business brought before the meeting was the formation of some plan for mutual aid in the spread of the gospel. Several speakers took part in the discussion which was animated, but which soon discovered the fact that a spirit of wide Christian liberality pervaded the assembly. After thorough discussion the matter was referred to a committee to organize some definite plan and the result of their deliberations was that we as individuals form ourselves into an association to be called an "Association for the promotion of Christian Knowledge," the object of which is the dissemination of general Christian knowledge, and in particular the doctrine of conditional immortality, and the coming and kingdom of Jesus the Christ. The association will be supported by quarterly contributions of members. Any person may be a member on payment of 25 cts. quarterly; no one, however, being limited to the amount of subscription, but each gives as he or she nominates to the treasurer. The funds will be committed to the care of five officers of the association to be disbursed as they shall judge most expedient.

The officers will consist of President, Vice President, Secretary, Asst. Secretary and Treasurer, three of whom will form a quorum for the transaction of business. Geo. W. Young, President; John Donaldson Jr., Secretary; Samuel Wilson, Treasurer; N. J. Morgan, Vice President; and J. F. Gellettly, Asst. Secretary were appointed. Meetings of the association will be held annually at such time and place as the officers of the association will direct.

The above being read by the secretary and discussed by various speakers, was carried unanimously and a list of nearly $30 was subscribed on the spot to form the nucleus of a fund for the propagation of the gospel by voice, press, or other means, as the wisdom of the trustees, in the providence of God may direct; and it was the earnest desire of the meeting that the matter be taken up by all sympathizers with the cause, as embodied in the platform. I trust the subject will be presented at a future time by our worthy treasurer, Samuel Wilson. Attention may be called to the fact that this is not a "church organization," but an individual matter, and unto whosoever the cause is dear it is even to him that we appeal for support. For further information on this subject address S. Wilson, 2018, N. 21st St., Philadelphia.

The Sunday meetings were well attended, more especially the night meeting, at which the hall was filled, and the interest shown throughout was of the deepest. S. Wilson spoke in the morning, J. B. Keim in the afternoon, and J. F. Gellettly in the evening, after which the Lord's Supper was partaken and songs of praise and thanksgiving were sung, and the heart-stirring enthusiasm that was then shown will long be remembered by those who witnessed it, and we might say that the people heard us gladly, aye more than gladly.

During the week the meetings were kept up by S. Wilson and J. B. Keim and the interest was unabated until the close on the following Sunday. It may be stated that the meeting was a success in every respect that was desired by those who took part. It encouraged and strengthened many who needed refreshing; it knit the bond of Christian fraternity closer; it opened the minds and widened the religious views of some, and it was the means of proclaiming the gospel with as clear a ring, and as energetic a blast as has been given in these parts for some time. Letters were subsequently read from Mrs. H. V. Reed and from Dr. W. Way of Washington, and some numbers of THE RESTITUTION were received and distributed. Toward the close a resolution was carried to the effect that the secretary be instructed to furnish a synopsis of the meeting to THE RESTITUTION, and furthermore that the paper aforesaid is recommended to seekers after religious truth.

Brother Simonds' Questions Answered.

As Brother Simonds wrote of my articles as well as they deserve, and asks a few questions; if the editor please, I will briefly answer. But

1. A few words as to population. I know there can be no exactness here, but only approximation. Herbert W. Morris, A. M., D. D., in his "Work Days of God," p. 682, makes the race living and dead in 1875, 36 octrillions, 627 trillions, 813 billions, 275 millions, of human beings. Now add to this one born every minute, as calculated to be the case, for the remaining years to the millenium and during that time and we would have over 36 octrillions, 627 trillions, 813 billions, 339 millions, 125 thousand and two hundred of the race! That would crowd Ohio even at his feet square to the being, but that is too small a space. My calculations were based upon the "Fair Chance," the resurrection of the race. So that, even literally, without hyperbole, like John used about the world: not containing the books about Jesus' words and works, if all should be raised, and at one time, they would be several stories high. Brother Simonds should have seen that this was to reduce the "Fair Chance" to an absurdity.

2 The resurrection of Cor xv. only brings up to immortal life and reign with Jesus all the righteous dead at that time, and those made righteous by their relation to him. The proposition "in" or "by" was used; but no sinners or unjust are to be raised then, nor for a thousand years after.

3. The mixed resurrection, both just and unjust, takes place at the end of that reign. Just persons shall die during "the ages" as well as sinners. So these just and all sinners who have not already received their final doom, will be raised at that time. There are Scriptural proofs in abundance here, but I am not defending my positions, but suggesting the main questions of Brother Simonds, and so make no citations.

May grace, mercy and peace, as well as unity of faith, abide with all the holy brethren in Christ Jesus.

"A STUDENT OF PROPHECY."

Thinking that I might influence some of your readers in things pertaining to the kingdom of God, I thought that by your kind permission I would call special attention to Br. J. P. Weethee's circular, "To the Students of Prophecy throughout the World." Brother Weethee needs no eulogy from my pen; as a student, a practical thinker, and a profound teacher in the deep things of God, he is known to all the readers of your excellent paper.

Oh! that the world would hasten to learn that God's thoughts are not the world's thoughts; neither are the world's ways God's ways. But "As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are his ways higher than our ways and his thoughts higher than our thoughts."

Now God's holy book, "The Bible," is an embodiment of his ways and his thoughts, hence Christ says, "Search the Scriptures," because in them is to be found eternal life. The humble student of the Bible has learned that this blessed Bible is its own best interpreter, a lesson that the world by worldly wisdom can never learn. To them it is foolishness, while to those who have found Christ, it is the power of God unto salvation. But perhaps you may say, What has all this to do with the circular of J. P. Weethee? Simply that he has devoted a long lifetime of humble study, profound research and exalted meditation for the acquisition of these precious lessons which I have suggested and for the rich treasury of divine knowledge which he desires and proposes to give to the world in his works entitled:

1. "The Coming Age," and
2. "Various Phases of the Eastern Question."

Believing that these books embrace the life theme and awakening thought that the world so much need preparatory to the coming kingdom of Christ, I therefore not only recommend the works, but urge on all to do their duty to the extent especially of forwarding our subscription for the books as Brother Weethee may direct. Brother Weethee has said in his circular if all that are interested in these sublime topics will aid, the books will be issued immediately. Now it strikes me forcibly that certainly everybody ought to be interested, and if so, certainly a great many will respond at once with their money, and thereby help Brother Weethee to bless the world "which lyeth in sin." I thank God for the opportunity thus afforded me to do good. Now whether it meets Brother Weethee's approbation or not, I ask the question, How many more will be as thankful as I am? Bear with me, while I tell you again how to answer my question. With your money as he may direct. May God bless us with the will and means, that will bless Brother Weethee to bless the world. Amen.

A REMARKABLE SAYING.

In a recent sermon by Talmage I find the following words:

"I would not be unbelieving if I saw the wing of the apocalyptic angel spread for its last triumphal flight in this day's sunset, or if tomorrow morning the ocean echoes should thrill us with the news that Christ the Lord had alighted on Mount Olivet or Mount Calvary to proclaim universal dominion. O Christ, descend! Scarred temple, take the crown! Wounded foot, step the throne! Thine it is, the kingdom!"

When the Bridegroom comes there will be some who although expecting him will be destitute of the oil of true preparation, and will be denounced "foolish" virgins. I am reminded of this by noticing the increased numbers who expect the speedy return of the Lord while on other points they are deeply in error—neither believing the gospel of the kingdom as a system of righteousness, nor submitting to immersion "for remission of sins," as that system requires. In the parable the "foolish" virgins went forth to meet "the bridegroom;" they must, therefore, have been expecting his advent, and they were right on that point, but that alone was not enough to make them ready and to secure them an admission to "the marriage."

Selections.

The Calm Spirit.

Great indeed is the blessedness of a calm and quiet spirit; it is at once the key to unlock, and the crown of glory to adorn, all other graces and virtues of a Christian. For since God himself is ever wont to do work silently and mysteriously in the natural world; so, in the spiritual world, he gives his especial blessing to those souls which seek to serve him calmly and quietly; he leads them on in the way of holiness; and gives them peace now as an earnest and a pledge of more deep and perfect peace hereafter; for they who work quietly confess that they labor, not in their own strength, but as grace is given them from hour to hour: and that they toil not for themselves, as though they were their own masters and the fruits of their toil were to be their own, but they have a master in heaven, who is both able and willing to prosper upon them their handiwork, because it is done in his name, and the honor and glory of their salvation will be his own; and thus (though outwardly they may pass through a vale of misery), those who have a calm and quiet soul go on from strength to strength, from the first weak beginnings of faith and love, (which are stronger than the might of the world), unto the "measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ," unto the strength of full grown men in the Lord; who not only do that which is right, but also do their right actions in the right way; men whose every thought, and word, and deed, is one continual offering unto the Lord; who, whether they eat or drink, or speak or are silent, or awake or asleep, "do all to the glory of God the Father, through our Lord Jesus Christ."

Secret Prayer.

Christian brother! hast thou "entered into thy closet" daily of late? If not, what dishonor thou hast done to him who stands ready there to hear all thy petitions. How much love for your family could you be supposed to possess, if you should always stay away from the family circle whole days, and eat and sleep in your barn? You can eat your bread from heaven only in the closet, and keep your heart warm with the love of Jesus only there. If you are willing to venture through the dangers and responsibilities of any day of your life without Christ for your guide and strength, on that day omit entering your closet, but on no other.

Again: hast thou considered the closet the place for the virtual achievement of the main business of life? Jacob had been many years acting out the views gained and plans formed in secret communion with God, when he was about to meet Esau, who might destroy him. Now he must again gain victory and success in his secret communion with God. In going to and from Padanaram, he achieved the great ends he aimed at in secret intercourse with God. Before we have God with us in outward labor, we must seek him and obtain his direction and promise of help in secret. Oh, if thy heart were more in the closet, it would be more full of hope in the church of God, where thou oughtest to "play the man" always.

Brother W. S. Finn, of Topeka, has notified me that he will be here Sept. 13, and hold a meeting of days in this county. There are some brethren in the eastern part of this county who may be glad to meet with us and share the good feast, and make arrangements for meetings in their parts, as Brother Finn wishes to stay in this region for some time. Therefore I say to the scattered ones, come and hear him. Meeting will commence Sept. 16, at the Schoolhouse near Bro. Huffman's, where Bro. Foore had meetings last May, and we will arrange for future meetings. All who have been wanting meetings can now have them.

THE WISE CHOICE.

By faith Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt: for he had respect unto the recompense of reward. Heb. xi, 24-26.

We are exhorted to take "the prophets who have spoken in the name of the Lord, for an example of suffering affliction, and of patience." And to be "followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises." James v. 10; Heb. vi. 12. Moses was one of these, and the wise choice that he made is a valuable example, and affords a striking illustration of the power which faith has to produce self-denial and devotedness to God. Notice what he renounced, what he chose, and what influenced him:

I. He renounced things held in high estimation by the world, namely,

1. The honors of a prince. In refusing "to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter," at a time when Egypt was one of the most renowned kingdoms of the world, he showed a noble disregard of human glory together with its high-sounding titles and glittering insignia. How attractive are such things! To obtain them the ambitious have hazarded ease, time, health, conscience, and even life itself. Even for some petty office, conferring a little brief authority, many a man will compromise religious principles to get the Roman Catholic vote. Another will fight with bloodthirsty courage in battle for the sake of rising a step higher in the line of military promotion. But Moses knew that worldly honor would interfere with his duty to God; for "How can ye believe which receive honor one of another, and seek not the honor that cometh from God only?" John v. 44. "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world." 1 John ii. 15, 16.

2. The pleasures of a court. The court of Egypt was extremely corrupt, and abounded with "the pleasures of sin," or "pleasures of this life." Luxury, amusement, and dissipation of almost every kind were there. But the great Teacher has warned us that the "pleasures of this life" are thorns which choke the word, and Moses knew that such pleasures are only "for a season," but those of the life to come are "pleasures forevermore." Psa. xvi. 11. He had before him the monitory example of Esau, "who for one morsel of meat"—a momentary gratification of his palate—sold his birthright." Heb. xii 16. And should not every sensible person take warning from the multitudes which, as history testifies, have blighted their prospects of this life and the life to come, by giving themselves up to "the pleasures of sin?"

3. The riches of a kingdom which for centuries was one of the wealthiest on earth. Think of the great varieties of worldly comfort, luxury, and splendor, which "the treasures in Egypt" could supply! Have any of the modern millionaires, royal or plebeian, imitated the self-denial of Moses in this respect? We read of a young man who, though exhorted by the Master himself refused to renounce the treasures of a private estate; but Moses, in a much darker age, renounced his interest in the treasures of a kingdom. In all ages it has been a great principle of truth that "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." If you have been yoking the two kinds of service, you have made a mistake, and must declare an eternal divorce between them.

When Moses was one hundred and twenty years old "his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated." Deut. xxxiv. 7. Remember, therefore, that being only about forty when he renounced the honors, pleasures and treasures in Egypt, he was then in the prime of life, not too young to understand nor too old to relish them. Yet he renounced them all. It was no self-denial in Barzillai, at eighty, with taste and hearing blunted by the well-known incapability of old age, to keep away from David's court where the table was well supplied from a land "flowing with milk and honey," and sacred music, vocal and instrumental, was patronized and cultivated with royal munificence. "I am this day," said Barzillai, "fourscore years old: and can I discern between good and evil? can thy servant taste what I eat or what I drink? can I hear any more the voice of singing men and singing women?"

II. And not only did Moses renounce things highly esteemed by the world, but he chose things which the world does not relish, namely,

1. The companionship of God's people. His heart was not with the gilded balls, the splendid portices, the beautiful gardens and the gayly-clad throngs about him, but out in the fields and the brick-yards, where his brethren, as bondmen, were toiling under the burning sun. With the Psalmist he could say, "I am a companion of all them that fear thee, and of them that keep thy precepts." Psa. cxix. 63. Such society may not be the richest and most fashionable, but it is the best and most honorable—all of them "children of a King." It is also the most permanent, for if brethren and sisters in Christ hold out faithful they will be companions forever. What a sharp rebuke is the example of Moses to those in these days who seem ashamed to acknowledge their poorer brethren, or to be seen in their humble places of worship! It is accounted greatly to the credit of Onesiphorus that he was not ashamed of Paul's chain. It is a shame for any Christian, however wealthy, to be ashamed of a brother simply because he is "a poor man in vile raiment." "Hearken, my beloved brethren. Hath not God chosen the poor of this world rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him?" James ii. 2, 5. Refusing the companionship of God's people (or, union with the "one body"), is no small matter, for of some it is "written for our admonition, that the word of hearing did not profit them, because they were not united by faith with them that heard." Heb. iv. 2, Revised version.

2. The affliction of God's people. Rather than enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, Moses chose "to suffer affliction with the people of God." They were groaning under cruel bondage, and he nobly espoused their cause as a "companion in tribulation." What a sad weakness was that in Peter, and what an occasion of bitter self-reproach, when, on the betrayal of the Master and the scattering of the disciples, he denied being "one of them!" Mark xiv 70. The people of God have many trials. "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution." 2 Tim. iii. 12. "We must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God." Acts xiv. 22. "Many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth him out of them all." Psa. xxxiv. 19.

3. The reproach of Christ. Moses esteemed that reproach greater riches than the treasures in Egypt. Perhaps the heathen grandees of Egyptian "fashionable society" ridiculed him for "throwing away such brilliant prospects" as he had in the royal family. So "the world of the ungodly" still reproaches those who "have forsaken all" to follow Christ. The example of self-denial is not only Mosaic but apostolic also. "What things are gain to me," says Paul, "those I counted loss for Christ. Yea doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ, and be found in him.... Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark them which walk so as ye have us for an ensample." Phil. iii. 7, 8, 17. And surely there is a sufficient "recompense of reward" for all this—"manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come life everlasting." Lu. xviii. 30.

III. And now we ask, what influenced Moses to make the wise choice? It was "by faith" he did all this—he believed implicitly, "the exceeding great and precious promises" made to the patriarchs, and "had respect unto the recompense of reward" offered in those promises. In the covenant with Abraham the Lord had said "I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee" —which Seed is Christ—"the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession." And again, "Thy Seed shall possess the gate of his enemies; and in thy Seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." Thus was "the gospel," in a few words, preached to Abraham his ancestor; and in this covenant Moses could see that all the righteous are to be rewarded with an eternal inheritance on earth, as "joint-heirs with Christ" in the kingdom of God. Gen. xvii. 8; Gal. iii. 8, 16; Rom. viii. 17. It was by the strength of his faith in these promises that Moses was enabled to renounce and choose as he did. "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." 1 Jno. v. 4.

The great faith which Moses had when he made that choice, was not born under the blazing light of miracles but in a dark day, forty years before he saw the miracles at the bush. Why then may not faith (without the presence of miracles) have as much power with us as with him to revolutionize the life and move us to make the same wise choice? If your faith is weak, let not this drive you to despair but to prayer, like the man who said, "Lord I believe, help thou mine unbelief;" or as even the apostles themselves prayed, "Lord increase our faith." Mark ix. 24; Luke xvii. 5.

O that we might all have sufficient faith to make and adhere to the wise choice that Moses made, so that, in the resurrection of the just we may join the victors on the crystal sea in singing "the song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb."

PHILADELPHIA, Sept. 25, '83.

Editor Restitution:

I have just returned from a trip amongst the valleys and mountains of Virginia, and a visit with the brotherhood in that locality, which has been so very enjoyable that I thought your readers would in some degree be pleased with a report of my observations and experiences.

With my family I left Philadelphia on the night of the 6th instant, our objective point being Winchester, Va., and the chief attraction being the conference at that point, which was called for the next day. At the station it was our pleasure to meet our very intelligent sister Barber, of Salem, O., who had been on a visit to Philadelphia, and was to leave for her home on the same train with us. We separated however, at the station, as she was going directly through by the Pennsylvania R. R., while we had accommodations in the sleeping car for Chattanooga which diverged from the direct line at Harrisburg. We were all soon tucked snugly away in the comfortable beds of our luxurious "Pullman," and sleeping the sleep of the just as we rushed through space at the rate of thirty miles an hour, leaving behind us Lancaster, Harrisburg, Carlisle, and awakening in the morning as we entered Chambersburg, made famous during the war as the only town in a northern state that was captured by Confederate forces, and not far from the historic field of Gettysburg. We were soon across Mason and Dixon's line amid the fertile, rolling fields of Maryland; crossing the Potomac at Shepherdstown, a short distance above Harper's Ferry, famous as the spot selected by John Brown to make his stand for the liberty of the black man. We were now in Virginia, and soon at Boyceville, where we left the train, taking the stage for Winchester nine (not twenty) miles away. We were on historic ground, and riding over roads along which a few years ago the horsemen of Early and Sheridan had galloped, and over hills and through valleys that had felt the tread of the armies of Lee marching towards the north star, and again as they returned shattered and sundered after their defeat at Gettysburg. On this hillside had camped the grey, and over there the blue; on that elevation, where the grove could be seen, had been posted the batteries that shelled the town; over there was the spot where Gen. Shields was wounded; while this turnpike was the road over which Sheridan had flown to turn defeat into victory, when "At Winchester twenty miles away" he heard the roar of battle.

I have travelled considerably, and viewed much beautiful scenery, but I must confess that I have never seen a more pleasant prospect than was presented when we reached the summit of the last hill, and the city of Winchester and surrounding country were spread before our vision. Before us, a little to the right, was the city resting snugly in the valley; to the left, and as far as the eye could carry, were the beautiful rolling fields of the garden of Virginia; behind, skirting the horizon, were the Blue Ridge mountains, while in the far distance across the valley were the great North mountain and the Alleghanies.

But I fear your readers will tire of my rhapsodies, and so will come to personal matters, which are always of more interest than effusions and generalities. Our Jehu soon drove up to the "House of the Brethren," where we found waiting at the door to greet us like a good father, our beloved Brother Morgan, and with him Sister Morgan, Brother Keim who had preceded us from Philadelphia, and Brother W. H. Donaldson from Brooklyn. We were not long in discovering that the House of the Brethren was located in a sort of a Garden of Eden, and having received permission that "of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat," without any exceptions as to forbidden fruit, we were soon luxuriating amid the luscious peaches, pears and grapes. I fear that Brother Morgan must have repented as he witnessed the terrible onslaughts made on his beauties by the delegates from the cities where peaches grow in baskets, with the good ones on top, and whose vineyards are the market places.

Before the meeting, it was my pleasure to meet many brethren from various points in Virginia and Maryland, and as the meetings progressed there were further arrivals, from among whom we made many valued friends. Between the people of the north and south, and between those of country and city, there are certain differences of manner, training and habit, but when the shell is broken away we find that we are alike men and women; and when all meet on the common ground as members of the great family of God, how trifling seem all mere worldly differences: north and south, townsman and rustic, rich and poor, meet at one common feast as members of one family, "for ye are all one in Christ Jesus." This was beautifully illustrated by Brother Morgan in introducing two brethren, "This brother," said he, "was one who never flinched in his defence of the Union cause, and this was one of the bravest of the brave in the struggle for the Lost Cause. Now see what the gospel has done." They had thrown away their sabres with all their animosities, and taken up instead the sword of the Spirit, in the service of the Prince of Peace.

I will not enter into the details of the meetings, as doubtless the secretary has given a full report. The entire season, commencing on the evening of the 10th, was a feast throughout, without a shadow of conflict, and all who were fortunate enough to be there, and feel the benefits of Christian fellowship, and drink the Word of God, must feel their spiritual strength renewed, and confess that it was good to be there.

Some business of a very important character was transacted in the formation of a society for the promotion of Christian knowledge, of which more will be said as soon as a definite plan for the campaign is decided upon; but, we wish all believing in the coming and kingdom of Christ, particularly in the East, to bear in mind that they will be expected to contribute to the good work. The names of the men who are for the first year to have charge of the affairs of the Society ought to be a sufficient guarantee of judicious and efficient management. Speaking from my personal knowledge, not with the object of praise, but simply for the information of those who are not so fortunate as to know personally my colaborers, I would say, that the President, George W. Young of Brooklyn, is a tried and true Christian, a cultivated gentleman, and a thorough going business man, who is willing to spend and be spent for the cause that he loves.

Brother John Donaldson, Jr., the Secretary, is a man who has the respect and esteem of all who know him. He has peculiar claims for his position, and is as well an able and effective speaker.

The Vice President, Brother Morgan, has for many years done battle for the truth, and when the gathering of the sheaves shall be, doubtless great will be his reward. He is a man of ability who has the confidence of the brotherhood throughout a large section of Maryland and Virginia.

Brother J. F. Gellatly, the Asst. Secretary, is well known to many readers of THE RESTITUTION as an able writer. He is a man who has been a close student, is a clear reasoner, and withal an earnest, generous Christian. The other officer, whose duty it is to "carry the bag," is your correspondent, and for him I can only say that he will do his duty faithfully and earnestly to the best of his ability.

The Conference meeting proper closed on Sunday evening the 8th of September, but in view of the intense interest manifested by members and visitors alike, it was concluded to continue the meetings through the week, and accordingly circulars were scattered throughout the city announcing lectures on Bible topics by Brethren J. F. Gellatly, J. B. Keim and your correspondent. The meetings were well attended with increasing audiences and growing interest until the last meeting when the house was crowded and the most intense interest manifested. Brother Gellatly had to return home early in the week, but all will remember his earnest appeals, and terse, spicy delineations of truth and error. This threw the work upon the other two mentioned; and for Brother Keim I will say that he did his Master's work nobly, and his forcible expositions of the Word as he presented the "Restitution of All Things," "The Narrow Way," "The Love of God," and kindred topics, carried the stamp of truth with them, and showed him to be a "workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."

I feel confident that a voice has gone forth from this meeting that will do much for the cause of truth in the East, inasmuch as the spirit of love, which is the spirit of Christ, animated the proceedings from beginning to end.

I fear that I have already exceeded the proper limits of such a letter, so will not have space to tell of other pleasures enjoyed through the courteous hospitality of Brother John Good in sending his carriage to take us to his mountain home at Highview, Frederick Co., Va., back of the Great North Mountain. To one reared on the prairies of the West, and the greater part of his life spent in the cities, this was indeed a treat. A western farmer would think it incredible, but there on the top of a lofty ridge, we might call it a mountain, was a fertile farm, with fields laughing with the harvest from their rocky soil, and trees bending to the ground with their treasures of fruit. From his home can be seen the three states of Maryland, Virginia and West Virginia, and a new and enchanting view of rugged mountains, glens and fertile hills presents itself at every turn, while the pure, bracing atmosphere, charged with the balm of the pines and the odors of the forest is life itself.

While among the mountains we started meetings at the home of Br. J. J. Spaid, with promise of good interest, and left it in charge of Brother Keim who has doubtless sown much good seed. I would like to speak of a trip down the picturesque Shenandoah Valley, and a visit to the underworld in the wonderful caverns of Luray, and portray their marvellous beauty, but lack of space will forbid. I will say, however, in conclusion, that on Sunday last, in company with Brother Gellatly, I visited Brooklyn, Md., where we inaugurated a course of meetings, preached the glad tidings to large audiences and with promise of much good. May the Lord work with us. Never before did I see so forcibly the need of laborers in the field where the harvest is so plenteous. Let all who can, work while it is called today; for the night cometh when no man can work, and also the day when our work shall be tried; and what will those servants say who have done no work. With greetings to all I am, Your Brother,

SAMUEL WILSON.

THE STARS AND THE PROMISES.

Some of the most sublime and soul-song passages of God's holy Word are those in which reference is made to the heavens and their wondrous contents. We allude now to the visible heavens, including the clouds, the firmament, and the starry host. The sublimity of those passages referred to does not so much arise from their allusions to the clouds, the firmament, and the stars, as to what these glorious objects are made the representatives and teachers of. In Psalms xviii., xix., civ. and xcix.; Isaiah xl.; Jer. xxxiii., and various places are found specimens of the Scriptures to which we refer. In them the firmament, the stars and the sun are the preachers; but the lofty theme is the glory of God; they mirror forth the excellencies of his character, and especially the riches of his grace, of his condescending care and infinite mercy. Psa. cxlix. 5, 6; Isa. xl. 26-31; Ps. civ. 11, 12.

It has been said that "nature (or God's glorious creation) is a parable and a prophecy." But this is only the case as studied in connection with his Word, which he hath exalted above all other discoveries of his name. Psalms cxxxviii. 2. This Word hath laid creation under tribute to furnish images and figures as illustrations of spiritual blessings and coming glories. Those who lift up their eyes to the heavens, with God's Book in their hands, and the Holy Spirit dwelling in their hearts, shall hear there heavens take up their parable and speak of lofty mercy, and overshadowing care; they shall tell him of the Sun of righteousness who, came forth from his pavilion of glory to run a race of wondrous love with the giant's strength and the bridegroom's delight. Psa. xix. 6. They shall whisper to the soul who receives the testimony of Jesus, that the time is coming when God's will shall be done on earth as it is done in heaven; when the stars of righteousness shall roll round the sun of glory, that stable center of the new creation, with as much regularity as the planets revolve around the natural sun; when the moral creation of God shall no longer be shamed and rebuked by the physical, but when the "righteous shall shine as the sun in the kingdom of their Father."

Our object, then, in the remarks which we propose making, will be this—that whenever we look at the glorious firmament or the starry host, we may have fellowship with David and Paul to their delight in God's word of grace (Psa. xix. 4; Rom. x. 18), and with Isaiah and Daniel in their anticipations of coming glory. Isa. xl. 18,26; Dan. xii. 3. And in order to promote this, we will contemplate one to whom they all looked with admiration, whose pilgrim character and simple faith they all imitated, and exhort us also to follow.

The stars were shining brightly over the lovely plains of Palestine, and it was near midnight hour, when a man far advanced in life was seen slowly ascending a green slope, at the foot of which, near a winding stream, a number of tents were pitched. Having gained the summit, he stood still, and seemed to be listening to some one conversing with him. This was really the case, although no person was visible, and no one but himself heard the voice that spoke. That night-watcher was Abraham communing with God, "his shield and his exceeding reward." After a few minutes' solemn pause, during which he seemed absorbed in wonder and devotion, he lifted up his face reverently, and gazed with intense interest at the starry heavens. His Divine "Friend" had said, "Look now, toward heaven and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them. So shall thy seed be." If we examine this wondrous declaration in connection with what follows, "He believed God, and he counted it to him for righteousness," and with the apostle's comments on it in Rom. iv., we shall see that we can scarcely attach too much importance to it. We learn, by comparing Scripture with Scripture, that this promise contains a reference to three seeds—a natural seed, or the house of Israel; a personal seed, even Christ (Gal. iii. 16); and a spiritual seed, or all believers in all nations. Between these three seeds there is an intimate connection. One great end, or rather the great end to be brought about by the natural seed, was the coming in the fulness of time of the personal seed; and the existence of a spiritual seed is a glorious consequent of the birth, mission, death, and resurrection of the personal seed. Because Christ hath come as the seed of Abraham, and all that he engaged to do, he shall have a seed to serve him and glorify him, a church of the first born conformed to his image. And still further, when these shall be manifested as the sons of God in resurrection glory, then the natural seed of Abraham gathered to the land promised to him and his seed "for an everlasting inheritance," shall also shine in the beauties of holiness, numerous and beautiful as the morning dew. But without entering further at present into these glorious prospects of "the day of Christ," which Abraham saw and was glad," are we not taught, from the sublime scene we have contemplated, and the gracious words spoken to Abraham, to connect together the stars of heaven and the promises? Surely Abraham would never after look upon the stars without thinking of God's promises to himself and his seed. All who believe are blessed with faithful Abraham, and to his spiritual children God's heavens should ever declare the glory of his mercy and faithfulness; and the starry host should, night by night, lead into a deeper knowledge of himself. Alas! how many in all ages have looked up and worshipped the host of heaven, and forgotten that great God, who formed all. And is it not for a lamentation, that even now the beautiful planets and bright constellations are distinguished by names taken from the heathen mythology? It shall not always be so. When "the gods that have not made the earth and the heavens shall perish from the earth and from under the heavens" (Jer. x. 11), we may hope that other names will be given to the orbs of heaven, and in this respect, as in every other, "a pure language" will be spoken and the tongue of man become God's glory. Till then, let all believers think of Abraham's midnight musings—listen to God's voice—and look into his Word, as they gaze at the starry sky.

There are, as we have intimated, many other Scriptures in which the heavens and the stars of heaven are mentioned in connection with the promises of God and his glorious perfections. How soothing, and yet how full of grandeur, are the following passages: "For ever, O Lord, thy word is settled in heaven. Thy faithfulness is unto all generations: thou hast established the earth, and it abideth. They continue this day according to thine ordinances; for all are thy servants." Psa. cxix. 89, 90. "Thou, even thou art Lord alone: thou hast made heaven, the heaven of heavens, with all their hosts, the earth and all things that are therein, the seas and all that is therein, and thou preservest them all; and the host of heaven worshippeth thee. Thou art the Lord the God, who didst choose Abram, and broughtest him forth out of Ur of the Chaldees, and gavest him the name of Abraham." Neh. ix. 6, 7. "Lift up your eyes on high, and behold who hath created these things, that bringeth out their host by number; he calleth them all by names, by the greatness of his might, for that he is strong in power; not one faileth.... He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might he increaseth strength." Isa xl. 26, 29. He telleth the number of the stars: he calleth them all by their names. Great is our Lord, and of great power; his understanding is infinite.... He showeth his word unto Jacob, his statutes and his judgments unto Israel." Psa. xlvii. 3, 6, 19.

Truly, the universe of God is sublime; but his promises are still more so. Let us make use of the former to illustrate the latter, and ask the bright stars to talk with us of the exceeding great and precious promises. God has connected the two together in his revelation—let us do so in our meditations. His works are great; let us seek them out diligently. His promises are gracious; let us depend on them simply.

"The starry heavens thy rule obey,
The earth maintains her place,
And these thy servants night and day,
Thy skill and power express;
But still thy law and gospel, Lord,
Have brighter more distinct
Not earth stands firmer than thy word,
Nor stars so nobly shine."

We will endeavor to show in what respects the stars shed light on the promises of God; and also wherein the latter exceed the former. The first will bring out a parallel, and the second will exhibit a disparity; and thus show, while nature illustrates grace, grace always exceeds nature, and that God's own stupendous works are not even a complete shadow of the exceeding riches of his grace.—London Quar. Jour. of Proph.

THE FALSE PROPHET.

Differing accounts in regard to the success of the Mohammedon false prophet, El Mahdi, in Upper Egypt, have been received. A despatch from Cairo on the 12th, Sept. says: "Hicks Pacha, who left Khartoum on the 9th inst., with five thousand men for a campaign on the left bank of the White Nile against El Mahdi, the False Prophet, has forwarded a despatch to the Khedive stating that El Mahdi's religious influence is broken."

On the other hand a letter from a Khartoum correspondent of the London Daily News gives a depressing account of the operations of the Egyptians against the Mahdi. Half the civil officials are said to be already partisans of the rebels, and all through the rebellion, trade has been carried on freely between the disturbed districts and those nominally loyal to the Khedive under the passports of the False Prophet. A proclamation from two officers of the regular army who have joined the rebels is circulated among their former comrades, in which the Mahdi is spoken of in highly complimentary terms.

"The Mahdi is kind, and speaks civilly to all. He abhors falsehood, and his pride is to spread the glory of our religion. He fights in the path of God, and only with those who refuse to obey Him. His daily life (peace be unto him) is quite opposed to worldly matters: nor does he care for its enjoyments. He is simple in his diet and plain in dress. Kisoreh Dourra steeped in water is all that he eats. A plain shirt and trousers made from the native cloth is all that he wears. He is always smiling, and his face is as resplendent as the full moon. His body and form are of the sons of Israel, and on his right cheek is a hair (wart?) and also other marks which are written in the books of the Holy Law are stamped on him. He neither honors the rich for their riches, nor does he neglect the poor on account of their poverty. All Muslims to him are equal.

"With the numerous army of the Mahdi, which is about two hundred thousand fighting men, whose souls are offered to the Lord, we have also Remingtons, guns and rockets which we have taken from the Turks, besides an ample supply of ammunition. The Mahdi, however (unto whom be peace), trusts to God only, and will prevent fighting by firearms: spears and swords he fights with, and his connection with the angels is well known, as we well know from the history of Mohammed."

Christian Joy.

"Rejoice in the Lord always, and again I say, Rejoice." "The meek shall increase their joy in the Lord." "Rejoice in the Lord, ye righteous, and shout for joy all ye that are upright in heart."

The work of praise is such a delightful, holy privilege. And will the great God deign not only to load us with benefits, but also to accept the glad homage of our hearts? We may be glad, because he commands us to rejoice. Also, gladness and faithfulness go hand in hand. We rejoice in God's love, and that love constrains us to do his will, simply and sincerely. We rejoice at the price which has been paid for our ransom: for if God spared not his own Son, shall he not with him also freely give us all things? He hath borne our sins and carried our sorrows, and is the sacrifice complete, or is he unable to carry our sorrow, that we cling to it so closely, and refuse to rejoice? If we ask God to teach us the song of praise, and to give us glad, rejoicing hearts, he will do so; for "whoso offereth praise, he glorifieth him."

"Praise the Lord, oh, my soul! and and all that is within me, praise his holy name!"

The Morning Psalm.

MARIANNA FARNINGHAM.

"Read us a psalm, my little one,"
An untried day had just begun.
And ere the city's rush and roar
Came pouring through the closed barred door,
The family was hushed, to hear
The youngest child, in accents clear,
Read from the Book. A moment's space—
The morning look died from each face—
The sharp, keen look that goes in quest
Opposing force, nor brooks defeat.

"I will lift up mine eyes," she read,
"Unto the hills." Who was afraid?
What had that psalm of pilgrim life
To do with all our modern strife?
"Behold, he that doth keep Israel keep
Shall neither slumber, nor shall sleep.
The Lord thy keeper is, and he
The shade on thy right hand shall be;
The sun by day shall not thee smite,
The moon shall hurt thee not by night."

And the child finished the old psalm.
And those who heard grew strong and calm;
The music of the Hebrew words
Thrilled them like sweet remembered chords
And brought the heights of yesterday
Down to the lowlands of today,
And seemed to lend to common things
A mystery as of light and wings,
And each one felt in gladsome mood,
And life was beautiful and good.

Then forth, where duty's citation call
Was heard, the household hastened all,
In crowded haunts of busy men,
To toil with hook, or speech, or pen,
To meet the day's demand with skill.
And bear and do, and dare and will.
As they must, who are in the strife
And strain and stress of modern life,
And would succeed, but who yet hold
Honor of higher worth than gold.

These are the days of peace, we say,
Yet fiercest fights are fought today;
And those that formed that household band
Had need of strength, that they might stand
In firmness and unruffled calm;
Has sweetly did their morning psalm
Amid the clamor loud and long,
Like echo of a once-loved song,
Nerve to their hearts and make them strong.

At close of day they met again.
And each had known some touch of pain,
Some disappointment, loss or care,
Some place of stumbling, or some snare.
"And yet the psalm is true," said they,
"The Lord preserveth us always;
His love were rife in days of yore,
And from this time and evermore,
If skies be bright or skies be dim,
He keepeth all who trust in him."

Bible Answers.

A happier illustration of the wonderful character of the Bible, and the facility with which even a child may answer by it the greatest questions, and solve the sublimest of mysteries was perhaps never given, than at an examination of a deaf and dumb institution, some years ago, in London.

A little boy was asked in writing, "Who made the world?"

He took the chalk, and wrote underneath the question,

"In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth."

The clergyman then inquired in a similar manner, "Why did Jesus Christ come into the world?"

A smile of delight and gratitude rested on the countenance of the little fellow as he wrote,

"This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners."

A third was proposed, evidently adapted to call forth his most powerful feelings into exercise, "Why were you born deaf and dumb, when I can hear and speak?"

"Never," said an eye-witness, "shall I forget the look of resignation which sat upon his countenance as he took the chalk and wrote,

"Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight."

The Traveller's Palm.

Among the great variety of palms in the East is one known as the Traveller's Tree. It has a graceful crown of broad green leaves, arranged at the top of its trunk in the shape of a fan. The leaves are from twenty to thirty in number, from eight to ten feet long, and a foot and a half broad. The name of "traveller's tree" is given on account of its affording at all times a supply of cool, pure water upon piercing the base of the leaf-stalk with a spear or other pointed instrument. This supply is owing to the large, broad leaves which condense the moisture in the atmosphere, and from which the water trickles down into the hollow where the leaf-stalk joins the stem. Each of these forms a little reservoir in which water may always be found. This property of absorbing the moisture is possessed in almost as great a degree by the banana. The leaves are used to beat the roots in cases of fever, on account of the amount of water they contain, and the main stem is full of small chambers filled with water, which has been distilled by the smooth, cool leaves of the tree. The leaves are also used for thatching and for lining the hut; the bark is beaten out flat and forms the flooring, while the trunk supplies timber for the framing and planking. Quantities of the fresh leaves are sold every morning in the markets, and take the place of plates and dishes. At the New Year's festival and upon some other occasions, the fatta or meat killed at these times is always served up, together with rice, upon pieces of the "traveller's tree" or the banana; a kind of spoon or ladle is also formed by twisting up part of the leaf and tying it with the tendrils of some climbing plants.

Sea Grandeur.

There is a peculiar charm about the sea; it is always the same, yet never monotonous. Mr. Gosse has well observed, that you soon get tired of looking at the loveliest field, but never of the rolling waves. The secret, perhaps is that the field does not seem alive; the sea is life-abounding. Profoundly mysterious as the field is, with its countless forms of life, the aspect does not irresistably and at once coerce the mind to think of subjects so mysterious and so awful as the aspect of the sea does—it carries with it no ineradicable associations of terror and awe, such as are borne in every murmur of old ocean, and thus is neither so terrible nor so suggestive. As we look from the cliffs, every wave has its history, every swell keeps up suspense; will it break now or will it melt into that larger wave? And then the log which floats so aimlessly on its back, and now is carried under again, like a drowning wretch—it is the fragment of some ship which has struck miles and miles away, far from help and all pity, unseen except of heaven, and no messenger of its agony to earth except this log, which floats so buoyantly on the tide! We may weave some such tragic story, as we idly watch the fluctuating advance of the dark leg; but whatever we weave the story will not be wholly tragic, for the beauty and serenity of the scene are sure to assert their influences. O mighty and unfathomable sea! O terrible familiar! O grand and mysterious passion! In thy gentleness thou art terrible when sleep smiles on thy scarcely quiet heaving breast; in thy wrath and thunder thou art beautiful by the light of rising or of setting suns, in gray dawn or garish day, in twilight or in sullen storms of darkness, ever and everywhere beautiful; the poets have sung of thee; the painters have painted thee; but neither the song of the poet, nor the cunning of the painter's hand, has more than caught faint reflexes of thy incommunicable grandeur, and loveliness inexhaustible.—Blackwood's Magazine.

The Lamb of God.

The most significant and remarkable type introduced into the divine ordinances as well as into Israel's history and ritual, was the Lamb. It even meets us at the threshold of Paradise, in the sacrifice of Abel, as an object particularly acceptable in the sight of God. Later, the Lamb, with its blood, consecrates the commencement of the history of the Israelites. The sprinkling of the doorposts with the blood of lambs was the means of Israel's preservation in Egypt from the sword of the destroying angel, and the departure of the people from Pharaoh's house of bondage. From that time the Lamb continued to be the most prominent figure by which God typified the future Messiah to the children of Abraham. Henceforward it acquired an abiding footing in Israel's sacrificial rites in general, and in the yearly passover in particular. In the latter, each house was enjoined by the Mosaic law to bring a male lamb, without blemish or infirmity, to the sanctuary, there solemnly confess their transgressions over it, then bring it typically burdened with our sins, to the court of the temple to be slain; and after it was roasted, consume it entirely in festive communion, with joy and thanksgiving to Jehovah. That which was so prophetically typical in this ceremony, was so apparent that even the most sinful mind could not mistake it. Every one who was only susceptible of that which was divinely symbolical, felt impressed with the idea that this divine ordinance could have no other aim than to keep alive in Israel, along with the promised Deliverer, the confidence and hope in him.

John the Baptist appears in the wilderness; and the first greeting with which he welcomes Jesus, which was renewed whenever he saw him, is "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world!" thereby directing the attention of the whole world to Jesus as if there were thence forth nothing else worth seeking in hell or in heaven than this Lamb of God, and by so doing he certainly directs us to the greatest and most beautifying of all the mysteries, and to the pith and marrow of the entire gospel. For if Christ had been only the "Lion of the tribe of Judah," and not at the same time the "Lamb," what would it have availed us? As the Lamb he is the desire of all nations, the star of hope to the exiles from Eden, the sun of righteousness in the night of sorrow to those whom the law condemns, and the heavenly lamp to the wanderer in the gloomy isle of death.

Letter Drawer.

Br. S. A. Chaplin:

As Brother J. C. Jones of Mt. Joy, Scioto Co., Ohio, wishes to hear from those ministers to whom I sent THE RESTITUTION, I thought I would forward this letter. Brother Conrad is a minister of excellent character.

Yours in hope,
J. P. WEETHEE.

NEWISBURGH, Ross Co., O.

Rev. J. P. Werthee:

Almost one year has elapsed since I saw you. When we parted I felt that the time would come when we should meet again, (if not in this world as mortals) and reign with Christ in the age to come.

Shortly after I arrived at home from Jackson I sent a card to THE RESTITUTION requesting them to send me a sample copy, which they did at once. I read it with care and became deeply interested in the doctrines therein advocated, with few exceptions. The paper came during the last winter. Your articles were examined first. I feel safe in saying that I obtained more Scriptural knowledge by reading that paper six months than all others in former life. I saw a notice from your pen stating that you were sending a few copies to persons out of your money, hoping it might do good; if the paper was continued by you to me, please let me know, for I am now prepared to pay for it, and I wish to send the money to you if you were the giver, if not, I will send it to the agent of THE RESTITUTION. I would have sent it long ago, but I was much cramped during the six months past.

The paper has been discontinued and I am lost without it apparently. I feel that I have lost some of the important links of your chain on the British phase of the Eastern Question. Dear Father it is because I love you that I venture in your presence with my imperfect pen, but I know your Christian heart will make all the allowance that charity may suggest. I am firm in the belief that Christ will reign upon this earth and that the "little flock" will be made "kings and priests" and that they "shall reign with him a thousand years." I believe in the utter destruction of the wicked and the devil also, and that there will finally be no more curse. God is the author of all life and no life can be continued beyond his will. I can see no reason why any being should continue to live unless that being should live in harmony with his divine law of love. O how my mind has been liberated within the last year! "God is love," and I feel that he will give all men a fair trial for life. By the grace of God I am willing to forsake the creeds and commandments of men and follow Christ. Brother pray for me that God through his Son may bless me that I may understand the Holy Word and wait for the coming of the Lord. I sometimes feel that I am all alone. I have been talking privately to some of the ministers near me and they seem to be astonished at me, but when we investigate they appear to be confounded or at a loss to sustain their immortal soul doctrine, state of the dead and the kingdom of God. But as for me whereas I was once blind I now see. If you feel it your duty let me hear from you. Yours in love,

OLIVER COONROD.

Editor Restitution:

Let me say to the dear ones scattered abroad that I am still in the vineyard of my Master proclaiming the good news of a coming kingdom to a dying race. And as I have noticed a short article from my old brother, J. F. Wagoner, from my old home where I first heard the gospel preached by Wagoner, Shaffer and H. Corbaley. He stated that he baptized two at this our old home. When I saw the article my mind was carried back afresh to the good times we used to have then, but it brought on sadness to think that we were now so far apart; and some have fallen asleep long ago; others have become cold in the faith and are gone back to the world; others are rich in this world's goods, and care nothing about Christ's coming and kingdom. But after all my mind was refreshed with the cheering words of Brother Wagoner, and I could rejoice with him. On the second Sunday in August I met with the dear saints on Lightning Creek in the neighborhood of Brother Parr and Baker, where Brother Z. Gower used to preach years ago; but now he is fallen asleep in Jesus and is buried in the state of Texas to wait his call from on high when Christ comes. But to return to what took place at our meeting on the second Sunday. At 11 o'clock after I had spoken to a well-filled house perhaps 70 were seated and dismissed to meet at 4 p. m., for sisters came to me one after another, and demanded that I should baptize them. After the four o'clock service we repaired to the water at Lightning Creek, and there in company with a large concourse of people we buried those four sisters by baptism into Christ, raised them up to walk in newness of life. This brought back the good and happy days of old when brethren were all alive to the truth. May God bless and keep these four young sisters in the straight and narrow way that leads unto life, that they may never bring a reproach on the cause of God nor on themselves. While old members are growing cold and care but little for the truth of Christ or his cause, never has there been a time when the people were so eager to hear the true character of God vindicated, that he gave his only begotten Son to die, and, as a true, dear, loving Father cares for all of Adam's children. He said to our old Mother Eve, that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head, Gen. iii. 15, 16. He said to Abraham that because he had obeyed his voice in the offering of his son, that his seed should possess the gates of his enemies. And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed, because thou hast obeyed my voice. Gen. xxii. 15-18. What was God's word to Abraham? That by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation. Hebrews vi. 16-18; also Gen. xxii. 15-18; read Isa. xiv. 22, 23. I have sworn by myself; the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness and shall not return, that unto me every knee should bow and every tongue shall swear. Read Phil. ii. 10; Rom. xii. 11; Rev. v. 13. Read Romans ii., the entire chapter, but especially verses 25-31. Now brother when we make the Adamic death the end of all except baptized believers, what stress do we lay on God's promise, and word and his oath to the patriarchs. Let me preach the same gospel that Paul said was preached to Abraham. Gal. iii. 8. Brethren pray for me that I may keep my head above the cares of this world and continue faithful till Christ comes, is my prayer for Christ's sake. Amen.

Editor Restitution:

I wish to offer a word in reply to Brother J. A. Root's article published in THE RESTITUTION of August 1, it being a stricture on another article headed, "The Rich Man and Lazarus." Not that the author of the former article is able to reply, but that the position may be better understood.

1. Without controversy this account of the rich man and Lazarus is a parable. A parable is a fable or a fictitious account to illustrate a truth. The caricatures in a fable or parable always represent something else. In this parable the rich man represents the Jews, and Lazarus represents the Gentile nations. So in the real we always have before us nations and not individuals. First we have a nation that is rich in religious privileges and second we have nations that are destitute of religious privileges. The two "improbabilities" which the brother speaks of are not improbabilities. The Gentile nations cannot and will not be robbed of their religious privileges. The request, "send Lazarus" is the same as send the Gentile nations into this place or condition. God will not do it; his plan is fixed, that they shall enjoy the religious privileges that they formerly have been destitute of. And it is also the fixed purpose of God to punish the Jewish people nationally for their great sin. God has also a fixed time for this punishment, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. During that period of time that people were blinded, which is a direct judgment of God.

Can the Jews be restored to their former religious privileges before the appointed time? By no means. God hath consigned the religious people to a national and a religious death. The nation did die and we have the date of its death: A. D. 70. The nation was then buried among the nations of the earth by being absorbed by them. The eminent Dr. (Ill) says, "They (the Jewish nation) have been in torment ever since the destruction of their city." The masterly hand of Paul sheds a flood of light upon the true condition of the nations as they have been the past 1800 years. See Rom. xi. One sentence describes the situation, "Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world and the diminishing (decay or loss, margin) the riches of the Gentiles: how much more their fullness" (restoration.) How very plain it is, the fall or death of the Jews becomes the riches of the Gentile world. While the rich nations go down, the poor nations arise. This is shown in the parable by one man going down while another arises. If they do not change places they change position very materially. This fallen condition of the Jews is considered or represented to be in a state of death by the same apostle, for he says, "For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead."

The preaching to the Jews by the apostles and the conversion of 3000 Jews on the day of Pentecost, does not effect the parable at all, because the nation at that time was not dead. There were forty years from the baptism of Jesus to the destruction of Jerusalem that God put forth much effort to save them; but when they crucified the Son of God their doom as a nation was sealed. But God in his great mercy saved all the individuals out of the nation that would be saved. Nor would the saving of an individual Jew destroy the parable at all. It is the nation that is punished and their condition fixed because of unbelief. Nor would the loss of individual Gentiles effect anything, for the Gentile nations are to enjoy and will enjoy privileges from which the Jews were cut off. Every attempt to individualize in regard to this matter only darkens the minds and produces confusion. When we look upon it in its true and nation light, then we have Bible truth coming in from every way to support it.

Editor Restitution:

I take my pen in hand this morning to comply with your request to write you through the paper. I bless God this morning that it is well with me. I am getting over my hurt that befell me on the 14th of March, though I have not had a boot on my foot since that date. I have been in Michigan about a year and made the happy acquaintance of many kind brethren and sisters in the Lord. I return you my sincere thanks for your many favors to the old pilgrim. Dear friends let us so live that we may share in the throne and the priesthood of the risen Savior.

"Who they are it is not for us to inquire. Hidden at present from mortal eye they will one day be owned and made manifest before an assembled world, as the best, the noblest, the most Christ-like souls earth with all its discipling and heaven with all its love can fashion and bring forth. Lawful enough it may be for us in the daily Christian intercourse of life, with whose prayers we mingle ours, and with whom we share the fellowship alike of Christian effort and of church communion, all belong to that blessed company, for in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it is not fitting that we should form any other judgment. But it is not really so. Only a part are chosen to honor. For God's elect, did we know them, would be found even now worthy of their name, and very different from those who only perplex by their folly. Loving, truthful in their lives and unselfish; broad in their sympathies, candid in their judgments, honorable in their lives, and humble in the estimate they form of themselves. These, the true sons and daughters of the Highest, will one day issue from the obscurity in which it pleased God as yet to hide them, and they shall walk in white, for they are worthy. From deepest poverty and peasant's huts, from lonely prisons great souls, of whom the world knows nothing, will then come forth, a multitude which no man can number and stand confessed God's own nobility, the aristocracy of the kingdom of God. That the rest of the professing church will be saved I doubt not; for to be saved is one thing, but to be honored of God and of Christ is quite another thing. To be forgiven is much; but to hold rank among the sanctified is far more. The one is not unfrequently found in combination with the ambitions of this world; the other, even now has no heart-felt affinities with anything that does not more or less bear on the world that is to come." Amen. I remain your aged brother in Christ, going to 76. My address in the future will be Keswick, Oct., Can.

CIRCULAR.

To the Students of Prophecy throughout the World:

The undersigned proposes to issue from the press, either in Chicago or in New York City, as circumstances may decide, the following works, to-wit:

I. The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. In the first division the nature of the Coming Age is fully discussed, as to its physical and moral character: 1. That the earth itself has a crowning age, in which it shall be perfectly adapted to be the residence of man in his highest type; 2. That man, in that resurrection state, will be under the endless reign of the Personal Messiah; 3. In establishing the proximity of that age, the prophecies of Ezekiel, Isaiah, Daniel, Zechariah, Christ, Paul, Peter, and the Apocalypse, are critically examined, relative to its rapid approach.

II. The second work will be devoted to the investigation of the various phases of the Eastern Question:—1. The Egyptian phase, 2. The British phase, 3. The Russian phase, 4. The Ottoman phase, 5. The Hebrew phase, 6. The American phase, 7. Lesser phases of the Eastern Question, 8. The location of each of the Great Powers in the coming contest, 9. All nations marshal under the banners of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. These powers are traced in history to the present time. All the great national issues are fully investigated.

If all that are interested in these great and most sublime topics will aid, they will be issued immediately. They will be printed and bound in a form that will do credit to the vastness of the subjects, and put to subscribers at prices quite reasonable. The books will contain about 500 large royal 8vo. pages each.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a firmly belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

COMING AGE—ITS PROXIMITY. No. 124.

Vs. 13, "And in that hour there was a great earthquake, and the tenth part (ward) of the city (πόλις) fell; and there were killed in the earthquake seven thousand persons (names of men seven thousand); and the rest were affrighted and gave glory to the God of heaven." Here John terminates the rehold of his noted vision of the two witnesses. Does this verse follow the twelve in point of chronology? We answer, No. Why then does it not occupy its chronological place (between verses 7 and and 8)? A careful reading of the chapter will suggest the reason. The unity of the subject is followed and not the chronology. The witnesses attract the prophet's special attention. He keeps his eye and pen upon them through the period of their prophesyings (1260 years), their war with the infidel beast, their death, their exposure in the street of the great city, their resurrection and their ascension. Having disposed of the witnesses, he is prepared to narrate the events which caused such great results; the effect, their cause. The earthquake now demands our notice.

Vs. 13. "And in that hour." In what hour? In the hour, or period, in which the witnesses were about to finish their testimony; the hour of God's judgment on the harlot, Rev. xiv. 7, xvii. 2; a period set apart for that special work, to raise up and prepare the beast from the abyss, as the executioner of God's judgment, Dan. vii. 1-9. In that hour "There was a great earthquake," a symbol earthquake, such as John often sees and describes; a political revolution; one that involves the altar and the throne. These mortal revolutions do to church and state what physical earthquakes do to mineral objects. Islands are sunk; others are thrown up. Cities are thrown down or divided; forests are prostrated; man and beast become the subjects of its wild diversions. In a similar manner human as well as divine institutions are involved in the symbolic earthquakes. This earthquake was seen in a vision; it was, therefore, symbolic. It was a civil convulsion.

Its effects: 1. "The tenth part of the city (the great city, Babylon) fell." This is very readily explained. Papal Rome, or mystic Babylon, had a national church (ward) in each of its ten kingdoms. One of these national churches is overthrown, the tenth of the city is consequently overthrown. To this division the earthquake is principally confined. Other portions of the city are involved, but do not fall.

2. "And there were killed in the earthquake seven thousand persons. The originalis as follows: Καὶ ἀπεκτάνθησαν ἐν ὀνόματι ἀνθρώπων ἑπτακισχίλιοι τῷ σεισμῷ, and were slain in the earthquake (from σείω to shake, commotion); names of men seven thousand, ὀνόματα, decorative of ὄνομα, name, title, fame, renown; the name of a thing. The original does not say persons; simply the names of men. If the men were literally slain ἄνδρες would have been omitted. It was a convulsion in which all distinctions of rank, all titles of nobility and honor were abolished, and this work was accomplished by the beast out of the abyss. Old institutions of church and state are buried beneath the elements of this infidel convulsion. We say, infidel, for it was a deadly enemy to the altar and the throne.

Two features of identification should be carefully noted: 1. "The tenth part of the city." 2. "The names (ὀνόματα) of men seven thousand, not the men, only their names or titles. It is what we should anticipate when the corrupt masses have the sway. Their jealousy of the higher classes and titled nobility is so great that their first effort, when in authority, is to enter upon the process of levelling all honorary distinctions.

Has this earthquake its record in profane history? We do not hesitate to answer in the affirmative. What event do we consider its fulfilment? We have already stated: The French Revolution. But little more is required than to make the application.

Considering that Rev. xi. 1-13, describing the temple and city of God and the two witnesses, is the key chapter of the Apocalypse, we have been careful to explain item by item. We have not written, however, a tithe of what its subjects demand. Events, covering more than twelve centuries of eventful history, during which the witnesses prophesy in sackcloth, should claim our thoughts and our warmest sympathies. Their closing work claims our special attention. Their conflict with the beast of the abyss, who can read its delineation without a tear? The events that gave rise to a convulsion which shook every throne in Europe, claim absorbing interest. They form the introduction of the Judgment age (Dan. vi., Rev. xvii, xviii). God begins his national judgments on the harlot, the corruptor of nations. This work will progress till Messiah shall reign King of kings and Lord of lords. He must reign till all enemies are subjugated. The French Revolution now claims a brief supplementary review.

1. The ruling spirit of that revolution was atheism. This we have already shown. No other visible human agency could have accomplished that special judgment mission. It required a power behind and hostile to the French altar and throne. None but an infidel power could fill such an office. God used that power, as he made use of Pharaoh in ancient times. God may execute his judgments by whatever agents shall best suit his purpose.

2. That power came from the corrupt masses. No others could have accomplished the work. That the French Revolution originated with these elements is a matter of history. The mobs of Paris and all large cities were composed of the "Sans Culottes," corrupt, uneducated men and women, very truly the dregs of society, those of the most abandoned character.

3. They formed a civil power. A beast symbolizes civil rulers. These civil rulers came out of the lower classes, the "Abyss." They were at first little else than a mob. The forms of the Revolution were a. Monarchical; b. Republican; c. Democratic; d. Militarily.—Theirs. The uprising elements swept away the Altar and the Throne and put in their seats rulers. These gave way to an atheistic democracy, which was overthrown by a military despotism.

The constituent Assembly made the first national attacks. Under the National Convention the witnesses were slain, exposed, and were resurrected. Perhaps their slaying should be considered the last act of the Legislative Assembly. After abolishing all titles, civil and ecclesiastical, they passed the act suppressing all religious communities. Here the French Church, one tenth of the city fell, and the witnesses in that ward are slain. Public worship ceased. When did this decree pass? April 6, 1792. How long did it remain in force? Till October 6, 1795. When the Constitution of the Convention was adopted. During that interval France was without a church, without priests, and without any legal or visible "officiating" witnesses. They were not banished, they were in the ward; dead and exposed. How long did this interval? From April 6, 1792 to October 6, 1795, 3 years and six months. This we have shown more fully in another place. The Constitution restored the French Church and allowed the true witnesses a more exalted position. From hades they arose to heaven. Their degradation and exaltation are to be interpreted in the same manner as Christ's language to Capernaum, "And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted to heaven, shalt be brought down to hell (hades)." Matt. xi. 23. Reverse this and you have the case of the witnesses. See also Isa. xiv. 13-15; Jer. li. 53; Amos ix. 2.

Their exaltation is still progressing as the judgment scenes progress. The Scriptures are freely circulated through France and ministers are teaching the unadulterated Word. The ascension has required time. It is not with bodies of people as it is with individuals. More time is required. The ascension of the witnesses is measured by the scale of the vision; their prophesying, conflict, death, exposure and resurrection were progressive acts consuming more or less time; so it is with their ascension. So far we have applied the same scale. The laws of symbolization require this, to do otherwise would violate the obvious scope of this entire prophetic vision.

We have now completed the history of the witnesses; and with it close the events of the sixth trumpet. The agents of the closing era of this trumpet are very remarkable. They are agents of God's executive justice, raised up for a special work as was Pharaoh of the Hebrew captivity. Where would have been the French church and Romanism today, had it not been for the French Revolution? The harlot, till the embryotic state of that Revolution had commenced had the entire control of France, and in some degree of all Western Europe, the territory of the Latin Empire. French infidels took away her royal support and laid one tenth of her city in ruins. Infidelity alone could accomplish such a work since the church and state were united.

The great truth which we have labored to demonstrate is the following: 1. The Revolution was an act of God's executive judgment on the Papal Apostasy; 2. A power was raised up for that special purpose; 3. None but an infidel power could accomplish such a work, since royalty and apostacy were united; 4. It was proper that judgment should commence with the harlot that corrupted the nations, and, afterwards extend to the nations that drank of her wine, and sustained her in her corruptions (these national judgments belong to the seventh trumpet, Rev. xi. 18); 5. In these ecclesiastical and national judgments are fulfilled the judgment events of Dan. ii. 44, 45; vii., xii.; 2 Thess. ii. 7, 8; and Rev. xiv. 7-9. Please read again the passages here named. 6. We have here traced a series of events that extended into the judgment age (national judgments); 7. That period, as we have before stated, is a period between the 6th and 7th trumpets, called "Quickly," "Today," "voice of the seventh angel." 8. It is an extraordinary period, because of its extraordinary agents and their missions; 9. It is the vestibule of the coming age, a period of preparation as well as execution, when the Son of God and Satan put into the field their final recruiting officers; 10. It is the period when "is finished the mystery of God according to the good tidings which he declared to his servants the prophets." Rev. x. 7.

Mystery sometimes denotes the gospel. Here it carries out its full and legitimate meaning. Many declarations of the prophets have been obscure, especially those that concern the Hebrew and Gentile races. Paul says, "For I would not, brethren, have you ignorant of this mystery lest ye be wise in your own conceits, that a hardening in part hath befallen Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in; and so all Israel shall be saved, even as it is written, There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, he shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob: and this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins. Rom. xi. 25, 26. The period into which we have now entered will fully solve this mystery. A dark pall hangs over the nations. Their treatment of the Hebrew. Their returning of that people to the land of their fathers. Their future, relative to the nations. Christ's preparatory work for his return; these with many other mysteries will then be solved in the sunlight of the coming age.

THE TWENTY-FOURTH COSMIC LINE.

In my last article on the "Nineteenth Cosmic Line" I endeavored to give the reader a hint of the harmonic arrangement of the Scriptures according to the law of numbers and to show him that God's Word is weighed and measured" and that the law of it is "laid to the line and the plummet." I am aware that it is a difficult subject, but I am also aware that many of my readers are not babes," who need to be fed upon "the milk of the Word." Moreover I am strongly impressed with the conviction that the "time" of which Daniel spake has arrived, when "those who think will understand" that is if "they think the thoughts of God" and not of men, and when "many are being taught" and "comprehension is being enlarged," and we must not be surprised if God chooses unexpected and very humble instrumentalities and agencies through which to work his will in his Word. Remember the answer of Amos the prophet when the wicked king Amaziah told him he was not wanted in Israel but to go and prophesy in Judea. "I was not a prophet nor a son of a prophet but I was a goat-herder and a pruner of sycamore trees and the Lord took me out of the flocks, and the Lord said unto me, go and prophesy unto my royal people Israel; and now hear ye the word of the Lord."

And now let us hear what he says in his law as measured and weighed by the 24th cosmic line.

Gen. xix. 24. "And the Lord rained upon Sodoma and Gomorra brimstone and fire from the Lord out of the heavens." A type Peter tells us of another and a final judgment by fire.

Again, Ex. xix. 24. "And the Lord said unto him (Moses), Go, get down and come up thou and Aaron along with thee. But the priests (i. e. the Levites) and the royal people may not be compelled to come up unto God lest perchance the Lord destroy from among them."

Interpretation. Moses a mediator and a type of the true mediator Christ. Place: Mount Sina, a type of the true Mount Sion, the mountain of exaltation. The giving of the law that was to serve as schoolmaster to lead us to Christ and unto the true law of love upon which hang all the law and the prophets. Aaron the type of the true "royal priesthood" "the bride of Christ." Moses has been up once before he takes Aaron up with him. He goes after him. The rest of the priesthood and the royal people not to be compelled to go up lest God destroy them, (God will destroy rather than coerce the will). God does not want an unwilling coming unto him. What do Moses and Aaron go up for? To receive a beneficent law for all those who do not go up. What will the royal priesthood go up into the mountain of exaltation with Christ for? To receive the age-lasting or "everlasting gospel" and the law of it. What will happen then? "The Lord God the King of the Hosts (the abilities) of the Beloved will give a spoken word to those who are preaching the gospel with great ability, to divide the spoil even in the timely season of his house." Psalm (lxvii. 12, 13, Sept., lxviii. C. V.)

Again, Lev. xix. 24. "And in the fourth year will all its fruit be sanctified, a praise unto the Lord." Read the context and you will see that this is an injunction as to how his people shall do when they come into the land of promise. Interpretation: The old entering into the land a type of the final entering in. The old entering in under Jesus (Joshua). The planting years of the tree entering in typical of periods in the time of the final entering in. According to type there would also seem to be a great subdivision of the millennial 1000 years first into four periods of 250 years each, according to these four years of the first taking possession of the inheritance at the end of which final fourth all the fruit of every tree of the planting will be a praise unto the Lord. Then other subdivisions according to other types.

From this point on, the correlation of the number seems to be different. But of course all the numbers, from 1 to 24 in some way correlate with the consummation number, 24. There is no nineteen, twenty-four in the Book of Numbers. Let us look for other correlations which harmonize with what we have already developed. Numbers i. 24, reads (and their review) "for the sons of Jouda was according to their kinship, according to their houses, according to the houses of their patriæ, according to the numbers of their names (see Apocalypse), according to their head, (the term applied to the Christ in the new covenant Scriptures) namely every male from twenty (2nd conjunction) years of age and upward, every one, namely, who goes his way to the host" (that is to the ability God and Christ gave him).

Again, Numbers vi. 24. "May the Lord have blessed thee and watched to keep thee" (to that day).

Again, Numbers viii. 24. "This is for the Levites. From twenty-five years of age and upward they will go in to do work in the tabernacle of the testimony." Remember the Levites served the royal priesthood.

Again, Numbers xii. 24. "And Moses came out (of the tabernacle) and spake unto the royal people the spoken words of the Lord, and gathered together seventy men from the elders of the royal people and stood them in a circle about the tabernacle." For the interpretation see Apocalypse "the elders about the throne." "The tabernacle of the testimony in heaven." Christ's appointment of "the seventy," etc.

Again, xiii. 24. "And they came as far as the valley of the Grape Cluster and they cried it and they cliff therefrom a branch and a ripe cluster of the grape and bore it upon carrying-poles, and from the pomegranites and from the figs." Interpretation: Fruits in their season and order. "Christ the first-fruits; after that, those who are Christ's at his coming," etc.

Again, Ex. xix. 24. "And the Lord said unto him (Moses), Go, get down and come up thou and Aaron along with thee. But the priests (i. e. the Levites) and the royal people may not be compelled to come up unto God lest perchance the Lord destroy from among them."

Who of these spies afterward entered into possession of "the Valley of the Grape Cluster" and who chose "Mount Ephraim" for his possession? Joshua (Jesus) and Caleb. Who are these typical persons? Let the Word answer as to Caleb. Numbers xiv. 24, "But my servant (child), Caleb, because another spirit was in him, I will lead him into the land into which he hath entered and his seed will inherit it." Is he not Paul's true Israelite?

Again xvi. 24. "Speak unto the synagogue saying, withdraw ye in a circle from the synagogue of Kore." Interpretation: How often God's people are told that they will see the destruction of the rebellious and wicked. When? Read the purport of the 24th cosmic line throughout the Word, the outcome of the blessing and the curse. I might multiply this search, but I will not further tax the patience of my readers and will close with the exhortation of the "Wise Man" who is the type of the truly wise man, and with two cosmic pictures of cities so-called.

Proverbs (Parables) of Solomon xxiv. (Septua.) 24 (xxx. 1 O. V.) "O Son fear my words, and when you have received them repent. Thus saith the man unto those who have faith in God and I pause."

Apocalypse xviii. 24. "And in it (Babylon) was found the blood of prophets and saints and of all those who have been slain upon the earth."

Apocalypse xxi. 24. "And the nations will walk by the light of it, and the kings of the earth will bring their glory into it" (Jerusalem the Holy).

The one "weighed and found wanting," the other "weighed and found equal with righteousness."

And the cosmic line of all these types and pictures to find to be the twenty-fourth. CHAS. GARDNER.

THE STARS AND THE PROMISES.

CONCLUDED.

Such are some of the points of similarity between the star and promises. We will mention some contrasts. Very often the excellency of divine things is more fully brought out in this way than ever in any other. We are ignorant of what the stars really are, or of what is in them; but, as believers, we know what the promises contain. They are full of blessings—are the channels for God's mercy to flow to us; the mirror to reflect God's beauty; and the instruments to change us into his likeness. The duration of the stars may be limited. Whether such passages as 2 Peter iii., Psa. cii. 26, Isa. xli. 6, refer to the starry heavens, we cannot positively say; but this we know, that whatever may change or pass away, God's word shall never pass away. "That endureth forever." The stars are silent as regards any words of kindness or comfort to the sinner. They proclaim God's glory; they tell of his wisdom, power, and greatness; but not a word comes from any of those countless orbs which whispers words of comfort to the mourner. But how eloquent and animating are God's promises! They speak tenderly to the guilty and the wretched; they beget hope in the despondng mind, and strengthen the heart to bear, to suffer, or to dare as circumstances may require.

A person may spend a lifetime studying the stars, and be lost forever; but he who believes God's promises will be saved eternally. (1 John v. 9-11): "Great God! what have I been doing?" exclaimed one on his dying bed, who had spent many years in studying the satellites of Jupiter, and neglected his soul. "The Lord hath made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure, and this is all my salvation and my desire," said a dying saint who had made God's Word his delight. A man may study the stars for years, and remain in poverty; he may even be arrested for debt the day after he has discovered a new planet and "called it after his own name;" but he who gazes on the promises with the eye of faith, may take possession of all that he beholds, and thus become rich for time and eternity—"for godliness has promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." Yes, he may rise by the promises to him who uttered them joyfully singing, "Whom have I in heaven but thee, and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee? My flesh and my heart faileth, but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion forever." To all this may be added the consideration, that while the study of astronomy is costly, difficult, confined necessarily to the learned few, and robbing them of many a night's repose, the study of the promises is free: here the simple shall not err, here the many—yea, all, are welcome to come, and all who come shall find rest to their souls; they shall be blessed with the blessing of Abraham.

Thus the heavens declare God's glory, and the Word reveals his grace. Looking at them both in connection, the deeply humbled and adoring believer exclaims, "What is man, that thou art mindful of him?" "I am poor and needy; yet the Lord thinketh upon me." He is filled with wonder at the vastness and tenderness of God's mindfulness as mirrored forth by the boundless and beautiful heavens, and triumphs in the thought that "He who sitteth on the circle of the earth, and meteth out the heaven with a span, hath said, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee," and calmly says, amidst all trials, changes, and deferings, "I wait on the Lord, my soul doth wait, and in his word do I hope."

In the former part of their observations we saw Abraham walking forth, gazing on the stars, and listening to God's voice. Some two thousand years after that solemn midnight colloquy, one of the patriarch's descendants was found in somewhat similar lonely circumstances, and enjoying also revelations of coming glories. A glance at him may serve to illustrate our subject and encourage our faith. The beloved disciple, who had leaned on his Master's bosom, at the close of one memorable Lord's day, stood in attention as rapt and profound as that of his great progenitor. Sights more glorious than the stars of heaven had passed before his eye, and words more wonderful than even Abraham heard had been poured into his listening ear. The lengthened vision was drawing to a close. The rush of angel's wings—the soundings of trumpets—the voice of mighty thunderings—the melody of innumerable harpers, no longer broke on his ear. The dazzling glories of God's throne, the overwhelming splendor of the New Jerusalem, no longer filled his eye; but one soft voice of surpassing sweetness yet spake to him, and as he reverently listened, one glorious object filled his soul. That voice said, "I am the root and the offspring of David, the bright and morning star. And the Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And, whosoever will, let him come, and take of the water of life freely." . . . "Write; these words are true and faithful." . . . "Behold I make all things new." . . . "He that overcometh shall inherit all things." . . . "He who testifieth these things saith, Surely I come quickly. Amen." The overflowing and longing heart of the favored seer replied, (and may all who lean on Christ, all who rest on God's sure word of promise, have grace to join him), "Even so, come, Lord Jesus." For then shall we see him in whom all the promises are; we shall inherit them, be satisfied with his likeness, and eternally praise the mercy which made the promises, and the faithfulness which fulfilled them.

When Jesus, who is the "morning star," shall be revealed, when "the day star shall arise," (2 Peter i. 19,) three things will be manifested as regards the promises of God; and of all these stars are used as figures in the sacred word. "All Israel shall be saved." Men have doubted whether those who have been wandering stars for so many ages will ever again, as a nation, revolve around a center, or shine in an orbit of beauty and holiness. But that God who spake to Abraham concerning his seed under the figure of the stars of heaven, spake thus concerning them in one of their seasons of national depression: "If these ordinances (of sun, moon, and stars) depart from before me, saith the Lord, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before me forever." Jer. xxxi. 36. This is enough. God who made the stars hath pledged his word, and we wait in faith to hear him say, "Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee." "The Star must arise out of Jacob," the Deliverer must come to Zion, and all of God's promises to Israel be fulfilled.

"Then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory." Isaiah xxv. 8, with 1 Cor. xv. 54. The body "sown in dishonor, will be raised in glory." The clod of dust will become a star. This "vile body will be fashioned like unto his glorious body," "when he shall come to be glorified in his saints." Then also "they that are wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever;" yea, "shine as the sun in the kingdom of their Father."

While we live upon God's promises now, and rejoice in the present portion of strength and comfort which they bring to believers in Jesus, let us look forward and rejoice in hope of salvation of Israel—"our gathering together into Jesus"—the glory—the kingdom—the renewal of creation—and "God in all." "Then," says one, "our position will be found not so much in the promises, as wrapt up in the promiser." To inherit all things will be great indeed; but "I will be his God, and he shall be my son," is greatest of all. "Rejoice we then in God's Word as those that find great spoil;" but most of all let us "rejoice in hope of the glory of God."

Oh, for fellowship with the adoring Psalmist, as he surveyed the wondrous works of God, and exclaimed, "Bless the Lord, O my soul! O Lord my God, thou art become very great, thou art clothed with honor and majesty." His whole subject was before him, the heavens in their grandeur, the earth in its beauty, and all brought from nothingness by God's word of power. Providence supplying all, governing all, was contemplated. And then, the end—the glorious end—a renovated world, a redeemed creation blooming in eternal beauty; and amidst all these wonders and prospects—himself a speck, an atom, a worthless sinner, not overlooked, but cared for, called by grace, pardoned, blessed, comforted, consecrated to God now, and destined to his highest glory. With all this before him, what language so fitting to his lips or to ours who share his blessings and his hope, as "Bless the Lord, O my soul!" May the time soon come when, creation's groanings forever over, all God's works shall praise him and his saints, in whom his word has been fulfilled, eternally bless him. For this they are redeemed—a company "like the stars for multitude"—even to be the leaders of that song the chords of which shall be furnished by all the creation of God, blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever.

"Now from the glories of his throne,
He bends to view this earthly ball;
Hears all, as if that all were one,
Loves one, as if that one were all;
Rolls the swift planets in their spheres,
And counts the sinner's lonely tears."

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Oct. 10, 1883.

SOME communications, besides those specially noticed, are necessarily deferred to future numbers.

BROTHER WEETHEE has sent us four articles on "The Russian Phase of the Eastern Question." As he intends to issue in book form those numbers that have been printed under the head of "The Coming Age," and as we had four of these remaining unprinted at the beginning of this week, we have concluded to issue these at once before commencing withe the Russian Phase.

ARTICLES received: "The Kingdom of Christ"—a Divine, visible Monarchy on Earth Over all Nations, yet not of, this World—by William Lalng, of Edinburgh, Scotland; also, "Our Heavenly Inheritance," by Dr. E. C. Welch, Philadelphia, Pa., are both excellent articles and will appear next week. We are sorry to learn that Brother Welch was taken very sick with hemorrhage of the lungs the very evening he finished writing his article. Our sincere prayer is that God will bless him with a complete restoration to health.

FROM the subjoined note it will be seen that Brother D. Howard and some others have decided to go to Jerusalem. We certainly hope that the most abundant success may attend them. Jerusalem is now the grand centre around which the great events in the literal fulfillment of prophecy will revolve. One thing must be borne in mind. God will see that his word is fulfilled at the right time, and in the precise manner predicted. While we can neither hinder nor hasten the fulfillment of his word we can all work in the sphere his gracious providence assigns us as individuals. Jerusalem will never be decorated in her robes of glory till her King, Messiah, shall come. In Brother Howard we hope for an additional correspondent to THE RESTITUTION. Our readers are all anxious to know what changes are taking place, not only in Jerusalem, but throughout Immanuel's land generally. As to meeting Christ, saints in Jerusalem will have no advantage over others when the Lord comes. His angels will gather his elect from all parts of the globe. Whether living or dead all will be called to meet him in the air when the archangel's trump shall sound the summons. Meanwhile we can scarcely think of a position that anyone can fill that would be productive of more good than to accurately write out the current events as they transpire, in that field,—so rich in its past history—for the benefit of that large class that are looking for our Lord. We are thankful, indeed, to those already there, who have favored us with their welcome communications, and hope for a continuance of their favors. The report alluded to is not worth the space it would occupy.

Editor Restitution:

The enclosed report of a meeting held at 540 Washington St., Boston, appeared in one of the morning papers, Sept. 10, after my arrival here. You probably know that reporters are sometimes not very conscientious in regard to truth, especially when the person or party to be brought before the public is under the ban of public opinion, and especially in this true in religious matters. You may say also that several persons in Boston and vicinity have been making calculations for several years to go to Jerusalem and that two men with their families have concluded to go with me, and perhaps some more will. We expect now to sail from New York about October 13. Brethren and sisters pray for us that the God of Israel will take care of us on the way, and that we may be instrumental in doing something towards making "Jerusalem a praise in all the earth." I believe there is a great deal of work to be done in Jerusalem before it shall become the metropolitan city of the world, and if I shall be instrumental in "gathering out" one stone that is in the way, I shall have accomplished something, perhaps as much as the poor woman did who cast two mites into the treasury. Yours in hope,

DANIEL HOWARD.

BROTHER B. WILSON has replied to a correspondent as to the connection our baptism has with our belief of the gospel. "As both our future life, and our inheriting a part in the kingdom of God are absolutely made dependent upon our resurrection from the dead, it is divinely ordained that the very first act of obedience enjoined upon us as repentant, obedient believers in Christ, should be a "form of this doctrine." Paul teaches us, in an elliptical expression, that we are baptized for the dead—our baptism is emblematical both of the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus Christ, as well as a most forcible representation of our own emergence from death and the grave through him, our glorified Redeemer. It is a fundamental principle of the gospel that eternal life is the gift of God, and that this life is in his Son. As death ends this present Adamic life, our future life in Christ is only attainable through the resurrection. As our birth brings us into the life that now is, so it is our resurrection that brings us into the life to come. The death state lies between these two conditions of life. As we pass out of the present life into death, so we must pass out of death before we can enter into the future life. Neither the natural life through Adam nor the spiritual life through Christ synchronizes with the intermediate death state. Our baptism is a grand pictorial illustration of passing into death, of being in the death state, and of being raised up to the new life. We are placed down into the water, we are, for a brief space, in the water, and we are raised up out of the water. Such a symbol can have no possible connection with the popular error of natural immortality. So it becomes a grand question with all whether they symbolized faith in God's dear Son as the Life-giver when they were baptized or not. And as to the form of baptism as a "form of doctrine" to decide whether sprinkling, pouring, or repeated immersions correctly symbolize a death, burial and resurrection. We leave all to decide the momentous question of perfect obedience to the requirements of our Savior.

Are ye ignorant that so many of us as have been baptized into Christ Jesus have been baptized into his death? Besides we have been buried together with him by baptism into his death, that like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also shall walk in a new life. For seeing we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, certainly we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection. Rom. vi. 3-5, Macknight's translation.

On these texts Macknight says:—"So we shall also walk in a new life. The original phrase, εν καινοτητι ζωης is an Hebraism, and must be translated as I have done, after Beza. 'The new life in which believers are to walk, that is, in which they are to act and enjoy, is a new life after their resurrection."

Faith in Christ as the author of this new life, and baptism, as a form of doctrine emblematical of our transition into that new life are more important matters than many teach and believe. May the Lord give us understanding in all these things, and lead us in the way everlasting.

Communications.

JERUSALEM, Aug. 27, 1883.

Editor Restitution:

Last Sunday was a big day in the valley of Jehoshaphat, for the Greeks and natives generally, it being the anniversary of the death, burial and resurrection of Mary the mother of God; or at least so says Mystery Babylon. No doubt some of your readers will be surprised to hear that the mother of Jesus has had her "resurrection." I must confess I was, but then we are liable to get behind the times "if we don't take the papers."

On the day above named I started for the Kedron, that I might witness the scenes that I had heard were to take place. So I started from our present home, one and three-quarter miles from the Joppa gate, and left Mrs. D. with my little family, she being a little un well, and not able to accompany me, and it is too hot to take the child so that all could go. Well, I arrived on the brink, looking down into the brook, outside the Stephen gate (or the traditional one) after crossing through the city. I saw before me "multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision." I took a seat on a rock in the broiling hot sun, and viewed the scene. It was simply grand. Tents, booths, and people; with loud talk, yelling and laughing. I thought how different this scene to the one on that night so long ago, when the soldiers and those evil men came under cover of night to take and lead away to a mock trial and a horrible death, the best friend they had on earth, and the one who was able to give them eternal life. Again I thought of the night spent by him in prayer just below me. How he plead with the Father, with his face buried in the dust, for help to battle with Satan and the weakness of sinful flesh. Then I thought of the gathering time yet to take place in this valley; and again of how it will be filled up, and the one on the other side causing a very great valley when he shall come and plant his foot upon the mountain before me. Now I walk down to the brook—which is dry at this season of the year—and find a seat under an olive tree which looks to have stood the storms of centuries, and look back. The Turks and Turkish women are out in full force. They love to come out and see these Christians(?) make fools of themselves.

The side of the mountain I have just descended is filling up with people wherever they can find any shade, men by themselves, and women in their sheets. If it was on a dark night I would probably imagine myself in a land of "spooks," for many of them are sitting among the graves of Mohammedan dead.

Now the center of attraction is an underground church (so-called, just to the left of the road after crossing "Kedron," and about three rods from the garden of Gethsemane. The roof of this underground den of idols that I want to take you through, is the surface or top of the ground; and when the brook is up in the rainy season it must pass over a portion of it. I approached the entrance to this place, and ran up against five or six Turkish soldiers. These, of course, are Mohammedans. So I stop and begin to enquire in my own mind the meaning of this. Just above me I see two large tents, one for officers and one for the soldiers; and opposite this twelve stands of arms stacked, ready for use, and the men with their belts on and bayonets ready for use at a moment's notice. Now in few words I will solve the problem. The Greeks own this hole in the ground, while the Latins own the garden. In America these places, if owned by Barnum or Forepaugh, would be called side-shows. They come here with the avowed intent of converting these heathens to Christianity; but because of the envy, pride and covetousness of these poor, deluded souls, these same heathens have to be brought here, a company strong, to keep these Christians from massacring one another.

Now the question arises, what is required to be a Christian? Is it made up of tomfoolery? Is it boys' play? Can we set up our own way of thinking, and follow in the way that our nature would lead us, paying no attention to our Lord's teaching and manner of life, and lay any claim to the name of Christian? I am not finding fault with any one, neither am I writing this for the special benefit of the Latins or Greeks, for they have had their place to fill. Somebody must keep alive idol worship; for we read that after awhile the idols are to be removed from the land. But I would like to get every reader of these lines to take this home, just as I do. Am I worthy to be called a follower of Christ? Am I truly striving each hour and each moment, to more clearly see my defects of character, and to overcome them? Are we "rending our hearts instead of our garments?" Are we living such lives of self-denial and self-debasement as it is quite evident we must do if we may hope for a place in the kingdom of Christ? These, dear reader, are awful times we are passing through, and anything short of a genuine heart-searching work will not do. What then shall be our standard? Oh, let it be that of Jesus of Nazareth! He is our pattern. He was an overcomer. Is there any promise in the word of God for those who are not overcomers for themselves? If some come to you saying that Christ has done it all, there is nothing for you to do, put it down for a fact that he is a false teacher, and say to him, "Get thee behind me, Satan."

Now I will get back to where I left off, and pass these good-natured soldiers, and also a row of monks. Then I descend fifty broad stone steps, each about five inches thick. This brings me to the body of this strange place. About two thousand lights or more are burning, the walls are lined with images, and the lamps, furniture, and paraphernalia have cost perhaps $10,000. The priests are gorgeous in their robes of gold and glitter, the display is just to the fancy of the heathen, and many of them are drawn into this hollow-hearted formality. Just to the right of the foot of the stairway is a tomb, with a white marble slab on which these priests have the effrontery to say Mary was laid. And just back of it they have her image, in silver and gold, decked in silks and glittering jewels, lying in state, on a frame made for the purpose, and just high enough to let one pass through on hands and knees. Sensible-looking men and women are kissing and mock-mourning over this thing made by men's hands. And to show how far humanity can be led to believe a lie, they are told that to crawl under this arrangement is a sure cure and preventive for lame back, and they pass under it by the score. All this on the surface has the appearance of a very solemn occasion, but it is the grandest farce I have ever witnessed.

But the cap-sheaf must now be put on—a scene I had never dreamed of being an eye-witness to—the offering of bread and eatables before idols to be blessed by the patriarchs for during all this performance he has been officiating and receiving the homage and adoration of this people, and the priests fall down on their hands and knees before him, and then rise up, and with heads bowed approach and kiss his hand.

Well, I have become weary of this jam, smoke of incense, and crowd. And now the ceremony of blessing this food is finished, and those whose it is make a grand rush for it. Some get more than their own, while others get none. It made me think of throwing a bucket of corn into a pen of swine.

I will now cross over and enter the garden, and find a seat as near a stone's throw from the crossing of the brook as I can, and let my mind go back to the time when Jesus was here and came to this spot that he too might get away from the throng and vanity of the world, which made his poor heart ache. Tonight my heart's cry is, "Oh, my Savior! how could you stand up to what was given you to suffer?" This sacred spot, this place, the dearest to me of all the earth, is not what it was then. Now it is enclosed by a high wall, and is nicely laid out, and cultivated flowers bloom here all the year. But I think there is no doubt but what it was simply an olive garden then, and as unkept as that time as the rest of the mountain is today. Judging from his object in frequenting this place, we may safely conclude that it was not visited much by the public—for at such times he wanted to be alone.

I have been writing in this way, admitting that this traditional spot is the place, but I don't swallow everything at one gulp, just because these ring-masters crack the whip and say it is a fact. This is the way I reason the matter. The gate that was then used, now closed, leading out from the temple grounds, where Christ was almost invariably to be found prior to seeking this solitude, is about 150 yards below the one we now go out at to descend to the traditional garden. And to pass out that way, and across the brook to the garden would put him in a direct route from the temple to the road leading around to Bethany, while for him to start from the temple for the home of his friends, and pass out of the gate now in use, and leading past "this place" would take him a half mile at least out of his way. This I am sure he would try to avoid after such a day's work as he had passed through. However, the exact spot cannot be located. God never intended that it should be. He wants his creatures to worship him, and not things of his creation. We have been without mail for some time, but I hear that the steamship lines will at once resume regular trips.

This is the first I have written you, save a card, for three or four weeks, one reason being that I have been passing through deep waters; the billows have been rolling over me, and I have felt like it was out of the question to do anything but suffer to the end. God is great, and able to bring it to pass, and I know he liveth, and will cause everything to work together for good, no matter whether it is sunshine or storm.

Editor Restitution:

At the last conference meeting held at Antioch, a resolution was adopted requesting the Board of Directors of the Christian Publishing Association to adopt measures looking to an early compilation and publication of a hymn and tune book suited to the requirements of our people. Recently, Bro. Dwiggins, President of the Board, informed me that it was their desire that I should take charge of the work which had been assigned to the Board; and in response to that request, as well as in pursuance of a purpose entertained for some time, I have commenced the work assigned me.

The intentions or wishes of the Board not having been made known to me, respecting the extent of the proposed publication, that is, the size and general scope of the book, I have assumed that they wish a book as nearly suited to all times and occasions as it is possible to make it with the means at our disposal; one that will supply the general wants of our friends for many years to come. Any other kind of publication would hardly warrant the labor and expense of its publication. Of the kinds gotten up hurriedly, and with a single purpose in view, we have too many already; and to add another to the already large number of such would be to incur needless expense, and increase the confusion existing in many congregations where various kinds of books are in use.

Such a hymn book as has been proposed, should contain as nearly all the good and serviceable hymns and tunes to be found in all other publications as it is possible to make it, considering the great diversity of opinion as to what is good. Such a book need not contain a great number of new hymns or tunes—I mean those of recent composition, for old tunes are new to some people—but should combine the best of all books heretofore published, thus furnishing the music needed at a small expense and in convenient form.

Such a book as is here outlined, should consist of about four hundred pages, the printed part of which should be about seven by four and a half inches. This would afford room for about three hundred tunes and six or seven hundred hymns, which, if properly selected and arranged, would furnish the variety required for every occasion of public or private worship. The print should be large and plain, and the binding in such variety of styles as purchasers might desire. The paper should be strong and durable. The entire work should be electrotyped in order to provide for future editions. The expense of issuing an edition of one thousand may be estimated at eight hundred to a thousand dollars, according to quality of paper and binding. If thought best, the first edition could be printed directly from the type, and the expense reduced. These figures are only general estimates, and are possibly above what the actual cost will be.

I shall probably be able to submit to the Directors at their meeting to be held in this city in November, definite figures as to the cost of the work. Those of our friends who have favorite hymns and tunes which they would like to see in the new book, are requested to forward them to me as soon as convenient. So far as the character of the proposed work will allow, their wishes shall be respected. When compiled, the copy for the work will be submitted to the Board of Directors or to such committee as may be chosen, for revision, that the work may be a representative of the faith and spirit of our brethren. Yours for the truth.

Editor Restitution:

I wish to say through our paper, that there are a few of us here who are trying, by precept and example, to demonstrate that we believe the gospel of Christ, which is the power of God unto salvation, in antithesis to the law that pointed to Christ. I have been a Sabbatarian, and was a great stickler for the law, but have been made sensible of the fact that the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus have made—those that were subject to the law—free from the law of sin and death. I through the Providence of God, gave three discourses Sunday, July 29. Subjects—The kingdom of God yet future, to be established on the earth, with the Christ its head, and all overcomers of ages co-rulers with him over the nations of earth, conquering, subduing, and blessing them. 2. As a means to this end, the restoration of the twelve literal tribes of Israel to their own land, as the immediate subjects, while the dominion is from sea to sea, and from the rivers unto the ends of the earth. Or as Daniel has it, "Under the whole heavens." Glorious themes! 3. The law covenants: or, was Adam amenable to Israel's law—the law of ten commandments,—given to Israel at Horeb, which Moses says was not made with the fathers. Deut. v. 1-3. We, in time past, when our attention was called to the fact that Moses affirms that "God made not this covenant with our fathers," said that the covenant spoken of here was not the ten commandments, but a verbal agreement made between God and the children of Israel, through Moses. This reply seemed to put a quietus on further inquiry, notwithstanding the Scriptures plainly teach that the covenant here spoken of is clearly the ten commandments. See Deut. iv. 13. We admitted, for the sake of argument, that it was not the ten commandments but must be understood as referring to the verbal agreement spoken to Moses, he to the people.

What was this verbal agreement or covenant? "Thus shalt thou say to the house of Jacob, and tell the children of Israel." Not Adam, Abraham, or Isaac. "If you will obey my voice indeed and keep my covenant, then (not before) ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people."

Now this is a proposition of God, the first party, to Israel, the second party. If Israel consents to the proposition, it then forms the compact—verbal agreement or covenant—to be ratified by the mediator, Moses. "And all the people answered together, All that the Lord hath spoken will we do."

This then is the covenant which Sabbatarians say is the one Moses refers to when he says "The Lord our God made not this covenant with our fathers." That is God did not require the fathers to obey his voice or to keep his covenant (the ten commandments) Sabbatarians being judges.

The Importance of Following the Lord.

At the present time it is considered no disgrace to make a profession of religion: persons may have their names enrolled in a church book, and yet go hand in hand with the world. Alas! is it not to be found that many are satisfied with a mere form of godliness? While the form is right enough in its place, we ought to see that we also possess the life and power of religion, and that we are Christians, not only in word and profession, but in spirit and in truth. This should be the sole business of our lives. The true Christain is not content with a name to live, he wants to have his sins washed away in the atoning blood of Christ,—he contends earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints, and can say with the Psalmist, "My soul followeth hard after thee;" and, again, "as the hart panteth after the water brook, so panteth my soul after thee, O God." Psa. lxiii. 8; xlii. 1.

It is characteristic of the Christian that he follows the Lord. We read that Joshua and Caleb "followed the Lord fully," (Num. xiv. 24;) they felt they were able to go up and inherit the goodly land, and were of a different spirit from their brethren. The church of God in this age may well be compared to the Israelites while journeying to the promised land, and as many of them were not permitted to enter it, because they yielded to the blinding sin of unbelief, so Christians now have reason to fear, lest they fall after the same example of unbelief, and come short of entering into that rest which remaineth for the people of God.

The genuine Christian is not satisfied with present attainments. He follows on to know the Lord, whose going forth is as the morning; and he knows aright is life eternal. We should follow those who through faith and patience inherit the promises. Paul addressing his brethren in Corinth, required them to be followers of him as he also was of Christ, 1 Cor. xi. 1; so we should imitate great men now, as far as they walk in Christ's footsteps—but if they step aside from the path of duty, let us not follow them. Our motto should ever be, Onward—though faint, yet pursuing. The child of God does not live for himself alone,—he seeks the good of others; he realizes that he is not his own, but bought with a price, even with the precious blood of Christ, and wishes to present his body a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto God; he feels that this world is not his rest,—his eye is fixed on the bright and better land, he presses forward, towards the mark, for the prize of his high calling in Christ Jesus; he wishes to live in love and peace, and to exert a holy influence on all around him. While journeying to the Holy City, he feels that it is a pre-paid place for a prepared people, and therefore strives for holiness of heart. To use the language of Rowe—

"We are journeying onward to a pure land, to a new earth; but meantime, we are carefully to see that our persons and circumstances be pure. No sight is more peculiar, and perhaps more attractive to the eye of angels and of God, than holiness in full bloom, though springing up from the soil of a cursed earth! Such a magnificent plant, with such waste lands, and barren clay, and rocky soil all around! This recalls the image of the Son of man, when in Nazareth he grew up before him as a tender plant. Oh, seek to be holy in heart and life, in circumstances and situation! Breathe holiness from within, and breathe her lines on all around! Send a fragrant gale of holiness along the wild desert; it may awaken the pace of some weary, miserable wanderer, as the spices breathed from Araby the blessed, delay the ship that passes by. Send up the incense of holiness to the Lord, giving him back his own; and let it be known above that the Spirit also goeth to and fro in all the earth, striving with men, has found a dwelling place in some souls, and has begun to create a heaven before."—Clarke's Commentary on Leviticus, p. 209.

Change of Address.

IRA D. POTTER has just removed from Skookum Chuck, Washington Territory, to Weston, Umatilla Co., Oregon. His friends will make a note of this.

B. S. POOLE has moved from Waterloo, Iowa, to Norfolk, Neb., and wishes any brethren who live near him to communicate with him, or any one passing there to call.

SELECTED MISCELLANY.

LIFE A FESTIVAL.

In home life there should be no jar, no striving for place, no insisting on prerogatives, or division of interests. The husband and the wife are each the complement of the other. And it is just as much his duty to be cheerful as it is hers to be patient, his right to bring joy into the door, as it is hers to sweep and garnish the pleasant interior. A family where the daily walk of the father makes life a festival is filled with something alike heavenly benediction.—Congregationalist.

A COACH LOAD OF SKELETONS.

A special dispatch from Lampasas, Texas, says that a carriage containing the skeletons of three adults and two children, sitting upright as if in life, under a large tree, has been found near a road in Llano county. The tree was shattered by lightning, and it is supposed the carriage was driven under the tree for shelter, and was struck, the bolt killing the inmates and the horses. The weather-beaten appearance of the carriage and its trimmings, indicate that the event happened a year or two ago. In a small trunk was a letter addressed to James G. Chamberlin, London, England. The discovery was made by a ranchman driving cattle. The spot where they were found is far from any habitation.

FOOTPRINTS OF PAST AGES.

Heavy stone blocks lately taken from the Portland freestone quarry about eighty feet below its top, bear some remarkable fossil footprints of birds and beasts. A lower stratum has the depression caused by the steps of the antediluvian animals which roamed this region when the sea reached the place, and the next lying stratum took a cast of the marks in projection. One of these tracks measures fifteen inches by eleven, and was probably made by some animal of the elephantine species, although the footprint is larger than that which would be made by an elephant of the present age. There are three of these tracks in a slab about a yard wide and two yards long. Another slab ten feet long, has the impress in relief of part of a tree trunk. The tree, from its shaggy bark, is thought to have been a hickory.—New Haven Register.

HAVE COURAGE.

There are times in one's life when all the world seems to turn against us. Our motives are misunderstood, our words misconstrued; malicious smiles reveal to us the unfriendly feelings of others. Oh! how hard it all seems, and the more so that we cannot divine the cause. Courage, patience, disconsolate one! God is making a furrow in your heart, where he will sow his grace. It is rare, when injustice or slights personally borne, do not leave the heart at the close of the day filled with marvellous joy and peace.—Words of Faith.

Knowledge is, indeed, that which next to virtue truly and essentially raises one man above another. It finishes one half of the human soul. It makes being pleasant to us, fills the mind with entertaining views, and administers to it a perpetual series of gratifications. It gives ease to solitude, and gracefulness to retirement.—Addison.

MAKE ME A LILY, LORD.

L. M. FOX.

Make me a lily in thy garden, Lord,
Where thou most feed;
Let me but trust and grow into thy word,
To follow still thy lead.
If but to watch and wait
Be still to serve,
Oh, plant me in that state
Nor let me swerve,

Make me a lily in thy garden, Lord!
Little indeed,
But planted in thy kind and loving grace,
Content, if need,
With humble store of sunshine or of dew,
So that it come
From him who daily will my faith renew
And bid me bloom.

Make me a lily in thy garden, Lord!
If it may be,
Blest with thy boldsome power to shed abroad
Sweetness of thee;
Yet plant me here, tho' ever be denied
The bliss to shed
One ray of light or sweetness till the hour
When I am dead.

For if a lily in thy garden, Lord,
My dying hour
Would surely with a glad, triumphant strain
Burst into flower,
Confess it long had sought
To do thy will;
In pain and grief of heart
Loving thee still.

Thy lilies all are mine!
By thee they live;
Through thee their sunbeams shine;
Thou their sweet rain dost give.
How can they then but grow
Still like to thee?
A lily in thy garden, Lord,
Oh, let me be!

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—Second Series, Number 80.

THE SHRINES OF NAPHTALI AND CITIES OF PHŒNICIA.

"Where to thy favored haunt, eternal voice,
The region of the choice,
Where, undisturbed by sin and earth, the soul
Owns thy entire control?
'Tis on the mountain's summit dark and high,
Where storms are blustering by!
'Tis where the strong found utters of the earth,
Where torrents have their birth."

The Naphtalites were the highlanders of Palestine. Their territory was a prolongation of "that goodly mountain, Lebanon," separated from the main chain by the narrow ravine of the Leontes. Their shrines and strongholds were high up, amid mountain fastnesses; but their pastures stretched down to the banks of the Jordan, and their corn-fields lay along the sunny shores of the Sea of Galilee. Within their borders there was more variety of scenery and climate than in any of the other tribes. The plain of Gennesaret by the lake is seven hundred feet below the level of the ocean. Tropical heat and eternal summer reign there. The soil is of surpassing fertility, yielding the choicest fruits, and producing the rarest flowers. Even old Josephus, usually so dull and prosy, waxes eloquent under the inspiration of the richness and beauty of this noble plain. Then the green meadows along the sacred river, and the verdant slopes and downs above, rival in luxuriance the pastures of Bashan on the opposite bank.

And when we climb the wooded mountain sides that shut in the Jordan valley, we find ourselves on a wide expanse of table land, two thousand feet and more above the sea. The scenery is here charming—altogether different from the bleak hills and rugged glens of the south, where the vine and the olive are at home upon rocky terraces. Here are alluvial plains covered with waving corn; long, undulating ridges, and graceful rounded hill-tops, clothed with the evergreen foliage of the oak and terebinth; while thickets of aromatic shrubs and velvety lawns of verdant turf spangled with flowers, fill up the forest glades. Then there are glens—long, winding, densely wooded glens—with tiny streams murmuring among rocks, and playing with oleander flowers, away down in deep, shady beds. The mountain sides are all fringed with these glens—so retired, so musical, so fragrant, so wildly picturesque, that one is never weary wondering through them, or reclining in their sequestered dells. If nature could influence mind, if it could create genius, Naphtali would be a land of poets. There the mind receives by every avenue all that tends to delight, to ennoble, to inspire. The fresh, mountain breezes are laden with perfumes—"the smell of Lebanon." The ear is filled with melody—the song of birds; the murmur of waters; the music of the forest as the tempest sweeps its wild chords, or the zephyr touches, as with seraph's finger, its softest notes. And the eye revels amid nature's choicest scenes—the soft, park-like beauty of upland plain, the picturesque loveliness of winding vale and glen, and the grandeur of Hermon and Sebapon, whose snow-crowned peaks rise far overhead, now cradling the storm-clouds of winter, now distilling the dews of summer. Can it be that the heaven-inspired David, looking into the distant future, saw Naphtali placed amid these ennobling landscapes, and indicated its effects in the prophetic blessing, "He uttereth words of beauty"? Gen. xlix. 21. And is it so that the war-song of Barak—one of the finest odes in the Bible—is an example of these "words of beauty," and has been handed down to us as a specimen and proof of Naphtali's poetic genius?

Naphtali also teems with animal life. I was always deeply impressed with the solitude of southern Palestine. The words of Jeremiah constantly recurred to my mind as I rode across desolate plains and among desolate hills, "It is desolate, without man and without beast." Jer. xxxii. 43. Men, beasts, and birds, seem alike to have deserted it. In Naphtali all is different. True, man is almost a stranger there also; but down by the Jordan the pastures are covered with droves of kine and buffaloes; and the jungles are filled with wild swine; and the surface of lake and river is all astir with fowl. The mountain glens are infested with leopards, hyenas, and jackals; and troops of fleet gazelles scour the upland plains.

MOSES' BLESSING TO NAPHTALI.

The Jewish lawgiver saw in prophetic vision the country in store for Naphtali, and in poetic imagery sketched its leading features. Unfortunately our English version cloaks rather than reveals the graphic touches of the Hebrew. I shall try to bring out the true meaning. The blessing is an exclamation; as if, with eye opened, the seer had been enraptured by the sudden exhibition of a bright and joyous picture: "O Naphtali, satisfied with favor, filled with the blessing of Jehovah, possess thou the sea and Darom." Deut. xxxiii. 23. "Possess thou the sea," that is, the Sea of Galilee with its sunny, fertile shores; "and Darom," the proper name of the mountain district, the highlands, probably so called from the southern aspect and bright landscapes.*

How expressive are these words! They throw light too on a somewhat obscure passage in the New Testament. When our Lord left his native Nazareth, and made Capernaum his home, and the country around, the scene of his miracles and his teachings, Matthew says—and here again, in order to bring out the full meaning of the sacred writer, I must somewhat alter our English version, usually so correct and so beautiful—"And, leaving Nazareth he came and dwelt in Capernaum, which is upon the sea coast, in the borders of Zabulon and Nephthalim: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Isaiah the prophet, saying: The land of Zebulon and the land of Nephthalim, the region of the sea, Perœa, Galilee of the Gentiles, the people which sat in darkness saw great light." Matt. iv. 13-16. Here, be it observed, the district called "the region of the sea," is the same which Moses calls "the sea," and "Galilee of the Gentiles" was the name given in the time of Isaiah and of our Lord to the more ancient "Darom."—J. L. Porter.

*The English version has, instead of "the sea and Darom," "the west and the south." The Hebrew word for the west is also applied to the "west," because the sea was the western boundary of Palestine; and the word Darom, though in this passage a proper name, also signifies "the south," or "a southern region." Thus the error in translation originated; an error which the geographer Adrian could detect and correct.

A beloved brother sends us something more—in addition to what we have already published—concerning "A Jordan Valley Canal." We submit it to our readers, as we design to keep them fully posted on what takes place in the Orient. As to Shapira's Manuscript, we have seen varied opinions about it, and we await the final decision of scholars competent to judge in these difficult matters. The Independent gave a portion of it in the Hebrew text lately, but in the square character. The editor of this journal thinks it is a fraud.

A JORDAN VALLEY CANAL.

A lecture was delivered by Capt. Molesworth, R. N., a few days ago, on the proposed Jordan canal, with special reference to the question of facilitating the communications between England and India. In commencing the lecturer said a telegram had just been received from the Sultan, saying that he looked very favorably on the scheme of a sea route to India by way of a Jordan canal. From Malta to Port Said was 1130 miles, and from Malta to Acre 1245 miles, making a difference in that respect of 115 miles. The idea was to cut a canal which would be 25 miles from Acre to the valley of the Jalud, and they would then get into the valley of the Jordan. That canal would be about 33 feet deep, so that it would take the largest ships; it would be about 200 feet wide, and therefore would allow vessels to pass each other freely; there would be no necessity for any locks, because when water was let in the water of the Dead Sea and that of the Mediterranean would practically be on the same level to the gulf of Akabah, and so on into the Red Sea.

The scheme was not thought much of until the difficulty with regard to the Suez canal cropped up; but now that the traffic between England and India and our other dependencies had so enormously increased, it was necessary that a much larger passage to and from the east should be provided for our ships. The depth of the water at Acre was sufficient, and the cutting of the projected canal seemed to present no great engineering difficulties—none which engineering science and skill could not surmount. There would be about 81,000,000 yards of stone and earth to take out, and what would be removed would go to form a suitable harbor for the protection of vessels. Comparing the new scheme with the Suez canal, the gallant officer remarked that, while ships had to be made to suit the Suez canal, any vessel would be able to pass through the Jordan canal. Although the distance would be greater by the latter, the difference being 117 miles, that would be more than compensated for by the saving of time, the estimated rate of travelling being 16 miles an hour, there being no wash, against four or five in the Suez canal. The saving of time would be about two days. A company had been formed, and the cost was estimated at £8,000,000, but if it amounted to £20,000,000, the advantage would still be greatly in favor of the ship owners. The expense of maintaining the Suez canal was enormous, while in the case of the Jordan canal it would be next to nothing, as there was a natural valley nearly 10 miles wide, and, as he had before remarked, no wash, wash being very mischievous to the Suez canal. Of course, nothing could be done until a survey had been made, but he understood that a surveying expedition would soon be sent out.—Boston Herald, Sunday, Sept. 2, 1883.

SHAPIRA'S DEUTERONOMY — COULD A SHEEPSKIN MANUSCRIPT LAST FOR 3000 YEARS.

The interest both of scholars and the general public appears to be increasing with regard to the important questions raised by this manuscript, says the London News, and, as might have been expected, very diverse opinions are expressed with regard to its genuineness and value. Whatever may be the verdict eventually found, there can be no doubt that the arrival of the manuscript in this country will be long memorable in the history of literature. Dr. Ginsburg's work of examination and decipherment is not likely to be completed for two or three weeks; and meanwhile it may be well to hesitate before expressing an unqualified judgment. The manuscript, it should be remembered, is not written in the ordinary square Hebrew characters, with the form of which, as used in printed Bibles, most educated persons are familiar, but in older and more irregular characters, resembling the Phœnician. In the decalogue, there is a mark of separation between the words, but not in other parts of the manuscript. These facts, however, would present little difficulty to a scholar so well versed as Dr. Ginsburg is in Semitic palæography. Much more serious obstacles are presented by the state of the manuscript, the writing in some places being legible only in a particular light and with a lens of high magnifying power. For the present, probably to prevent the interruption of Dr. Ginsburg's labors, both the learned and, unlearned have to content themselves with inspecting two out of the leather slips on which the manuscript is written. These, under special supervision, are exhibited from 10 to 4 o'clock in a glass case placed in the King's library in the British Museum.

A few days ago the present writer had an opportunity of more closely examining a portion of the manuscript, which certainly wore the appearance of an antiquity. But in these days, when, like many other arts, the manufacture of antiquities is carried to great perfection, such an appearance requires to be regarded with a good deal of caution. Mr. Sayce has, indeed, just expressed the opinion that it is utterly unreasonable to suppose that in a climate so damp as that of Palestine any sheepskin could possibly have lasted for nearly 3000 years, even though "abundantly salted with asphalt from the vale of Siddim." But, according to Mr. Shapira's account, the manuscript was found in caves at a considerable altitude from the ground, protected, moreover, by an external covering, which, we may presume, was coated with asphalt. Under these circumstances it is scarcely possible to say how long a manuscript written on sheepskin might endure, even in the climate of Palestine. A doubt has been suggested by Mr. Shapira's assertion that the sheik who some five years ago informed him of the existence of the manuscript died soon after, and that all trace of the man who, under the sheik's direction, brought successive portions of it to Mr. Shapira, has been completely lost. But the time of the sheik's death could doubtless be ascertained without much difficulty; and it can scarcely be regarded as a thing quite unprecedented that an Arab should be lost sight of. Still, as according to Mr. Shapira's narrative the existence of the manuscript had been known long before to several Arabs, it would be desirable, in a matter of so great importance, that some inquiry should be made.

One considerable argument in favor of the genuineness of the manuscript results from the fact that it agrees with no school of theological or critical opinion. A forger, with profit in view, might have been expected to bring his work into accord with the views of some sect or party, so as to secure for it a more ready reception. But it is said that, if the manuscript is a forgery, it could not have been forged by a single man, but that there must have been a conspiracy of several persons, some of them proficient in Semitic learning and in Biblical criticism. The public will await with great interest the completion of Dr. Ginsburg's examination and the delivering of his judgment.

Mr. Shapira, who has been endeavoring to sell the English government a so-called Moabite edition of the book of Deuteronomy, seems to have overshot his mark in a great degree, in consequence of the exhorbitant price that he asked for his supposed treasure. No sensible government would think of paying $3,000,000 for an alleged antique, unless its authenticity could be verified beyond the possibility of a doubt. In this case, the leather book has been subjected to a vast amount of criticism—most of it, unfortunately for Mr. Shapira, of an adverse character. One or two well-known European scholars have been so bold as to assert that the text is full of grammatical blunders and unclassical idiom; and that it bears in its verbal, no less than in its material, construction, the positive evidences of fraud. Mr. Shapira is the man who discovered what was called the "Moabite Stone," which, at the time, was held to confirm the authenticity of certain Biblical statements. It is to be feared that, if biblical history is to be based upon Mr. Shapira's findings, it will but rest on a tottering support; for this gentleman seems to have the attributes of an accomplished but unscrupulous swindler.—Boston Herald, Saturday, Sept. 8, 1883.

RETURN OF THE JEWS.

There can be no thoughtful man but must be struck by the rapid march of events in these days. We almost look for something startling whenever we take up our daily newspaper, and seldom are we disappointed.

These are no ordinary times, any statesman would tell you. Every student of the word of God feels the same. He sees in the march of events the end of the dispensation.

One of those most marked in Scripture is when the Jews shall be gathered once again to their own native land of Palestine, from whence they were driven by the hand of God for their sins, and rebellion, and rejection of Christ, and their crucifying him, though their true Messiah.

There is a wonderful growth of "self will." Self-opinion is strong. A determination to overthrow all authority; naught can hold its place but by the strong arm. Respect for authority is fast vanishing. Blessed be God, the curb of power is not yet broken. The swelling waters have not yet burst the barriers. The cry seems to be, "Who is lord over us?"

The Jew has for years been unmolested. His social position in most lands has been greatly improved. As his position has improved, so have his native talents brightened. As a nation, they look to all the powers, other gifted nations, possess. Key in places placed on canal routes, they generally outshine others. This is not pleasing discontent. There is a little rivalry in Germany, just unpleasant. It is, though, thank God, no critical has taken place to outrage and oppress the Jew. Yet this may happen yet.

But in Russia she hatred has broken out in wicked and abominable deeds, that will ever leave a stain on Russia's history—deeds such as wild and barbarous nations would scarcely have committed, but which a nation, calling itself Christian, should blush even to think of.

But why these troubles? God has permitted them, and will bring good out of all this evil. The Jews, during these years of quiet, have been growing in wealth and prosperity. In Germany they have taken the highest positions by their ability.

In Russia, amid a nation abounding in drunkenness and waste, for the two ever go hand in hand, the Jews—that thrifty and temperate people—were able to take advantage of the intemperate and wasteful nation, and did so by lending on mortgage on their lands and houses. One reason of this outbreak doubtless has been to seize again their lost lands—lost by their drunkenness and sin—by the hands of violence and murder; by fire and sword, and thus deprive the rightful owner of his own.

But God is using it for good. He is teaching the Jew that he is to call no land his own but one, the gift of God to his forefathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. He has never recalled his gift and never will. The land—the Promised land—is theirs forever by the word and oath of God; and it shall assuredly be theirs, as sure as God is God, and has pledged his word.

You may ask, Are there any signs of such a movement? I answer yes, very decided signs. I was in Jerusalem, in 1855, and then Jews were gathering, but the troubles in Russia have driven many more there. They are beginning to feel that that land is theirs. They are settling and beginning, with very spade in hand, to cultivate their own fatherland, and to rejoice in feeling and knowing that it is their very own fatherland.

At present they are supported and paid by the missionaries of our Jews' Society. But a meeting was called at Mildmay, with Lord Shaftesbury in the chair, to see if land might not be purchased in Palestine, and let out to Jews in small portions as small tenants. Thus may we be approaching almost insensibly—and by what may appear to many the ordinary course of events, but to every thoughtful mind—the fulfillment of the prophecies, as where Isaiah says (xi. 11), "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea." This is the beginning of the end.

These are the times of "the golden dreams of the poet; for when he shall be Christ their Messiah, and they shall be gathered believingly by him, then shall ward cease, a long universal peace shall follow of one thousand years. "Then shall the wolf dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together, and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together; and the lion shall eat straw like the ox; and the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." These things, my brethren, are at hand; let us be on our watch and ready, that that day take us not unaware.—Le Romaine Gozzi, in Prophetic News.

Danger of Circulating Libraries.

An alarming piece of news comes from Paris. It is stated that an official at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs there has been attacked with yellow fever, communicated to him through a despatch from Brazil. This, if true, is a startling occurrence. We have repeatedly warned our readers against the danger of disseminating diseases by means of books and toys. We believe circulating libraries are common sources of peril; and that many grave and even fatal illnesses may be traced to their agency. Books, especially of the "entertaining" class, are read by sick persons, either in bed when recovering from fevers, or during convalescence, when perhaps some chest affection still has a cough infects the atmosphere. It is probably impossible to guard against this, because the organic particles which carry the infection or contagion may lie for weeks, months, or perhaps years, between the pages of a bound book, to be dislodged at some unpropitious moment, when the volume chances to be handled by some susceptible person. It would be difficult to imagine a more powerful apparatus for the conveyance of disease than a book. Among the maladies most easily communicable by this agency may be mentioned measles, scarlet fever, diphtheria, ordinary "sore" throat, whooping cough, bronchitis, (perhaps phthisis), and other chest affections in the course of which the lungs may be giving off poisonous breath and expectoration, and disorders in which the skin is the seat of abnormal changes, or may be throwing out infective material. In short, all that can be communicated is more likely to be communicated by a book than in any other way. It is obviously impracticable to disinfect books without injuring them, and the plain inference must be that circulating libraries are to be regarded as possible centers for the dissemination of disease, and that all books used by the sick should be destroyed immediately after use. Disease may be communicated by dispatches, letters, or books. It is well that this should be more generally recognized.—Lancet.

THE SORER PUNISHMENT.

If he that despised Moses' law died without mercy, etc., of how much sorer punishment shall he be thought worthy that hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and counted the blood of the covenant an unholy thing, etc.?

1. Despisers of Jesus Christ and his gospel will be punished more severely than despisers of the law of Moses.

2. How severely were despisers of Moses' law punished?

Their death was not merely an Adamic death, not a natural, but an inflicted judgment death. If apostates and despisers are to be punished more severely, when, how and where are they to be punished? It does not seem to be true that they are punished in this life, or that merely a natural Adamic death is such a punishment. Is it not necessary that the class spoken of be raised from the dead for a judgment punishment?

These questions meet those who say this class are not to be raised from the dead.

Editor Restitution:

It may be interesting to some of the readers of THE RESTITUTION to be told that in the great city of Manchester a few have made a start, in a lowly "upper room," in the work of declaring to any who may answer to our invitation the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus the Anointed. Our platform is the word, and we purpose to stand on this sure platform. It is a solid rock.

Let us not be forgotten in the prayers of the true ones. Although, but few come, we have some encouraging results. Manchester is a mass of greed, wealth, corruption, poverty, misery, infidelity. Its churches and chapels are as many in proportion as elsewhere, perhaps. But the form without the power is apparent enough.

CIRCULAR.

To the Students of Prophecy throughout the World:

The undersigned proposes to issue from the press, either in Chicago or in New York City, as circumstances may decide, the following works, to-wit:

I. The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. In the first division the nature of the Coming Age is fully discussed, as to its physical and moral character: 1. That the earth itself has a crowning age, in which it shall be perfectly adapted to be the residence of man in his highest type; 2. That man, in that resurrection state, will be under the endless reign of the Personal Messiah; 3. In establishing the proximity of that age, the prophecies of Ezekiel, Isaiah, Daniel, Zechariah, Christ, Paul, Peter, and the Apocalypse, are critically examined, relative to its rapid approach.

II. The second work will be devoted to the investigation of the various phases of the Eastern Question:—1. The Egyptian phase, 2. The British phase, 3. The Russian phase, 4. The Ottoman phase, 5. The Hebrew phase, 6. The American phase, 7. Lesser phases of the Eastern Question, 8. The location of each of the Great Powers in the coming contest, 9. All nations marshal under the banners of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. These powers are traced in history to the present time. All the great national issues are fully investigated.

If all that are interested in these great and most sublime topics will aid, they will be issued immediately. They will be printed and bound in a form that will do credit to the vastness of the subjects, and put to subscribers at prices quite reasonable. The books will contain about 500 large royal 8vo. pages each.

THE RELATION OF YEARS.

D. V. HARVEY.

The toil and weary passing years,
The changes of eventful life,
The throbbing heart, the anxious fears,
Are elements of earthly strife.

These leave their impress on the man,
They tell upon the strongest powers;
And all our wisdom in life's plan
Is measured by the fleeting hours.

To live with high and holy aim,
And truly walk with God each day,
Believing godliness is gain,
Will gently smooth life's rugged way.

But if life's storms are dark and wild,
And keen and cold the raging blast,
The Father sweetly says, "My child,"
These ill will soon be overpast.

These earthly years shall yet unfold
The depth of the eternal love;
More than experience yet has told
The ways of God with us shall prove.

The record of these fleeting years
Is kept by an unerring pen,
To be revealed when Christ appears,
To fix the destiny of men.

Time passes on, with gain and loss,
The grain seems little, losses great;
But simple lessons of the Cross
Years of soul-hunger satiate.

If in this future life we know
The mystery of things divine
We shall regard our years below
As epochs in the land of time.

"SHALL I HOLD TO MY FORMER BAPTISM?"

This is a question asked by J. R. Ham, of Pleasant Hill, Miss., a reader of THE RESTITUTION, and I am requested by the editor to answer the same. I do so with pleasure because I know of others who are in the same situation as the inquirer, and who would be glad to have a little light shed upon the subject. Some thirty-five years ago I was holding on to a former (Campbellite) baptism, doing so partly because I had been baptized "for the remission of sins," and partly because I esteemed baptism a sacred ordinance, and I did not wish to do a work of supererogation. So in this matter I can sincerely sympathize with our friend. I also believed from childhood even until I joined the Baptist church, that immersion was the only mode of baptism, and that it was the duty of all Christians to be thus baptized. Inquirer says: "I formerly was a Methodist, was baptized by a Methodist preacher; I believe in immersion, and no other mode." Then after being a Methodist for several years, got a little more light and joined the Campbellites; "holding to my former baptism, seeing that the Scriptures teach one faith, one Lord, one baptism."

It is true that there is only "one baptism" recognized as of any account by the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ. Of course that baptism is the immersion of the individual in water. I believe all right-minded, candid, and honest Bible readers will admit that water baptism is the "one baptism" referred to, although some say that it is the baptism of the Spirit. None but infant sprinklers will deny that immersion must be preceded by faith; or in other words, that a person must believe the gospel in order to be a fit and proper subject for immersion. This is such a plain proposition that scarcely any one will question its truth. Jesus gave the terms of salvation and the apostles carried out the plan. When individuals believed the gospel, then they were baptized. Hence we read, "when they believed Philip preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized, both men and women." Acts viii. 12. Faith first, then baptism, is the gospel order. The question arises, what kind of faith, or a belief of what? Will a Methodist or Presbyterian faith do? Or a Campbellite? I say, yes, if it can be Scripturally proved that either of them has the "one faith." It is a belief of the "one faith," the faith which was "once delivered to the saints," or "the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ," which gives validity to baptism. Without this faith however often a person may have been immersed, he has not submitted to the "one baptism." An individual may be taught to believe that Jesus is a Savior, that he died to save sinners, that he rose again for their justification; and be exhorted to pray for forgiveness, and trust in Jesus for salvation, and yet be in total darkness as to the gospel. And yet Paul writes to the Romans—"I am not ashamed of the gospel; for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." Rom. i. 16. But if we are ignorant of this gospel, how can it be God's power for our salvation? The gospel is good news about the kingdom of God, which Jesus and his disciples preached to the Jews before the crucifixion—the gospel they were called upon to believe, and commanded to seek after. Jesus said, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness." Mat. vi. 33. He also taught his disciples to pray for the kingdom to come—taught them the nature of the kingdom, illustrated its character in parables, showed who should inherit it, and what it was necessary to do in order to enter it, and finally told his disciples that this gospel of the kingdom should be preached in all the world before the end came. Mat. xxiv. 14. Not a word about his death and resurrection in this gospel. After Jesus was crucified and arose from the dead, he commissioned his apostles to preach the gospel to all nations, and to be witnesses to all of his death and resurrection. They did so; and all who believed their testimony concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus, were baptized for the remission of their sins.

Now compare this faith and practice of the early Christians with modern faith and practice. Are they the same? What sect or denomination preaches or believes the ancient gospel, and there is not one in one hundred of them that can give you a Scriptural answer. Then how can they instruct the ignorant, or act as guides to the blind? And no wonder that they know not the gospel when in a great measure they are ignorant of the nature of God and his Son Jesus Christ—ignorant of the nature and destiny of man, and the world he inhabits—and consequently teaching only a man-made system of religion for the salvation of the race. Can anything be substituted for God's truth with safety? And is the belief and practice of an error as good as the truth? Remember, no change can be made in the gospel without bringing a curse upon the preacher. See Gal. i. 6-9. Jesus said, "Take heed what you hear." Again, he said, "if the blind lead the blind, both will fall into the ditch." How careful then should each one be in the matter of salvation! "Try the spirits, whether they be of God."

Now more particularly to our friend's question—"Shall I hold to my former baptism?" The "former baptism" was, as I understand the writer, an immersion in water whilst he was a Methodist and performed by a Methodist preacher. He was immersed because he was a believer in immersion being the proper mode. The writer does not tell us what he believed at the time of his immersion, nor why he submitted to the ceremony. But being a Methodist for several years, I presume he believed as Methodists generally do. Salvation by faith alone is one prominent doctrine of that sect. Faith in Jesus as a Savior—faith in his atoning sacrifice—faith in him as God the Son, the second person in the Trinity. Methodists believe in the Trinity—God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost; not three Gods, but one God; self-existent, equal, and coeternal. They believe in the immortality of the soul—the conscious existence of the soul or spirit at death—the eternal torment of the wicked in hell, etc. They believe that a sinner can obtain forgiveness of sins by prayer and faith in Jesus. Then Methodist I presume our inquirer obtained what is called pardon in that manner, and then attended class meeting on trial to prove his conversion, then was immersed and joined the church. The question arises—why was he baptized? He could not have been baptized for the remission of sins, because he professed to be forgiven already. He could not like Paul, have been baptized to wash away his sins, for he professed to have had them already washed away in the blood of Jesus. Besides, he was entirely ignorant of the gospel of the kingdom of God, which is the power of God unto salvation to the believer; therefore he had no faith. Being destitute of the faith he could not please God by any act which he might perform which was not required of him. We read, "He that believeth (the gospel) and is baptized shall be saved"—then an unbeliever has no right to baptism, and though he might be baptized, by an apostle it would not save him, or be valid.

But our friend took a step forward in his search after truth. He heard a Campbellite preacher, who was far ahead of him, and then joined that sect, holding his former baptism. Here we discover an inconsistency in the Campbellites in receiving to their fellowship persons who have not been immersed for the remission of sins. Why do they preach such a doctrine, and then nullify it in practice? How long our friend was a member of this organization he does not say. But evidently for some time he believed in baptism for the remission of sins, though he had been saved in some other way as he thought when a Methodist. Campbellites, as a body, do not believe the gospel of the kingdom any more than the rest of the sects. The gospel they preach is about the death, burial and resurrection of Jesus—things belonging to the name. They believe in a church-kingdom set up at Pentecost, consequently have no faith in the kingdom Jesus and his disciples preached before Pentecost. I cannot see that this step in advance was much advantage to our friend, as to his state in the sight of God. He might have gained a little in his knowledge of the Bible, but as yet he was ignorant of the "one faith."

Within the last year, our friend says, "I have been more thoroughly converted into a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus by the Church of God." I am glad to hear of this. Do not rest satisfied until you are a full and firm believer in the gospel as preached by Peter on the day of Pentecost—Philip in the city of Samaria—Paul at Ephesus, Athens and Rome; and then "arise, and be immersed, and wash away your sins, calling on the name of the Lord." No knowledge, or faith, acquired now can possibly have any effect on your previous baptism. That was a mere ablution—was not the "one baptism"—was an unscriptural act, both on the part of preacher and subject, and consequently unacknowledged by the Great Lawgiver, as an act of obedience to the faith. An immersion submitted to as a mere rite of the church, without a true Scriptural faith, cannot purify the heart. The party may be honest and sincere, and as devout as Cornelius was, but all these good and noble qualities will not supply the lack of faith. It is obedience to the truth which purifies the heart. See 1 Peter i. 22. No one who has come to a knowledge of the truth since his baptism in ignorance, need be afraid of performing an unnecessary work, by taking Christ's yoke upon him, in submitting to his divinely appointed ordinance, for the remission of his sins. There is no other way of being united to the name of Jesus, or of being adopted into the family of God. Apollos was an eloquent man, mighty in the Scriptures; instructed in the way of the Lord; zealously teaching what he knew, but knowing only the baptism of John. Two disciples, named Priscilla and Aquilla, heard him speak at Ephesus, and then took him unto them, and expounded unto him the way of God more perfectly. It was necessary for this preacher of John's baptism to be taught present truth, and though nothing is said about his rebaptism, yet we find that there is something recorded about a number of John's disciples (probably converted by Apollos,) whom Paul taught more perfectly, and reimmersed in the name of the Lord Jesus. John's disciples were instructed in the things of the kingdom of God, and were far in advance of many baptized persons of the present day who are afraid of rebaptism after coming to a knowledge of the truth. Read Acts xviii. 24, to xix. 7.

Query: How can the Church of God, so called, justify itself, in the light of apostolic precept and example, in receiving to its communion and membership, individuals from the Baptists, Campbellites, and Adventists, without their becoming obedient to the faith? By so doing the church virtually endorses their baptism as the "one baptism," and the churches they leave as the "one body." This is inconsistent. All are not guilty of the error, I know—but many are. "A word to the wise is sufficient." Such a course is not for the truth, but against it.

"BAPTISM IN THE NAME," ETC., AGAIN.

Editor Restitution:

In the only number yet published of a paper printed anonymously at Baltimore, and titled The Witness, the editor, under the above heading, asserts—"By understanding the symbol of baptism it is apparent that it is proper ONLY to baptize in the name of the Lord Jesus"—("only" being printed in large capitals.

As the Witness is "all gratuitous distribution," and has no regular time of issue—does not invite subscriptions, etc., there would seem to be no certain expectation of its re-issue; hence I ask space in THE RESTITUTION for this brief comment on the quotation above, lest silence should be construed into assent to the conclusion the words are intended to convey, viz., that the rite of baptism would not be "proper" if the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit be also used in the act, though following the exact phraseology employed by the Author of the ordinance in Mat. xxviii. 18-20.

No intelligent Christian can deny that the invocation of the name of the Lord Jesus Christ as the authority for the act of baptism is "proper" nay, essential, to its validity, and so to affirm and practice would take away all ground of controversy. But more is intended than this by the interpolation into the Bible phrase of the adverb "only," with the strong emphasis expressed in large capitals. The writer is plainly striking at those who not only, like himself, use the name of the Lord, but also repeat the very language of the commission in Matthew when properly translated, viz., "into the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit." The Witness is more specific, and scarcely leaves room for doubt as to his meaning where in another part of the same paper he "endorses" the statement that "they (the brethren) perform this rite (baptism) solely in the name of the Lord Jesus." Now the Witness is, very wisely, a great stickler for rigid construction of Scripture language, and insists on closely following Scripture usage and example. He thinks he presents a strong argument against "infant sprinklers" when he affirms truly "there cannot be one example shown from the Scriptures where infants were ever sprinkled or immersed." May we not be allowed then to call on him to produce "one example from the Scriptures" wherein the words "only" and "solely" in the quotations cited, are to be found? If the argument be good in the one case, is it not good in the other?

Moreover, the Witness writes, "There is not an instance on record where the apostles ever used the verbatim words of Mat. xxviii." May I not answer conclusively, "Show us on record an instance in which the apostles ever used the words only and solely as imputed to them by the Witness in the passages quoted?"

It is sufficient, on our part, to rely on the precept of our Lord in Matthew as authority for using the words Father, Son and Holy Spirit, and so Peter on Pentecost for the name of the Lord; and thus to reject neither but to retain and practice both, baptizing in the name of the Lord and into the name (not names) of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit.

We submit in view of this reasoning that a theory which thus compels us, in order to give it countenance and support, to interject our own words into the Sacred Record and thus to add to the Word of God, cannot be sound and true, and ought to be promptly discarded by every candid and consistent disciple of the Great Teacher.

"Be thou in the fear of the Lord all the day long." Prov. xxiii. 17.

When you think, when you speak, when you read, when you write—

When you sing, when you walk, when you work for delight—

To be kept from all wrong when at home or abroad—

Live always as under the eye of the Lord.

Whatever you read, though the page may allure, Read nothing of which you are perfectly sure Conscientious at once would be found in your room—

If God should say solemnly, Show me that book?

Whatever you think, never think what for you You would blush in the presence of God to be found thinking—

Whatever you say in a whisper or aloud, Say nothing you could not say here to be heard—

Whatever you write, though in haste or with heed,

Write nothing you blame or be ashamed to read—

Whatever you do in the sight of your fellows, Stop making that life depend on the mere—

Whatever you go, never go where you fear Lest the Great God should follow, and find you there—

Then, each day, feel as in the presence of God, Thus walking, thus working, thus watching, thus loving;

If God should call suddenly, you will not mind the summons—

Cultivate a Gentle Tone.

You often hear boys and girls say words when they are vexed that sound as if made up of a snarl, a whine and a bark. Such a voice often expresses more than the heart feels. Often even in birth, she gets a voice to tone that is sharp, and it sticks to her through life. Such persons get a sharp voice for home use, and keep their best voice for those they meet elsewhere. I would say to all boys and girls, "Use your best voice at home." Watch it day by day, as a pearl of great price, for it will be worth more to you than the best pearl in the sea. A kind voice is a lark's song to a hearth and home. Train it in sweet tones now and it will keep in tune through life.—Child's Guide.

A Youth Killed.

The cigarette is such. It is made generally of refuse tobacco, rolled in a perfumed paper. The paper is injurious, if not poisonous, and the smoke, or a large quantity of it, would produce dangerous, if not fatal illness.

The paper is filled with tobacco, made from the odds and ends of the cigar manufacturers, the stumps of cigars, picked up in the street, and fished out of the sewers, old quids, and the dried leaves, with which cigars are more or less compounded.

The other day we saw a very dirty, ragged old man, with his hat half full of the stumps of tobacco which he had picked up in the halls, bar-rooms, and on the sidewalks, and out of the gutters. In reply to our question what he intended doing with these loathsome things, "Sell 'em, sir. They make cigarettes of them things."

These cigarettes are sold at very low prices, and are bought mostly by boys.

How Jacob's Silver Turned Into Gold.

Do you really know, young folks, what being hungry means? I don't think many of you do, or perhaps your idea is similar to that of the unfortunate Marie Antoinette, queen of France, who, when they told her the people were starving, said, "Then why don't they eat bread?" Well, if ever any of you come to find out by personal experience what hunger means, remember that if you trust in God he will and can give you daily bread; but listen to my story and you will see what it means.

Jacob Jones was a very honest man; he went to church and never spent his time in the public house. He always brought home his money to his wife on Saturday night, and she, good soul, made Jacob's cottage comfortable, and saw that the children were well fed and clothed.

But there came a day when everything went badly with Jacob Jones; "times" were shocking; work was scarce; several of the children fell ill of low fever, and the doctor's bill had to be paid. Jacob was turned off by his master, not for any fault of his own, but because there were too many "hands" on the farm for winter work; so that the poor fellow found himself without a penny to buy food, and for the first time in her life, his wife had to go and pawn some of the furniture.

"I don't see what good it is a keeping straight, and being a good Christian, Jacob," said his wife, one day, "when the Almighty lets us come into such a fix. I call it unfair."

"Nay, nay, Susan, 'taint that, sure; maybe it comes of our being short-sighted like, and not seeing all round the Almighty's ways; maybe the gentlefolks as 'ave got more book learning know better than we."

And as it in answer to Jacob's faith, that very day a neighboring farmer sent word that Jacob might have a week's work and good pay, and perhaps more after that if he proved able. I need hardly say that Jacob trudged off much delighted, but between Monday and Saturday—pay day—there was a great deal to go through, for Jacob would never beg of anyone.

At last Saturday night came, and Jacob received his fourteen shillings with a radiant face.

It was a very dark night in November, and Jacob had three miles to walk before he reached home; but what was that to him, so that shillings rattled in his pocket!

Off he trudged, thinking to himself how pleased Susan would be, and that she would now see there was no unfairness in the Almighty's dealing.

He had gone about a mile when he heard voices behind him. Jacob didn't think much of that, but presently they came nearer, and before he was aware of anything Jacob found himself seized by the collar, and several pairs of hands were laid about him. It was too dark to distinguish faces, but the burly forms of three men were visible.

"Now look here, old chap," said one voice, "you've got the brass in your pocket, and we'll just trouble you to ease yourself of that burden."

"There's no use in kicking up a row," said another; "three to one can put a chap down like you, never mind how he struggles."

"Just give 'em the coin quietly," said a third, "or maybe thy old dost will suffer."

"It's a shame to set on a man like this," cried Jacob, when he found breath enough to speak, "I'm cowardly and mean, besides, I must have my money, I'm a poor man, and my wife is every penny I've got."

One of the men laughed, whilst the others rendered poor Jacob's hardly earned and much needed money from his pocket. He heard the shillings rattle as one threw them to his companions, but Jacob determined to make one more appeal.

"I've a wife and children at home, and none on us will taste a mouthful tonight if I don't bring in some cash. If you have any feeling at all"—

"Come, come, don't talk of feelings; we're all feelings, only some on us finds that charity begins at home."

"Look here, my chap," said another, "we don't want to be too hard on ye. What do you say, mates, to giving him back two shillings?"

"No, no," said one.

But the other said, "Well, two shillings ain't much; give it to him, Bill." And Bill, who had a wife somewhere, thrust two shillings into Jacob's hands, saying:

"Now get along with you, and be thankful for this much; but remember, no blarging of this affair about the village tomorrow."

They loosed Jacob, and he was only too glad to hurry on, leaving the ruffians standing still and concerting some other robbery among themselves.

Poor Jacob's thoughts were not to be envied as he walked on.

What would Susan say? What would the children do for food?

It seemed as if the Almighty had really forsaken him.

He had not gone very far when, oh, horror! he heard some one running after him. Was it one of the thieves again? Perhaps the one who had refused Bill's request.

Quick as possible Jacob sprang over a low hedge that bordered the road, flung himself into the ditch on the other side, just before the foot-steps passed the spot.

Whoever it was he was running on very quickly, and soon after two other persons followed, also running.

Jacob lay in the ditch a long time, and when he got out he would not venture into the road again, but took a long round home, across some fields.

It was therefore very late when he reached his cottage, and Susan, who opened the door to him, exclaimed in surprise:

"What are you been doing, Jacob? here an ago I 'ave been expecting of you. No victuals nor nothing in the house; and whatever 'are you been doing to your coat?"

Jacob thought it best to tell her the whole story at once, which set Susan off sobbing and lamenting.

"Now must cheer up, Susan," said Jacob, at last; "look here, my gal, I've got the two shillings, so let's be thankful for them; it might 'a been that we had not a penny."

"Give 'em to me, Jacob, and I'll go out and get some bread at the shop; there's the childer 'are been crying for food this last hour."

Jacob put his hand into his pocket and slowly drew out the money, then started back as if he had been shot!

"Why, Susan, these be two golden sovereigns, as sure as my name's Jacob Jones. Now, I understand why they ran after me again. 'Tis the Lord's doings, Susan, and he has punished the wicked."

And true enough it was, for the thieves were never heard of again, so Jacob kept the money. The farmer finding him a good, honest man, promised him regular employment, so that from that day things mended, and Jacob, in telling the story of the two sovereigns, always added—

"The Almighty's ways are wonderful, so it's no good thinking we folke can see all round 'em; but we can just keep on believing, and that always brings a blessing.—Dominion Church-man. Selected by A. B. Magruder.

As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

COMING AGE---ITS PROXIMITY. No. 125.

Delay of the Seventh Trumpet—Events of that Delay—Its Name—Its Agents—Its Distinct Features—A Judgment Era.

Introductory remarks: We now enter more directly into the investigation of the agents and events that crowd the world's history immediately preceding the advent, the resurrection of the saints, and their rapture. The chain of prophecies denoted by the seven trumpets extends through the age of executive judgments, consequently it includes the reign of subjugation. 1 Cor. xv. 25. We have now traced that chain into the judgment age; for it commences with God's judgment on the harlot, the decision of which is past, (Dan. vii. 9-11, 22-27; 2 Thess. ii. 7, 8: Rev. xiv. 7, 8, 9,) and its execution now in progress. The present state of the papacy forces us to take this position. Its civil power is so utterly broken down and removed from the papal hierarchy as to oblige us to come to this conclusion. See Dan. vii. 26; Rev. xvii. 16.

We are, therefore, now living in that period of the world's history when we can truly say, "Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come." Rev. xiv. 6, 7. This period is located between the sixth and seventh trumpets. Its names, its agents, and its peculiar features will now claim our attention. Our object will be to make the reader familiar with this period, its names, agents, work, location, and duration; the period and its relative importance. Should we repeat any thought, our aim in so doing will be to aid the reader's understanding. Our object in these investigations is to instruct; to make the Apocalypse a book that can be read and comprehended; and therefore made a work of intense interest. Our future numbers on the Revelations shall be as distinct in their aim as our ability and our knowledge will allow.

1. Propositions will be stated, and their solutions will follow.

Prop. 1. Between the sixth and seventh trumpets there is an interval. "The second woe is past: behold the third woe cometh quickly." Rev. xi. 14. This passage is sufficient to establish the first proposition. We can see that this constitutes a peculiarity not belonging to the other trumpets. After the events of four trumpets, an angel, flying in mid heaven, with a loud voice announces the approach of three woe trumpets. At the close of the first woe it is said, Behold there come yet two woes hereafter; teaching us that the events of the trumpets are consecutive. The first four are God's judgments on the Latin empire. The first two woe trumpets concern, principally, the Greek empire. The seventh or last is universal, and covers the reign of subjugation. Under it is the advent and the first resurrection; also, the final conflicts with the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. This conflict is termed the "Battle of Armageddon."

Prop. 2. The space between the sixth and seventh trumpets is short. "Behold the third (last) woe cometh quickly." The space is, in fact, cut off from the events of the seventh trumpet, for a specific work. It is emphatically the day of God's preparation. It is the time for the last mighty struggle between Christ and anti-Christ that come against the word of God in three divisions, under the command of Satan's three field marshals, the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet.

Prop. 3. The names of this period were distinctly heard by John. The principal appellations were, "Delay," "Voice of the seventh angel," "Quickly." The work to be accomplished is the "finishing of the mystery of God." To make this a "short work" requires great activity.

Prop. 4. Conflict implies opposing interests; hence the preparations are of two kinds: preparations for and against Christ. All that are not for Christ are against him. In this final struggle are these two conflicting interests—those of Christ, and those of Satan, his opposing majesty.

Prop. 5. Seven special agents belong to this period. Satan puts into the field, to gather his forces, three unclean spirits out of the mouth of the dragon, beast and false prophet. Christ dispatches three messengers and a voice. These seven agents fix the character of this period of delay. We shall—1, narrate what John saw; 2, we shall then describe what the world has seen and is now viewing; 3, we shall then compare. In accomplishing this difficult task we implore divine aid to discern the truth and fearlessness to utter it.

1. What John saw and heard. "And I saw another angel (messenger) flying in mid heaven, having an eternal gospel (εὐαγγέλιον αἰώνιον — age gospel) to proclaim unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation and tribe and tongue and people; and he saith with a great voice, Fear God and give him glory; for the hour of his judgment is come; and worship him that made the heaven and the earth and sea and fountains of waters." Rev. xiv. 6, 7. Such is the first messenger that John saw, and such was the message proclaimed.

His character, commission, and the time of his flight shall now be investigated, in order to decide if the mission is past, in progress, or whether it is still in the future.

I. His character. He is a messenger, not a bishop, nor a pastor, but a messenger, dispatched on some special agency. His position is exalted. "In mid heaven." Eagle-eyed, he soars aloft towards the Sun (of Righteousness). He is in haste—he "flies;" no time to be lost; he must visit every "nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people." What he does must be done quickly. He speaks with a loud voice. He cannot visit every habitation. His time is too limited. Some must hear at a distance. What glory radiates along his pathway as he flies swiftly through the parting heavens! This agent does not symbolize the apostles, as will appear from his commission. The apostolic and judgment ages differ so materially as to require very different symbols.

2. His commission. "Fear God and give glory to him." Why? "For the hour of his judgment is come." He has an—not the—everlasting (age) gospel (glad tidings); he has an age (Messiah's) glad tidings. The original apostolic message reads: "But now commandeth all men everywhere to repent because he hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness." Acts xvii. 30, 31. In the judgment commission, "Fear God, for the hour of his judgment is come"—not will come. This commission must antedate the session of the "Ancient of Days." Dan. vii. 9, 10, 26. We have already shown that that court was God's judgment on the little horn, which transpired about A. D. 1780-89, and is now being executed. This angel, therefore, could not have received this special commission anterior to that date. It is a new proclamation. "The hour of his judgment is come."

3. Time of his flight. Its date is since 1815, as the expression "hour of his judgment" means hour of God's judgment on the power denoted by the little horn. Within the last seventy years this angel began its flight, with a special message, the age glad tidings.

It is the general opinion among expositors that this messenger denotes a body of religious teachers. As to what body, they do not agree. Some say, the reformers, headed by the great Luther. Those men were too early for the message. The hour of that special judgment had not commenced. Others locate the cry in the present century, and say that it symbolizes the modern missionary effort. As that messenger continues his flight to the end of this age, he must now be on the wing. Where, then, can a body of Christian teachers be found, carrying swiftly through mid heaven said proclamation? Such a body cannot be composed of those who deny that the hour of his judgment has come. Such a class of proclaimers, however, does now exist. Call them by whatever depraving epithet you see fit, it will not change the facts of the proclamation, nor disprove the commencement and continuance of the loud cry. By what body did this proclamation commence? and who have continued the message?

4. Its history. To prepare the way for the proclamation, in due time, God awakened intellects of the first order to investigate the prophetic Scriptures. Among these we may enumerate Mede, Whiston, Cressner, Lowth, Hurd, Bishop Newton, Sir Isaac Newton, Daubuz, Vitringa, Hales, Faber, and a host of others. Luther had erected a watch-tower, and placed on it zealous watchmen, who gave the alarm. Great interest had been awakened relative to the papal abominations. When the executioners of the judgment of the "Ancient of Days" entered upon their work A. D. 1793 to 1815, and caused that power symbolized by the little horn to tremble before God's severe anger, the minds of many were prepared to make that application of those events as they were evidently intended. They saw that these were judgment thrusts at a tyrant of long standing; seeing this they proclaimed it to the world.

Among the first to discern the character of those events, and to utter the proclamation of the hour of his judgment come, were George Croly and Edward King, Esq., F. R. S., A. S. They at once declared the fulfillment of Daniel and John in regard to the judgment on the body symbolized by the little horn. Their writings soon came into the possession of those whose minds were prepared to adopt and to declare the same views. A large body of prophetic expositors arose speedily and the proclamation of this judgment the most convincing sign of the near advent of our Savior, flew rapidly through England, Scotland, and, to some extent, to all the enlightened parts of the globe. Lectures and writings multiplied, and the principles, taking root in other minds, produced an abundant harvest.

This class of expositors in England had the name of Literalists. Their views were brought to our own land, but for a time they were unpopular and inactive.

As the proclamation took a wider circuit, light increased, and new truths were clearly seen to have an intimate connection with the original announcement. From the commencement, however, it had been declared that the second personal appearing of our Savior to set up his kingdom, was about to take place.

The features of this cry, which was most clearly defined in America, were the "midnight cry" and the hour (time) of the advent, though other points were in no manner neglected.

The movements of this body in the United States attracted general attention. All classes heard the cry, it was made with great energy, and uttered in thunder tones. This messenger, fearing God, had no fears of man. All must hear. The wealthy and the learned must have an opportunity to listen to these glad tidings. During the last half century, this cry has become as familiar to the ear of this age as was the preaching of Noah to the antediluvians, and it has been attended with similar results. Few pay any attention to the call. The masses move on in their usual callings, eating and drinking, forming new associations; utterly regardless of the future.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—Second Series, Number 21.

HISTORY OF NAPHTALI.

It is interesting and instructive to note the effect which its geographical position had upon the character and history of Naphtali. It was separated from the great body of the nation. The power of Israel lay in the mountains of Ephraim and Judah. The plain of Jezreel, so often swept by foreign armies and desert hordes, almost cut off communication with Naphtali, and left that tribe isolated and helpless amid its mountains. Need we wonder that under such circumstances it showed timidity and indecision—that it shrunk from active warfare, and left some of its allotted cities in the hands of the Canaanites, rather than battle for its rights. Judges i. 33. Even Barak, Naphtali's most renowned warrior, refused to take the field until Deborah consented to accompany him—"If thou wilt go with me, then I will go; but if thou wilt not go with me, I will not go;" to which the prophetess rebuking replied, that his hesitation would strip him of his glory, and confer it on a woman. Judges iv. 8–9. But, on the other hand, when the tribe was once forced to war, when driven to bay, as it were, by an implacable foe—when hesitation and timidity could not secure safety, then the Naphtalites showed the activity, the endurance, and heroic spirit of mountaineers. Sisera learned this from fatal experience on the banks of the Kishon. Viewed thus in the light of history we can understand the meaning of Jacob's blessing, "Naphtali is a hind let loose." Gen. xlix. 21. It would seem as if the patriarch's eye had swept these northern mountains, and had selected one of their own gazelles as a fit emblem of the tribe. Ever timid and undecided at first—more inclined to flee than to fight; but when once brought to bay, a fierce, active and dangerous foe. Some have said our English version is here wrong. I cannot see it. The rendering of the Hebrew is literal and grammatical. The allusion is beautiful and true. Compare 2 Sam. ii. 18; 1 Chron. xii. 8.

The geographical position of Naphtali produced other effects upon history. The tribe occupied border-land. It came into close contact with the Syrians of Damascus, with the mountain tribes of Lebanon, and especially with the great commercial nation of Phœnicia. Separated from the body of the Jewish people, forced into connection with strangers, the Naphtalites became less exclusive than their brethren. The Phœnicians traded with them, and settled among them. 1 Kings ix. 11–13. That sharp line which separated Jew and Gentile was in part, at least, obliterated. In worship, in manners, and even in language, they accommodated themselves to their Gentile neighbors, and, at length, the whole land was called "Galilee of the Gentiles," and its people lost caste with the exclusive Jews of the South. These facts may help to explain the question of Nathanael, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" (John i. 46); and the remark of the woman regarding Peter, "Thou art a Galilean, and thy speech agreeth thereto." Mark xiv. 70. Placed on the northern frontier, Naphtali bore the first brunt of every invasion from that quarter. The generals of Benhadad of Damascus smote Ijon, and Dan, and Abel-beth-maachah, and all the land of Naphtali;" (1 Kings xv. 20); and Naphtali was the first among the tribes of Israel to fall beneath the power of Assyria, and to feel the captive's chain. 2 Kings xv. 29.

MOUNTAIN SCENERY.

It was a sunny day in the month of May I last rode through the tangled thickets of thorns and thistles on the desolate plain of Gennesaret, and after a farewell visit to Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, turned my horse's head toward the mountains of Naphtali. The heat along the shore was intense; but as I climbed the rugged steep, refreshing breezes fanned my cheek, and the perfume of a thousand flowers filled the air. Poppies, anemones, marigolds, convolvulus, star of Bethlehem, and numerous others, clothed the mountain side—here a field of bright unbroken scarlet; there another of golden yellow; yonder a bank of shrubs and dwarf oaks, all draped and and festooned with snow-white convolvulus; and the intervals everywhere filled up with a glowing mosaic of rainbow hues.—

"And what a wilderness of sweets!
It seemed as though from all the bowers,
And fairest fields of all the year,
The mingled spoil were scattered here."

It was a rugged and toilsome path. Often there was no path at all; and we rode right on up the bank, through brake, guiding our course by the frowning battlements of Safed, which loomed against the bright blue sky far overhead. From the hillside we turned into a wild glen, where the voice of the turtle floated from tree to tree; and the cooing of countless wood pigeons ran like a stream of soft melody along the jagged cliffs above us.

We stopped at intervals to look out over the country as it gradually opened up behind us. I say we; for I was not now alone, a goodly company of pilgrim friends from the far west encircled me, all as fully alive to the beauties of nature and the absorbing interest of "holy places" as I was myself. I remember well one spot where we reined up in a retired nook, under the shade of a huge walnut, to admire a scene of surpassing grandeur. In the foreground, on the left, rose a limestone cliff three hundred feet or more. Half way up was the facade and dark door of an ancient sepulchre. Beyond it, away down through the vista of the wild glen, slept the sea of Galilee in its deep, deep bed. In the background was the mountain-chain of Gilead—a massive wall of rich purple; and on the right, over a forest of brown hill-tops, rose the graceful rounded summit of Tabor.

SAFED—THE EARTHQUAKE.

We pitched our tents beside the castle of Safed, and spent the evening in exploring its ruins. It crowns a peak two thousand seven hundred and seventy-five feet high, which forms the southern culminating point of the mountains of Naphtali. The town lies along the steep slope beneath, and contains a population of a thousand Jews and two to three thousand Muslems. The houses are ranged like terraces, the roofs of the lower tiers forming the streets of those above. This accounts for the great destruction of property and the terrible sacrifice of human life during the earthquake of 1837. Safed was then much larger than at present; but in a single moment three-fourths of its houses were thrown down, and five thousand of its inhabitants buried beneath them. The poor Jews suffered most. The spectacle presented after the earthquake was heart-rending. Many were killed instantly; others, buried beneath ruins, or wedged in by fallen stones and timber, perished miserably before they could be released; a few were only extricated after five or six days, covered with wounds, fainting with thirst.

Abundant traces of the earthquake were still there. Many of the largest and best houses in the town shattered and deserted; others, though still habitable, rent from top to bottom; the battlements and towers of the old castle lying in confused heaps; and what was far more impressive than all, and enabled one to form a fuller idea of the appalling catastrophe, the whole surface of the ground, on the top and round the sides of the hill, bore marks of the frightful convulsion; here great masses of rock rent and torn: there, huge fissures in the earth, half filled with loose clay and stones from the shivered sides.

Hugh Miller has somewhere said—"The natural boundaries of the geographer are rarely described by right lines. Whenever these occur, however, the geologist may look for something remarkable." Probably Palestine affords the best example of this in the world. From the foot of Hermon to the borders of Edom, the Jordan valley is a right line, straight as an arrow; and nowhere else does the geologist meet with such remarkable physical phenomena. The whole valley, as I have shown elsewhere, is a huge fissure in earth's crust, varying from one to thirteen hundred feet in depth. Asphalt is thrown up from its bed; sulphureous vapors and boiling waters are emitted at intervals; while the mountain-chains on each side are every few years shaken to their base by internal convulsions. Safed appears to be one of the grand centers of volcanic action; and it is interesting to note how the hot springs at Tiberias, Gadara, and Callirhoe on the shore of the Dead Sea, well out in unison with the throbs of its fiery heart.

Safed is now one of the four Jewish "holy places" in Palestine, and yet it has no Biblical interest. Its castle is a relic of the Crusades, originally built and garrisoned by the Templars. The great attraction of the place now, at least for the Christian pilgrims, is the noble panorama it commands. From its crumbling battlements one gets perhaps the best view of the deep basin of the lake of Tiberias, and the chasm of the Jordan entering and leaving it; and then he can look away out across the plateau of Bashan to its mountain-chain on the eastern horizon. On the south-east is the range of Gilead; and on the south the eye roams at will among the wooded hills, and winding glens, and green plains of Lower Galilee.—S. S. Times.

THE GREAT POWERS AND PALESTINE.

We live in a fast age, and even history is manufactured at a greater speed. Wars used to last decades of years; civilization advanced slowly; communications between nations and consequent mutual benefit proceeded correspondingly tardily. Now the map of a continent is changed in a week; what is invented in one country is known at once thousands of miles away, and the whole world can profit simultaneously by the invention. Notably in politics is the spirit of haste evident. Statesmen's schemes once required generations for completion; now the boldest plans are carried out by the planners. If Peter the Great were alive today, Constantinople would be Russian tomorrow. How quickly events march and history is created is evident with special clearness in the magnetic Eastern question. For England to have appropriated Egypt years ago as easily as she has done in the last few months, would have been impossible. Some Power would have turned her out and would never let the conquest be completed, even as England actually treated Napoleon I. and his "annexation." For the same power to have "acquired" Cyprus so swiftly, would also have been impossible a few years ago. Long negotiations followed by war would have resulted.

How to account for this is difficult. The Powers are just as jealous and watchful of each other as ever. It is explained, however, on one supposition, which indeed finds favor with careful historical students. This supposition is that there is a tacit understanding as to which part of the Turkish empire shall be appropriated by each of the great powers interested in Turkey's destruction. These are chiefly Russia and Austria—both desirous of ports or outlets for their commerce—France, especially just now burning with fever for acquisition, and adoring such traditions as harmonize with "partant pour la Syrie," and England, fearful for India's safety.

In the very midst of the scene of conflicting interests lies Palestine—dear to Jew, Christian and Mohammedan. The statesman says it is the key to the position: and looking to his countrymen's advantage, he declares that in view of its wonderful fertility, which of old supported millions; its grand possibilities for commerce, which in former days made its seaports scenes of activity and wealth, which have rendered Tyre and Sidon proverbial to this day; in view of its being at the junction of Europe and Asia, and in location, therefore, most admirable, the possession of Palestine is to his patriotic heart most desirable. The historian says the first international episode on record was the invasion of Palestine; from that day to this it has been a center of interest; therefore he on his part is concerned for Palestine's future. The religionist cannot find words to express the interest which he from his point of view takes in what he calls the Holy Land; for him every stone is an epic, every tree a poem. The shrewd commercial man notes that when the Asian railway system is built up, as built up it will be as soon as stable government is established, the geographical position of Palestine will make it the State to which the great railway lines will converge to carry the productions of Asia to European and American markets and vice versa; for, as the commerce of three continents met in its borders in the days of Solomon, so will the future commerce of the same continents flow again to that favored spot. Nor will he abate his hopes in the least degree because their realization seems distant. Remembering the swift growth of a Chicago or a San Francisco, the rapid turning of wastes into populous States, he simply remarks, "Events follow quickly nowadays," and waits.

While, however, the great Christian Powers stand with mail-clad hands to grasp the coveted and tempting bit when the moribund Turk lets go his hold, a historic figure steps forward and declares, "The land is mine!" And when the Powers turn to look at the speaker, they recognize the Jew—the child of the patriarch who was in Palestine when it was first invaded, and who would himself fain be present to receive it as his own when its possession is disputed thirty-six centuries after!

What a wonderful coincidence! "Not so," says the Jew; "it is not a coincidence; it is my destiny." Let us now briefly glance at the 'position of the Jew in this question of the future of Palestine. Nations are born from ideas. From the idea of German unity grew the German empire into actual fact, proclaimed to the world in Versailles, with French cannon to answer amen to German prayer for its welfare. From the cry of "Italia irredenta" was born the new Italy of today, whose thunder will again wake Mediterranean shores. From the tradition of ancient Greece the modern Greece was created. So Christians understand how the long cherished aspirations of the Jew may yet be realized; and while they fully concede that to the Jew above all belongs Palestine, while he above all is specially qualified to develop the future of that teeming country, while his possession of it would solve the fears of the jealous Powers, the establishment of the Jew in it would be an act of justice, and a worthy atonement for the fearful wrongs perpetrated upon him—the martyr of history.

As for the Jews themselves, to say how they long for restoration is hardly necessary. On the 9th of their month Ab, they fast for the destruction of their temples and the national calamities attending those events. There is not a morning or an evening but what they pray, "Gather us together from the four corners of earth;" "Restore our peoples as of old;" "Dwell thou in the midst of Jerusalem," and these words are uttered in every city where the Jew is found—that means throughout the world. Such constancy is almost beyond belief. Their patriotism is beyond all bounds, and to this day the Spanish Jews in all lands, (even in this distant country) put some of the dust of Palestine, or "tierra santa," as they call it, on the eyes of their dead—a poetic and pathetic evidence of their love for the sacred soil.

"When the railway reaches Jerusalem, Messiah comes," alludes to Isaiah lxvi. 20, where the prophet in his vision sees the exiles returning by all manner of conveyances, among them what he calls "kirkaroth." The English version translates it "swift beasts," which is, of course, too indefinite, or "dromedaries," which is certainly incorrect. Philologists are not wanting who derive the word from kar, "a furnace," and karkar, "to sway"—asserting that the prophet sought thus to coin a word for what was shown him in his vision, a train in rapid motion. "When Nicholas reigns redemption comes," is in allusion to Isaiah lxiii. 4, from which verse Hebraists evolve, by what they term "Rashe Teboth," the sentence, "All Judah shall hear and behold the fall of Nicholas, Emperor of Muscovy, on account of the oppression of the children of Judah, and after happening our fall will happen our real redemption, and near at hand for the children of Judah will be the good tidings of the Tishbite prophet." These, and such as these, are important inasmuch as they indicate Jewish thought. —N. Y. Herald.

The annual meeting of the Stockholders of the Christian Publishing Association, for the purpose of electing a new Board of Directors and for the transaction of such other business as may come before it, will be held in Plymouth, Ind., Saturday, November 10, 1883.

WE shall be better prepared next week to announce the names of some that we expect will attend our Conference as speakers.

THE NAME JESUS.

This is the name inherited by the Son of God, and the name above every name. In its etymology it signifies The Salvation of Jehovah; or pre-eminently, THE SAVIOR. As a personage one who, in the first place, saves us from the guilt and condemnation of sin, and, in the second place, from its effect and consequence by redeeming us from death. To us Jesus is the name of exquisite loveliness and sweetness. It is the name that captivates our innermost affections, and proselytes the intensest love of our heart of hearts. The famed names of the renowned of earth may challenge admiration and the celestial names of angel and archangel, as beings standing in the presence of God himself, may inspire a degree of wondering awe, but the name Jesus quickens every emotion into a rapture of love and adoring reverence. It is the name of him who is my Savior. Dear name. God accomplishes salvation through him—through him alone. Jesus,—יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, Yehoshua, Jehovah-Saviour—is God's salvation and our Savior. This Jesus, as related to the Father, is the first begotten and the only begotten Son of God. In this relation of Divine Sonship we are commanded to honor him even as we honor the Father. What commends and manifests the love of God the Father toward us is, that he sent this, his only begotten Son, to be the propitiation for our sins. In his sacrifice and intercession we trust. It is through him that we expect the life everlasting. It is by him that we expect to be raised up at the last day. If a celestial diadem shall ever wreathe our temples, it is our glad anticipation that the crown of glory will be bestowed by the loving and divine hand of him that redeemed us by his own precious blood. Or if, in the order of salvation, our place be found in the countless multitude of the white-robed palm bearers, we hope to wave those palms to his honor in rapturous exultation. We adore Jesus in the divinity of his nature and character as Son of God; and we adore the loving Father, who has emphasized his love beyond all expression, in the gift of this Son.

PRIMITIVE TRUTHS.

A writer says: "A pre-existent Savior, like a post-existent sacrifice in the mass, is a delusion to 'catch away the word,' and to divert us from the way, the truth and the life—Jesus and the resurrection!" And it is said that "testimony to primitive truth however overlooked, is not controversy."

Such being the case, permit me to quote some "primitive truths" which I think are, unintentionally, perhaps, overlooked. In the discussion of the Sonship of Christ, and this for the sake of many who may otherwise be misled by the use made of the many quotations of the use of the word "logos," viz., to disprove the pre-existence of Christ, as the word (Logos). My first witness is the Lord himself, who in his prayer recorded in John xvii. 5, says, "And now, O Father, glorify me with thine own self with the glory which I had with thee before the world was." John vi. 38: "I am come down from heaven;" v. 40, "Not that any man hath seen the Father save he that is from God, he hath seen the Father;" v. 51, "I am the living bread which came down out of heaven;" v. 62, "What than if ye should behold the Son of man ascending where he was before;" viii. 23, "I am from above, ye are of this world, I am not of this world;" ix. 58, "Before Abraham was born I am."

Have we not pre-existence plainly declared here? The apostle John testifies, i. 1, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God;" v. 14, "And the Word became flesh and dwelt among us."

Paul in Phil. i. 15–17, "Who is the image of invisible God, the first born of all creation; for in him were all things created, in the heavens, and upon the earth, things visible and things invisible, whether thrones or dominions, or principalities or powers; all things have been created through him, and he is before all things, and in him all things consist."

In Heb. i. 2, it is said that God "has spoken to us in his Son.... through whom also he made the worlds;" and in the 10th verse the words of David (Psalm cii. 25) are applied to Christ, "Thou Lord in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth."

How can we then say that a pre-existent Savior is a delusion? Some theologians have spoken, and still speak, of Christ as the "eternal Son of God." For this I know of no Scripture authority. "The word (logos) became flesh," and then it was that that Holy thing was called the Son of God" (Luke i. 35), and not before.

Of course we know that the word logos "is used many times in the common sense of a word, thing, etc.," but this is beside the question.— In Bible Banner, Aug. 23, '83.*

TO THE BIBLE BANNER.

Your symposium on the logos has its kindly vindication in your "Primitive Truths," Aug. 23. A brief reply seems in order. My prayer, I trust, will hold me to your example of kindliness, doing as you should do, I trust "in spirit and in truth," should you reply.

1. As to "delusion" I think you "overlook" my reference. You know that Adam, Israel, and the great mass of Christendom have been "beguiled." 2 Cor. xi. 3; Rom. i. 21–25. Now, should it turn out that you are fallible as to a "Pre-existent, divine being (besides God) would not the term apply? It is by faith in the record (Matt. xi. 25) of Jesus' genealogy, birth, name, office, messiahship, and his wondrous works, that we reach the rock on which the church is built. Matt. xvi. 16. This, to me, is absolutely clear.

2. As to "controversy" it was used with reference to testimony in contradistinction to discussion about it. "John the Baptist said, Behold the Lamb of God!" He was right in his testimony. The Jews controverted him and were wrong.

A witness testifies. The lawyers controvert it. This discriminates. Jesus was in "the word of promise (logos evangelias," Rom. ix. 9; Gen. xviii. 14; xxii. 17; Gal. iii. 16) and all, you and I may echo this as authorized service to the cause of God and humanity; because we thus maintain the continuity and completeness of testimony to Jesus' messiahship and "salvation!" Luke ii. 30; Heb. xi. 28.

3. My notice of "logos," (the Greek for word) was testimony to its origin, import and usage over a thousand times as a word like light, life, truth, grace, etc., without mystery. This has been sadly "overlooked" and made to mean this or that to suit in controversy.

4. Your precious proofs that Christ came from God and went to God are mine also. They enthrone and crown Jesus in his sonship glory for the kingdom! Where should "the Son proceed from" but his Father? And to whom should he go but to "his Father and our Father?" John xx. 17, (especially as we are to go in God's "order," 1 Thess. iv. 13–18). Did you not "overlook" this?

5. "Is there not pre-existence here, John i. 1," you ask, and I answer, Yes, we have indeed! But you seem to "overlook" who is here (pre-existent, not absurdly of himself, but) as to earth and Adam and all things! Faith sees God there! "none beside him!" Isa. xlv. 18–22; Mark xii. 29–32; Rom. xi. 36; 1 Cor. viii. 6; 1 Tim. ii. 5; "By the (logos, word) of the Lord were the heavens made! He spake and it was done." Psa. xxxiii. 6–9.

Again you ask, "How can we say that a pre-existent Savior is a delusion." My answer is that "God was and is the Savior, as he is the Judge, by Jesus! John iii. 16–36; v. 19–29; Acts x. 42; Heb. iv. 28. Surely this you did "overlook." Do reflect! What truth should be more familiar and fundamental than that God saves and judges by Jesus! Moses was God's servant; but Christ is "the Son." Heb. iii. 1–6.

6. Paul (Col. i. 15–17—not Phil.—and Heb. i. 1–3) you and I both quote. They reach into the invisible and eternal, and I read on till other texts give us their import. See Phil. ii. 5–11, and Eph. iii. 5–11; Rev. ii. 21. Note, To all such I bow, believe, adore and wait to grow. Amen.

The mystery of Christ, however, which in other ages was not made known as it is now, that the Gentiles should be fellow heirs, and to make all see what is the mystery which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God who created all things by Jesus Christ, etc., etc., according (with reference) to the eternal purpose, which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord! To compare Scripture we are in Christ heirs according to promise—on the line and conditions of promise. Gal. iii. 24–29. This may aid us here. "The mystery was hid in God; and in other ages was not made known (by pre-existence) as it is now by Jesus' existence! Faith rests then in what is "Now made known!" "The logos and the life" were both alike with the Father! Christ was foreknown and the church chosen in him from the foundation of the world; but seen, heard and manifested in Jesus! 1 John i. 1–3; 1 Peter i. 19–21; Heb. i. 1–3. "The eternal purpose" then did not end in Adam, Abraham or Israel, but is to culminate in Christ and all in him. Eph. i. 4–10; Dan. vii. 14, 18, 27; Psa. lxxii. Amen and amen. Please reflect on the folly and fallacy of allowing such Scriptures to deny or disparage "the record God gave of his Son in promise" and then in manifestation! The earth was needed and the foregoings of God have been according (with respect) to his purpose in Christ. You brethren may testify more perfectly. God aid you.

7. Did you ever ask as God has "spoken by his Son" (in advance of his honored prophets) why he did not speak by you? primordial—ideal—Christ, the divinest of all? Again, why not unmistakably and in "the gospel that Paul preached" direct our prayers, praises and ordinances with reference to such "logos"? Do you not "overlook" such primal facts!

You assert that Heb. i. 10–12, "Are applied to Christ." What then becomes of God's supremacy as unfolded in all the nine verses before? What becomes of Jehovah (Lord) seven times and God once, in the Psalm quoted, cii.? Do "primitive truths" so ignore the divine name to accommodate and emphasize your ideal? Brother, did you not here "overlook primitive truths!"

Finally, are you aware that you omit the words of "primitive truth," Luke i. 35, and insert your own? "It is written, the Holy Ghost shall come upon thee (Mary), therefore also that Holy One (Acts ii. 27; Psa. xvi. 9–11) who shall be born of thee, shall be called the Son of God!" But you say, "The word (logos) become flesh, and then it was that that holy thing was called the Son of God, Luke i. 35, and not before." This may be left to make its own impression. It may be as near "primitive truth" as was the first murderous negation! Gen. iii. 4; but as to "that thing," however, a true witness must note the fact that your words make it no thing, as either begotten of God or born of Mary! These points of your vindication seem too far from "primitive truth" to be held at all.

Yet your sincerity is not questioned for without it you could not have rushed into such "a snare." My feelings are profoundly moved for you and the cause of truth; yet if the error of fact lies with me I will at once own up. D. V. There is no reason (except in evil) we should not unite on "primitive truth." We need to speak out as you have; teach and be taught, and so accept correction. Thus the Lord guide us into all truth. In hope of speedy deliverance I remain yours for truth. J. B. COOK.

P. S. I confess my imperfection; yet the fact is that the logos, the light, the truth, the spirit and the life are co-related, and all alike literal terms from God. Prophecy is prophetic logos. 1 Peter i. 10. It groups Gentiles over Jews, in their series of "four," Zech. i. 18–22, with "the captivity of Zion," hence "logos" is not a pre-existent Christ.

So far as I can see you "overlook" this primal fact of Revelation. 1 John v. 6; John xvii. 17. "The logos is truth, the spirit is truth!" Thus you mistake "the logos" as indicating a pre-existent Christ Jesus!

The S tar Banner vindicator ignores this "primitive" and prevailing use as is done in all "primitive" error. Gen. iii. 4. Note his last sentence.

PAINESVILLE, Va., Oct. 11.

Editor Restitution:

I have changed my residence from Jeterseville to this place—one of the most ancient villages of the State, in Amelia county, eight miles off the R. and Danville R. R. It is here in the old colonial building now standing as a memento of former generations where that great pioneer of the truth, Dr. John Thomas, about forty years ago, "earnestly contended (in debate) for the Faith once delivered to the saints" with Alexander Campbell, founder of the sect which bears his name; the only debate Mr. Campbell ever had which he deemed it imprudent to publish. It is a village with a postoffice and a few stores.

I am now engaged in delivering a series of Bible lectures in the old building, which, fortunately, is free for all. The two last past Lord's days I occupied the house, and was much encouraged, having a good and attentive audience who seemed to appreciate the word spoken. And more than all, I was happy to have unexpectedly, at my first lectures, the co-operation of our old and greatly beloved brother, Albert Anderson, now in his eightieth year, who arrived here the night before on horseback on his way to fill appointments in Lunenburg; and wonderful to say, when about five miles from here he and his horse were attacked by a nest of stinging wasps called yellow-jackets, causing his horse to throw him off in the road. But in the merciful providence of that God he has so faithfully served for over three-score years, he was not seriously hurt and was able to join me in the meeting the following day, and after getting through with my lecture upon the Signs of the Times and the Coming of the Lord, addressed the audience in his usual persuasive style. While here he was the honored guest of the Misses Horner, two esteemed and intelligent members of the Faith and subscribers to THE RESTITUTION, whose father died a few years ago of cancer, after a lifetime of labor in the good cause.

I am much pleased at my change of residence, and think here is a field in which I may do some good; but could do nothing at the little railroad town I was at, having, after much effort, failed to get at the ears of the people, or obtain one subscriber to THE RESTITUTION—the most valuable and instructive Biblical journal I ever read. I would not be without it for any price. I have just mailed two numbers to my eldest son at Staunton, Va., who, though not a member of any church will, I think give me his name as a subscriber.

Besides the Misses Horner, there are several others of the Faith in the neighborhood, and hope an ecclesia may soon be organized. I am now trying in connection with my lectures to get the old church building repaired.

In your issue of Oct. 3d is a letter from Brother J. C. Jones, touching the subject matter of my circular. I am aware that my circular suggests no definite plan to raise money to pay for those publications. Some write books, and force the expenses, in advance, on to the public. I propose, by my own means which God has very kindly placed and is placing within my reach, to pay for the issue of those works.

We issue the "Coming Age" by our own means, now in our possession, or within easy range, placed there, we think, by the hand of God; not by any special miracle, but by the habits of industry, economy, and total abstinence from the use of such articles as would, in ten years, amount to the price of the works.

We expect, then, when the "Coming Age" is ready for circulation, (which will be about Christmas), it will be clear from all debt, and will give to every attentive and prayerful reader the abundant worth of his money; so he can say in truth, "I am well paid." So much for the first book. How about the second.

Our plan is the following, which, we are satisfied, under God, will succeed; to make the money (dollar by dollar) received by the sales of the "Coming Age," and by other means placed within easy range, by the blessings of him who owns the world with its wealth, pay for the issue. Those that desire these books can order them with the money, or to be paid for as soon as ready for delivery. Send your orders to the author, Millfield, Athens Co., Ohio, or to THE RESTITUTION.

If any persons desire to aid in their circulation, they can pay for more copies and send to special friends.

Persons, or booksellers, that desire to act as agents in the distribution of the works, can be supplied at reduced prices. Price $3 for 500 royal octavo pages. J. P. WARTHEN.

Thoughts on the Christ—as Prophet, Priest, and King.

My dear brethren, in the Christ of God, I stand before you as one who is learning the truth, rather than as one who has already learned it; not as one who has reached a point of full development or perfection, either in grace or piety, creed or belief, but as one desiring the apostolic injunction to "grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." I have known Jesus Christ as my Savior and my Redeemer for many years now, and very precious he has been to me, too; but, since I have better understood the "nature of man," and the things of the kingdom—the grand and glorious future that lies before us who are in Christ Jesus, when he shall return, affords me joys that are "unspeakable and full of glory!" For, I not only "know that my Redeemer liveth," as said the patriarch Job, and as is often quoted by many of our pious orthodox friends, but—continuing to quote Job's words—I know "that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God: whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another." Job xix. 25–27. And this is the Christ that I have taken to be my "Prophet, Priest, and King."

Now, allow me very briefly to call your attention to our Lord under this three-fold aspect. First, then, "What think ye of Christ,?"—or rather, what think we of Christ; as a Prophet? Have you observed how powerful and cutting were the words he spoke in rebuke to his enemies?—the deep sympathetic words he expressed to those who were in trouble?—his judicious expressions uttered in reply to curious inquirers?—the wisdom manifested in the teaching and training of his disciples?—the simplicity and grandeur of his discourses to the multitude?—and the confounding declarations he made to the Pharisees of his day? When we remember these things, and remember his wondrous deeds, surely we must concur in the statements of those who heard him when they said, "Never man spake like this man" and that "He taught them as one having authority, and not as the Scribes." His choice of language was marvellously judicious; he illustrated his discourses by things in nature, parables or figures understood by his hearers. So that while some of the great and learned sought after him, and confessed that he was a "teacher come from God," it is also recorded that "the common people heard him gladly?"

Then, as to the subject matter of his addresses—it was the pure word of life. He came not to do his own will, nor to teach his own words; but he came to do the will of him that sent him, and to declare God's love to the world of mankind. "For God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things." This great Prophet revealed the Almighty as a God of justice, love, and mercy; and not as one of revenge, tyranny, and barbarity! He did not teach that man was naturally immortal; but, that "God so loved the world, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting (or immortal) life!" He did not say that when a saint or Christian died his "disembodied spirit" immediately ascended to heaven, to join with the disembodied spirits of "ten thousand children, singing glory, glory, glory!"—but that he would "raise them up at the last day," and that they should forever dwell with him. He said that "No man hath ascended into heaven" (John iii. 13), and that the Pharisees, nor even his disciples, could not go where he was going—that was to heaven. John vii. 23, 34; xiii. 33. Once again, he did not teach that the kingdom was already established or set up; but he said he was going away; that very dark days were first to come; and he taught his disciples to pray to their Heavenly Father and ours, "Thy kingdom come, and thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven!"

Yes, my brethren, this is the "prophet indeed" that Moses predicted thousands of years before that the Lord God should raise up. And this great Prophet, who so frequently quoted in his day the Old Testament Scriptures, said to the Pharisees, "Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they which testify of me." Therefore, let us not be afraid, or think it unnecessary to search the Scriptures, whatever modern preachers may say to the contrary, seeing this great Prophet hath given us such an important reason for doing so. Moreover, we shall for better understand the New by the aid of the Old Testament. The result of his teaching may be summed in the words of the poet—

"He speaks, and listening to his voice,
New life the dead receives:
The mournful broken hearts rejoice,
The humble poor believes."

Secondly, let us look at him under the aspect of priest. Under the Mosaic economy, there were men set apart as intercessors for the people. They understood much of the weakness and infirmity of their brethren, for whom they were to appear before God, and, therefore, had—more or less—a fellow-feeling; and is not our great High Priest thus qualified to represent us before God? He is—for it was for this purpose, we read (Heb. ii. 16), "He took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham. Wherefore, in all things it behooved him to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful High Priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people." Then sacrifices had to be offered by the priest upon the altar to the Lord. A bullock, sheep, lamb or something else had to be slain, its life-blood had to be shed—for "the wages of sin is death"—"the soul that sinneth it shall die"—and as all had sinned, all needed a ransom. While "the blood of bulls and goats cannot take away sin," it pointed to the shedding of that precious blood, without which we could not obtain the remission of our sins. This Great High Priest, therefore, must needs have something to offer; and, therefore, moved by the great love he bears towards God, and towards a lost and ruined world, he offered himself. He loved the sheep, and he voluntarily laid down his life to save them. He was pure, undefiled, separate from sinners, without spot or blemish; and God hath accepted the sacrifice, and "given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead."

Then the high priest went alone, once every year, into the holy place, not without blood, which he offered for the sins of the people; but Christ, by his own precious blood, has entered in once into the holy place, "having obtained eternal redemption for us." And thanks be to God, "He ever liveth to make intercession for us."

"What a friend we have in Jesus,
All our sins and griefs to bear;
What a privilege to carry
Everything to God in prayer."

Brethren, may be some of you are distressed and sad on account of the roughness of the way, or because of your own shortcomings, sins of omission and sins of commission; or some may be ready to despair of retaining their hold till Christ comes. Oh! let me this morning entreat you to trust in Christ, to look to him for help, remembering that he sympathizes with you, pities your infirmities and weaknesses, and he will give you the needed grace—"for we have not an high priest that cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted as we are." "Let us, therefore, come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need."

Thirdly, Jesus as King. Hitherto we have been speaking of things that were once foretold, but yet accomplished facts, but which now are things that have already been fulfilled; and I take the fulfillment of these things as the earnest for bringing about the accomplishment of the things foretold respecting the kingdom of God on the earth. God hath anointed him King, and promised to him the "throne of his father David."

The object of his reign is to put down wrong doing, to cause wars to cease, to restore this sin-blighted world to more than its original or pristine glory, to destroy the enemies of God and man, and bring back the human family to the communion and fellowship of God.

"Hail to the Lord's anointed,
Great David's greater son!
Hail in the time appointed,
His work on earth begun!
He comes to break oppression,
To set the captive free;
To take away transgression,
And reign in equity."

In conclusion, Christ is calling out now "a people for his name;" we profess to belong to that number—Oh, then, let us seek to be true to our trust, and seek to glorify him in our daily walk and conversation! Let us seek to get prepared for the coming glory by bearing the cross now; for "they who would live godly must suffer persecution." But, if we are faithful, we are to become kings and priests under him in the kingdom of God.

Having such a prophet to guide us, such an high priest to intercede for us, and such a sovereign to rule over us, we ought to march quickly on in the way of the Lord, with joy and gladness, waiting and watching for our Lord's return from heaven. And "when he who is our life shall appear, we also shall appear with him in glory." Amen!—Messenger.

SHADOW AND SUNSHINE.

If on thy path thou seest shadows lying,
Be brave, and let not thy stout heart despond;
For though the clouds above thy head are flying,
The cheering sun still shines for ever beyond.

The very shadows tell thee of the brightness
To be revealed when from the arching sky
The clouds shall pass—Ah, thou wert surely sightless
Couldst thou not see those clouds are flitting by.

Beyond the shadows golden rays impinging
Upon the hill tops promise fairer hours,
And silvery fleece o'er now the clouds is fringing,
And rainbows shine amid the passing showers.

And when at last, completing life's brief story,
The placid evening cometh softly on,
The clouds themselves will gleam with sunset's glory,
And promise of eternity's fair dawn.

The Discipline of Sorrow.

If the block of marble that lies before the sculptor was capable of feeling, how it would deplore and bemoan every stroke of the hammer, chipping off piece after piece of substance. It would deem its lot a pitiable one indeed. Yet the chisel and hammer are transforming the rough and shapeless stone into a form of life, grace, and beauty, fit to adorn the palace of a king.

So it is with us. Our characters are like unhewn blocks of marble, rude, misshapen, comparatively worthless; and God is sculpturing them into forms of divine symmetry and beauty, that may forever illustrate to the universe the power of his grace. The heavy blow of adversity and the rasping cares and petty annoyances of our daily life are but different parts of the same divine and loving process.

And shall we look simply at the hammer and chisel, and doubt the glorifying work for which God is using them? Shall we think only of the chips which the blows of his presence strike from us, and overlook the immortal characters which the Great Sculptor is seeking thus to perfect for his celestial temple?—Selected.

Joy Unspeakable.

A good story is told of a little blind child that once had a surgical operation performed that resulted in restoring her to sight. The oculist had skillfully pared off the integument that had prevented the light from passing through to the retina, and then the eyes were bandaged for awhile until the wounded parts should be somewhat healed. At length the hour arrived when the bandage, which had from time to time been partially temporarily removed, was to be removed altogether. Ah! what a moment of supreme interest and anxiety to all her friends, but more especially to the little patient herself, who had never seen! This child, when her eyes could bear the light, and by her kind physician she had been permitted to open them, and for the first time to look out upon all the beauty there was around her, realizing indeed as no words could ever show, "that the light is truly sweet, and that it is a pleasant thing for the eyes to behold the sun," cried out with delight: "O, mother! why did you not tell me it was so beautiful?" The mother, bursting into tears, replied, "I tried to tell you, my dear, but the words wouldn't make you understand." Precisely, and so, withal, is it with the Christian when he attempts to tell of the joy unspeakable and full of glory, the peace of God that passeth understanding, the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Spirit.

What Will You Be.

We see two boys standing side by side. Both are intelligent-looking and kind-looking; but one becomes an idle, shiftless fellow, and the other an influential and useful man. Perhaps when they were boys no one could have seen much difference between them; when they were men the contrast was marked. One became dissolute, step by step; as one went up the other went down.

It is a question of great moment—what will you be? One determines he will do right and improve his powers and opportunities to the utmost. He is industrious, learns his business, becomes a partner, or proprietor, and is known as a man of influence and power. Another does not determine to be bad, but is lazy, and neglects to improve his opportunities. He shirks work; he "feels around;" next he is seen with tobacco, and probably beer and whisky follow; his appearance shows he is unhealthy; he does not do his work well, he loses his position, becomes intemperate and probably a criminal.

There are many today who are standing at the parting-place. You can take one path and you will go down as sure as the sun rises. If you prefer hanging around a saloon to reading good books at home, then you are on the road to ruin. If you do not obey your parents, if you swear, you will surely go down in life.

If a boy steadily improves his time, tries to learn his business, obeys his father and mother, is truthful and industrious, is respectful and pleasing towards others, he will succeed. No one can stop his doing well in life. He has determined that he will be a noble specimen of a man, and every good person will help him.

"The Kingdom of Christ—A Divine, Visible Monarchy on Earth over all Nations, yet 'not of this World.'"

PART I.

That our Lord and Savior Jesus, the Christ, is a King, is believed and confessed by all who, intelligently, call him Lord; but regarding the nature, time, and place of his kingdom, there is great diversity of belief.

The importance of having correct conceptions of Christ's kingdom will, also, be generally conceded. It is because we have strong convictions of the importance of this subject that we bring it before you; and entreat your patient attention to what we have to say regarding it.

Another point on which we assume agreement is: That the Holy Scriptures are the only reliable source of information regarding the kingdom of Christ. All that we have truly learned about Jesus himself, has been received from the sacred volume; and from the same Divine Oracle alone we get a trustworthy answer to the inquiry—'What is the Kingdom of Christ?'

But here a very important difficulty presents itself. While all professing Christians profess to take their beliefs about the kingdom of Christ from the Bible, they differ widely as to what the Bible says. How is this? Simply because the language of Scripture is not understood in the ordinary sense. There are two senses in which ordinary language is understood, viz: the literal and the figurative; but the language of the Bible is, by many, interpreted on different principles. There is the allegorical sense, by which the language is made to mean something very different from what it expresses. For example, we read in the book of the prophet Isaiah, of a happy coming-time when mankind shall live in perfect amity with each other the whole world over, and learn war no more; when the lower animals, in harmony with mankind, shall cease to tear and kill each other; "When the wolf and lamb shall feed together, and the lion shall eat straw like the ox." These words, we are told, do not mean that. "The wolf," we are informed, means, "The fierce rapacious enemies of the flock of Christ." "The lamb," means, the disciples of Jesus. "The lion," represents, the bloodthirsty foes of the Church. "The ox," means, the preachers of the Gospel, and "The straw," is the Gospel itself!

Akin to the allegorical mode, there is what is called, the spiritualistic, more correctly, the fanciful, by which the true and faithful words of the Almighty are subjected to a process resembling that by which God's good grain is deprived of its nutritive qualities by mashing, boiling, evaporising, and condensing, till "a spirit" is obtained, which, in the opinion of many, works incalculable evil to the sons of men. Truly, "God made man upright, but he has sought out many inventions."

Not on those lines do we seek to lead you to the conclusion stated in our thesis for this lecture. Our appeal is to the language of Scripture, understood in the ordinary acceptation of the terms employed, in accordance with their grammatical construction, and obvious sense, viewed in the light of the context. Thus adopting the canon of Hooker that, "When the literal sense will stand, the farthest from the literal is generally, the worst. There is nothing more dangerous than this licentious and deluding art (spiritualising), which changes the meaning of words as alchemy doth, or would, the substance of metals, making of anything what it pleases, and bringing in the end all things to nothing."

In accordance with this rule, then, we proceed to demonstrate from the language of Scripture, That the kingdom of Christ is a divine, visible monarchy on earth, over all nations, yet "not of this world."

The first testimony to which we call your attention is the words of the Angel of God addressed to Mary the mother of our Lord (Luke i. 30-33), "Fear not, Mary; for thou hast found favor with God. And, behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a Son, and shalt call his name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the highest: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end."

It is surely reasonable to believe that the words of this promise were intended to be understood by Mary, according to their common usage among the Israelitish people! There is no explanation otherwise by the angel; no guard against understanding the language in its current sense. To Mary, and every Hebrew living at the time, the terms, "House of Jacob," and "Throne of David," conveyed one uniform idea. I need not tell you what that idea was. The hopes of the Israelitish people were fixed on the promised Messiah; they looked forward with longing expectancy to the advent of a Son of David, to sit on David's throne, rule over the house of Jacob, and make it the head of the nations.

These hopes and expectations were founded on the words of the holy prophets of the God of Israel, who spoke as they were moved by the Holy Spirit. Look at some of these prophetic words, and see whether they warranted the expectation by the Hebrews of a re-occupation of David's throne and kingdom. Take, first, this familiar prediction: "Unto us a child is born, unto us a Son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counseller, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth, even forever." Isa. ix. 6, 7.

It is admitted, by all who receive this prophecy as the word of the most high, that the illustrious person spoken of is, indeed, the Son of the Highest, our Lord and Savior. Why, then, should there be any doubt that "the throne of David," is to be occupied by him, as the King of Israel? What else could the people of Israel take the words to mean, than that the promised one should reign visibly amongst them, henceforth and for ever?

The phrase, "Throne of David," was current among the Hebrew people as equivalent to the throne of the King of Israel. More than 400 years after David had fallen asleep, and a long line of kings had succeeded him, the seat of royalty in Jerusalem was still called "the throne of David." In the book of the prophet Jeremiah you will find examples of this usage, as, "Thus saith the Lord, behold, I will fill all the inhabitants of this land, even the kings that sit upon David's throne. . . . with drunkenness." Jer. xiii. 13. Again, "It shall come to pass, if ye diligently hearken unto me, saith the Lord . . . then there shall enter into the gates of the city kings, and princes sitting upon the throne of David." Jer. xvii. 24, 25. The same language is used regarding Coniah, the son of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, "Thus saith the Lord, Write ye this man childless, a man that shall not prosper in his days; for no man of his seed shall prosper, sitting upon the throne of David, and ruling any more in Judah." Jer. xxii. 30. Once more (Jer. xxxvi. 30), "Thus saith the Lord of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, he shall have none to sit upon the throne of David; and his body shall be cast out in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost."

With such evidence before us, fixing the meaning of the phrase, the throne of David, can we reasonably doubt that the angel of the Lord used the words in the same sense, when he announced to the Hebrew maiden in Bethlehem, "Thou shalt bring forth a Son; he shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever?"

That the throne of David, promised to the Messiah, our Lord, is the seat of kingly rule which David held, is strikingly confirmed by the prediction recorded in Ezek. xxi. 25-27, "Thou profane and wicked prince of Israel (Zedekiah the last king that has reigned over the house of Jacob), whose day is come, when iniquity shall have an end. Thus saith the Lord God, Remove the diadem, and take off the crown; this shall not be the same. Exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high. I will overturn, overturn, overturn it; and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is, and I will give it him." Who is he of whom Jehovah speaks here, when he says, "I will give it him?" You all are ready to respond, "Jesus, the Christ!" Well; what was the thing referred to, when the Lord said, "I will give it him?" Surely, that which was to be overturned, emphatically, and to be no more till he come whose right it is, viz.: the diadem removed, the crown taken off the profane and wicked prince, Zedekiah. And does not the word of the Lord here spoken by the prophet Ezekiel, point to the same thing, as the angel of the Lord did, when he promised to Mary that her illustrious son would sit on the throne of his father David, and reign over the house of Jacob for ever?

The place of David's throne was Mount Zion in Jerusalem, and there the throne of Messiah, the king of the Jews is to be "established with judgment and justice forever." "Yea," saith Jehovah, "I have anointed My king on Zion, the hill of my holiness." Ps. ii. 6. "The Lord hath chosen Zion." "There," said he, "will I make the horn of David to bud: I have ordained a lamp for mine anointed. His enemies will I clothe with shame, but upon himself shall his crown flourish." Psa. cxxxii. 13, 17, 18. "The Lord shall send the rod (or sceptre) of thy strength out of Zion; and rule Thou in the midst of thy enemies." Psa. cx. 2. "The moon shall be confounded and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign on Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously." Isa. xxiv. 23.

What a travesty of the Divine Oracles, have those interpreters made who explain Zion to mean the Christain Church! Few terms in Scripture have their meaning better fixed than the word Zion, by frequent reference, and honorable mention. Thus we read of "the captivity of Zion." Psa. cxxxvi. 1; of the captives remembering Zion, (Psa. cxxxii. 1); of Jehovah having "mercy upon Zion;" and rebuilding it, (Psa. cii. 13,16); of her Judges being "restored as at the first," (Isa. i. 26); of the Lord creating "upon every dwelling-place of Mount Zion, and upon her assemblies, a cloud of smoke by day, and the shining of a flame of fire by night," (Isa. iv. 5); of Zion being "built up with blood," and "ploughed as a field," (Micah iii. 10, 11): and of "the waste places" of Zion being comforted, (Isa. li. 1.) Regarding the meaning of Zion in these places there is no dispute; why, then should the word Zion, when spoken of as the place where Jehovah's Anointed shall sit, and rule, be explained to mean heaven, or the Christian Church? Nowhere, in Scripture is the word so interpreted. What else, then, than the exigencess of a mistaken theory, calls for such an explanation of it? "Swear not by Jerusalem" said the Lord himself, "for it is the city of the great King." Matt. v. 35.

But while Zion shall be the place of Messiah's Throne, and Jerusalem the Metropolis of his kingdom, his dominion shall extend over all nations. "Thou art my Son; ask of me, and I will give thee the nations for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession. Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron, thou shalt dash them in pieces as a potter's vessel." Psa. ii. 7, 8, 9.

The picture which these words calls up before one's mind, does not at all resemble the common theological representation of Christ's kingdom, as an invisible reign in men's hearts. The vision described is, the Anointed of Jehovah sitting on his throne on Mount Zion, ruling the nations of earth to its utmost bounds, with a sceptre of iron. Rebelliously wicked nations, that shall, like a potter's vessel, be broken to shivers. As is also predicted in Psa. cx. "The Lord shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion; rule thou in the midst of thine enemies." Those over whom the Messiah is represented as ruling in the midst of, are not reconciled, converted nations, but enemies. By his righteous and resistless rule, however, "He will subdue the heathen people under him;" and "all nations and language shall serve him."

In further elucidation of our thesis regarding the kingdom of Christ, we call your attention to the remarkable vision given in a dream, to Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, recorded in the book of Daniel, chapter ii.

The image of a man, whose brightness was excellent, and whose form was terrible, stood before him. The head was of fine gold; the breast and arms of silver; the belly and thighs of brass: the legs of iron; the feet partly iron, and partly clay. While the awe-stricken king gazed on this wondrous form, he saw a stone which was not in hands, smite the image on the feet, and brake them in pieces; then, iol, the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold lay one heap of shivers, and became "as the dust of the summer threshing floor," and "the wind carried them away," till not a fragment remained; while "the stone that smote the image became a great mountain and filled the whole earth."

You are all familiar with the interpretation which Daniel, by the Spirit of God, gave to the king of his singular dream. The head of gold represented Nebuchadnezzar himself; while the silver, the brass, and the iron represented as many kingdoms that would rise in succession after each other. The fourth kingdom, strong as iron, would break in pieces and bruise; but in its latter end would be divided like the toes; "And as the toes of the feet were partly iron, and partly clay, so the kingdom shall be partly strong, and partly brittle." "And whereas," said the prophet, "thou sawest the iron mixed with the miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men, but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay; and in the days of those kings, shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces, and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever." Dan. ii. 31-35.

The prophet Daniel himself subsequently had a vision, in which similar representations of the kingdom of men, and the kingdom of God were given. Four great successive monarchies were represented by four wild beasts, each more ferocious, and terrible than its predecessor; and the last of them is destroyed by the power of "The Ancient of days." Then the prophet sees "in the night visions, and behold, one like the son of man, came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of Days, and they brought him near before him; and there was given him a kingdom, that all peoples, nations, and languages should serve him; his dominion is an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." Such was the vision, and this is the interpretation given to the seer by a messenger of the most high. "These great beasts, which are four, are four kings which shall arise out of the earth; but the saints of the most high shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom forever, even for ever and ever." "And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the most high, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom; and all dominions shall serve and obey him." Dan. vii.

The church of Rome interprets the prophecy now read in this fashion:—"The kingdom, which the God of heaven was to set up, and which was given by the ancient of days to one like the Son of man, is the Christian Church;" and the majority of Protestant Commentators affirm the same. Both maintain that the kingdom of God foreshown in these visions, was set up on the day of Pentecost. That "the kingdom and dominion under the whole heaven," is that visible, and spiritual authority, which the Lord Jesus Christ exercises over the hearts and minds of those who believe in him and submit to his will.

We object to that interpretation: (1) because it is not the obvious sense of the language used; there is no necessity for understanding it otherwise than the literal sense; and according to the canon we set out with, "when the literal sense will stand, the farthest from the literal is generally the worst." (2) Not only does the literal sense stand, but the language cannot, fairly, be interpreted in what is called, the spiritual sense, because these words: "In the days of these kingdoms will the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed, and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces, and consume all these kingdoms and it shall stand forever," (Dan. ii. 44), are part of a Divine interpretation of the vision, and therefore do not require to be interpreted. The king of Babylon did not ask Daniel for an explanation of his interpretation of the dream, any more than Pharoah did when Joseph told him the meaning of what he had seen in his dreams. But (3) the kingdom pointed to in the prediction before us—so far from answering to a reign of God in men's hearts, or a dominion in heaven, is described as "the kingdom and dominion under the whole heaven." Moreover, (4) the kingdom spoken of in the divine interpretation of these visions is to destroy, and take the place of those other kingdoms which preceded it, which could not be the case if it were not a visible, political dominion like the others. There is no question as to the nature of the other kingdoms mentioned by the prophet: well, his words are: "The God of heaven shall break in pieces, and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever."

According to the spiritualistic idea, the kingdom of men, and the kingdom of God and his Christ, can be co-existing. But that idea is contrary to the prophetic word we are now considering. When the God of heaven sets up his kingdom, "There shall be one king in the earth, and his name one," for then the kingdoms of this world shall have become the kingdom of our Lord, and of his Christ." WILLIAM LAING.

JERUSALEM, May 21, 1883.

I am rejoicing that a company think of coming to this land soon from America.

Yesterday they celebrated here the coronation of the Czar of Russia by illuminations, rockets, a big ball, etc. It is evident that Russia is a power in Palestine. So also are the Latins. They are now building immense structures.

June 5. An agent of Baron Hailz arrived here last night from Paris. The Baron is a Jew, and his agent is sent here to make arrangements for colonising Jews—French Jews, I suppose. He seems to be much honored by the Jews here.

For the last fortnight I have been very busy with the sick. Have had the entire care of an English lady who would allow no one else in her room.

It has been very hot for a few days; but is cooler now.

Brother Winterstein and wife are getting on well. He has a large share of the Jacob pluck, which is essential to success, especially here and now.

Have you seen the plan of Lord Marlborough to cut a channel from the Mediterranean to the Jordan, and make a seaport of Jerusalem? Just think—Jerusalem a seaport. Well, stranger things than this will come to pass.

June 11. Your postal is received. I am glad the Herald is to be published again. I have cut some of the best articles from old numbers of the paper and made them into a book. When I read over these inspired thoughts, I can see that our labor has not been in vain. The time will come when this bread cast upon the waters will return; and it may not be after very many days, but soon.

I love dear Jerusalem more than ever. There is great light ahead; and even now a glimmering light is visible.

June 18. There is a rumor here that fifteen thousand Jews are now on their way from Russia to Palestine. There will evidently be exciting times here soon; but we do not propose to run. If the Lord cannot keep us here, he cannot anywhere.

The Jews cannot run if they would, for they have no place to run to. It is a most wonderful condition of things. Who cannot see the hand of God in the work to bring his people back to their own land?

We hear that Russia has demanded either her money or land promised in the settlement of the last war; and the land, if she receives it, will open a road to Palestine through the "land of Magog." According to rumor the nations are getting uneasy about the Holy Land. It is an omen of the fulfillment of prophecy. One rumor is that sixteen ships of war will land at Beyrout tomorrow; and others at Jaffa. Many think the situation is a grave one. But you know more about it in America than we can here, where all sorts of rumors are flying, and everything is so uncertain. Should the struggle come, and should our consul even feel it his duty to leave, and warn us to leave, we shall not go. The Bible assures us when the "great and terrible day of the Lord" does come, that "in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem shall be deliverance." In the time of trouble connected with the overthrow of Jerusalem, the Lord's people were to flee from it for safety, and they did flee. In the time of trouble connected with the restoration, rebuilding and deliverance of Jerusalem, his people will gather to it for safety, and they will be safe. In the great whirlwind of the strife of nations, Jerusalem will be the first to lift her head above the turmoil in peace.

I must tell our people once more that land is fast being taken up, both at Jerusalem and Jaffa, and also in other places. One can scarcely realize what is going on here. I have no interest at present in other lands, except to see the true Israel of God leaving them for their haven of rest, the glory of all lands.

July 2. This has been a cool day. I have just returned from Brother Winterstein's at 8 o'clock p. m., and feel quite chilly. This has been a cold summer for this country. The oldest inhabitants say they never saw one like it. But it is favorable for all kinds of vegetation.

Wet clouds hang over the country by day and by night. Every morning it looks as though it would rain before noon; but it does not. We have had heavy dews every night. They say here the rise of the Nile is the cause of it.

July 11. I have no letters this week from America. The mail went on to Beyrout without stopping at Jaffa, on account of quarantine. I do not believe it was necessary. It is now very healthy here.

I saw trees today that I had not seen for one year, and I was surprised to see how much they had grown in that time. It would not take more than eight years to make a dense forest of all Palestine, if the people could be induced to plant trees. Many will doubt this; but it will be found to be strictly true. There never was a better fruit country than Palestine. There is plenty of water at a certain depth from the surface, and in many places that is not a very great depth. Some means to raise it to the surface is necessary.

July 26. Mr. Winterstein has written about my getting injured by a horse in the street. As there can be no accidents of course it was predestinated. I had had a presentiment of some trouble for two weeks. When I saw the immediate danger, the horse coming upon me, I knew my time had come to suffer, and at the same time felt that it would only be suffering, and not fatal. It occurred one week ago tonight, and I have nearly recovered already from my injuries. Our kind consul would have arrested the young man who was riding the horse, but I would not allow it. He would have been imprisoned and suffered a long time, and I could not desire to see anyone suffer because I had suffered. The family have been very kind to me, and will continue to be kind. How much better it is to rule your own spirit and not retaliate. I had many kind friends to sympathize and care for me, and why should I resort to the law which says, "an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth," since that law has been abrogated and we are under grace? and especially as God has given me grace to suffer afflictions. It is all of him that I feel as I do about it.

Mrs. Merrill, my kind friend, the consul's amiable wife, nursed me a whole day, and has been doing for me all the time. I have received no permanent injury; and I have no doubt but that it is among the "all things" which work for good to those who love the Lord.

Mr. Merrill tells me the cholera is raging in Egypt. If it comes here I shall not be frightened. The horse could not kill me, and I do not believe the cholera will. I do wish, however, that I had certain medicines which I trust you will send to me.

It is very hot and dry here now. I am sorry I cannot send the nice cards of flowers today, but trust that I shall be able to send them next week. This is just the time to trust God.

There was a dreadful fight yesterday among the Jews, between the Christian proselytes and the old school Jews. I am told that the streets ran with blood; that some men were killed and many injured. I believe quite a number have been imprisoned already. If I have got the truth of the affair, it grew out of the refusal of a rabbi to bury the son of a proselyte.

July 28. On account of the strict quarantine, our letters are much delayed, and I dare not send flowers. I have some very nice ones in the shape of mottoes. I think they will bring a good price.

My health is fully restored. They all thought I should die, but I did not. My case was just like the little boy's in Philadelphia. I came out upon the street just at the right moment, and the horse came along at full gallop just at the right moment, consequently a collision ensued, and I got the worst of it, as it appears. It was all the result of natural causes, just as everything else takes place. I wished to leave half an hour before I did, but could not get away. It was immediately after dusk; and when I saw the horse he was just upon me. At the very instant that I turned one way to avoid the collision, the horse turned the same way, precisely as people sometimes do when they meet suddenly upon the street. It all occurred in a moment, and there was no escaping it. My recovery is as strange as the events that caused my injury. The Lord lifts us up, and the Lord casts us down. Blessed be the name of the Lord.

I can see already that much good will result from this affair. My refusing to prosecute the young Jew who rode the horse, may have some influence. They are not much used to that kind of Christianity here. I am told that if it had been any one else the boy would have been imprisoned and the father would have had to pay one hundred dollars; and if it had been a Turkish lady, the result would have been terrible indeed. The family are Jewish Christians, belonging to the church; and even church members would have me punish the boy. You can scarcely realize the gratitude of the family that I have spared them.

They have been faithful in caring for me, and paying all the bills, etc. We know, as Job did, that our God does all things; and that he does them for wise purposes. When we believe this, it greatly assists us to act God-like. All seem to be astonished at the course I have taken; but it is the result of my faith. When they say "prosecute him," I reply, "Not for the world." How wonderful are all the ways of our God. Blessed be his holy name forever and ever.

Aug. 8. I am well, and at work as ever. I am afraid to send flowers just now on account of their having to be fumigated; but I have some nice ones to send.

Last night I was invited to a dinner given in honor of the seventeenth birthday of our host's eldest son. It was quite a gay affair. We dined sumptuously, and after dinner had music. There were several ladies who played the piano. We had in the company a Greek priest who had traveled much in America, and his stories were interesting to all. America got pretty well represented. He entered into all the sports of the evening with a relish. There is one thing I consider favorable to the Greek religion. They do not profess a sanctity which they do not possess; but on the contrary they always appear cheerful. A priest once said to me, "Our religion has much rubbish about it, but when that is cleared away we shall be found to have as much real truth as any other denomination."

The weather is now delightfully cool. I rise with the sun, and go outside of the Jaffa gate for a walk every morning. On my tour I meet about one hundred camels, loaded with all kinds of vegetables and fruit, I like walking in the early morning, though the dews are very heavy.

Aug. 16. I have received no letters from Boston since July, and do not know whether my letters reach you or not. Our mail is very irregular now, and I am afraid to send flowers.

The consul has taken this house that I am living in for a consulate, and we shall go outside the walls the first of November.

I think the cholera is very bad in Egypt, but it is healthy here.

H. L. Hasting has sent me the Christian and some books on Egypt, for which he has my thanks.

We have heard of the terrible earthquake in the Mediterranean. All nature seems to be in a state of unrest.

No one feels like leaving Jerusalem. There is no fear of cholera here. But the pasha is cleaning the streets, and that is a very fine thing.

I wish I knew whether any people were coming from America this fall; but God only knows that, of course.

My courage was never better. I got pretty badly hurt, but am well now. I was well in ten days. Some of my teeth were knocked out, but are now grown in as firmly as ever.

Aug. 20. The Austrian and Russian steamers have stopped, and our mails are very uncertain. I have sent no flowers for three or four weeks.

Borghime's bank stopped payment last week, and many, I fear, will lose by it. But they still have money to pay if they wish to do it. They have enemies, and their course is making something of a stir.

I wish our friends in America could see the loads of grapes that come in every morning. This morning I counted eighty women with baskets loaded; and about one hundred camels. These grapes are immense.

A lady gave me two baskets of these fine grapes from her garden, and it was all I could do to bring them home. I wish a basket of them could be sent to Boston, that you might see what we have to eat here.

Mr. Winterstein has an invitation to go beyond the Jordan to visit the Bedawins, and he is going. He has become much interested in the Bedawins.

Mr. Floyd has a letter from one Joseph Laclar, Mauch Chunk, Pa. He has $10,000 to invest here.

I think the English will cut a canal from the Mediterranean to the Jordan. Something will be done here soon to call more attention to this country. I am thankful to my Heavenly Father that I came when I did, and that I am here now in the city of the Great King.—Alice E. Davis, in Age-to-Come Herald.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

POSTPONEMENT.

Owing to unavoidable causes the Annual State Conference, and Quarterly Conference of the Second District, of Arkansas, has been postponed till Friday before the third Sunday in November. Brethren will please take notice of the change. Again let me say, Come filled with God's love and strength to push the work of the Lord forward, and let this be one of the best meetings ever held in the state. I am getting a few letters from brethren asking about Arkansas. I will say to all who contemplate coming here, if they will write me and enclose a stamp I will try to give all the information they may wish about lands and location of churches.

JOHN W. TEAS, Sec,
Rondo, Ark.

"Prayer with and for others must grow out of our own private prayers. In the closet, with the door shut, we learn how to speak to our Father. He prays best in public who prays best alone. A congregation, however large, is a gathering of individual souls. "As in water, face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man."—Marling.

ONLY A LITTLE LONGER.

GILBERT L. RICE.

'Tis but a little longer we shall toil for daily bread,
And to find a resting place for our weary, aching head;
Soon we'll reach the land of plenty where we'll hunger nevermore,
And a resting place in glory, on that grand, eternal shore.

'Tis but a little longer we shall struggle to be just,
Though we have the strength that's promised if we in the Savior trust;
Yet we find the foe is mighty, and will surely gain the day
If we do not have the armor on, and always watch and pray.

'Tis but a little longer we shall groan to be redeemed,
Though we're called but a little while, yet long the time has seemed,
For we know that when he shall appear we then
Like him shall be,
For we shall in his presence dwell, and all his glory see.

'Tis but a little longer we shall hear the groans of earth,
From the suffering sons and daughters of inestimable worth;
For the glorious day is dawning that shall end all earthly woes,
When the King shall come in glory, and triumph o'er his foes.

'Tis but a little longer, for the land's almost in view,
Soon our conflicts will be over and our journey will be through;
Then let us not we weary as the battle waxes hot,
But whatever are our trials be contented with our lot.

'Tis but a little longer we shall part with friends we love,
Soon, if faithful, we shall meet them in that city from above.
If Jesus dwells within our hearts why should we mourning go?
Submissive, let us kiss the rod, however hard the blow.

'Tis but a little longer we must bear the daily cross;
'Tis the burning, fiery trials that take away the dross;
Let us then no longer murmur at the hardness of the way,
For it leads us on to glory, to a bright and endless day.

'Tis but a little longer we'll be sorely tempted here;
The world, the flesh, the devil, we'll soon no longer fear,
Beyond the reach of Satan and his wicked acts we'll be
In God's eternal kingdom, then forever safe and free.

Our Heavenly Inheritance.

They who are not familiar with the gospel of the kingdom, mostly suppose that death transfers them beyond the bounds of space, and forever separates them from terrestial relations; and that in that far away clime a ceaseless round of bliss is the reward of faith. Others, whose minds have been more enlightened, recognize the fact that "the meek shall inherit the earth," and that the present field of cosmic strife shall become the future realm of peace to God's people.

There is a constant human tendency to go to extremes; and so strong does this exist in some cases, that it amounts to aberration of sight—mental if not retinal. Debate often seeks to debar a legitimate premise, lest it present an unstudied phase of the subject; and the bar once erected is hardly removed by the one who interposes it. Noble are the exceptions.

In the discussion of the reward of the saints, one party denies any earthly inheritance; and another, inadvertently, in proving the contrary, thinks it necessary to disallow any heavenly inheritance. This is the unfortunate mode of combatting an error, and also the most ineffective, because it will not concede the truth of established and minor premises.

Truly the promise to our father Abraham involves the land on which he dwelt a stranger, a foot of which he never owned except a sepulchre by purchase; yet the promise is that he shall possess it—an inheritance which he can enjoy only after the resurrection. In fact by faith he became "heir to the world," and jointly with the faith-seed will possess a royal title over his patrimony.

But Abraham's hope compassed more than the earth's domain—broad as that is, for he also aspired to an inheritance of another creation. The earth one seems adequate, but the exceeding grace of God bestows superabundance; and jointly with a mundane possession, the "Friend of God" looked for a heavenly inheritance—the Jerusalem above.

A testimony which establishes this assertion is Heb. xi. 9, 10, 16;—"By faith he became a sojourner in the land of promise, as in a land not his own, dwelling in tents with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise; for he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. Now they desire a better country—that is a heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed of them, to be called their God, for he hath prepared for them a city."

It is freely admitted that the patriarchs do not obtain possession of the promised land, neither "enter through the gate into the city" which is heavenly, until the return of Christ the life-giver; so when we frankly concede the true and natural import of this quotation, it by no means sanctions the idea that "death is the gate to endless joy."

Paul's evidence clearly shows that they looked for a city which is heavenly in its location—one whose builder is God—hence this city that they anticipated was not that earthly city of which it is written: "The sons of strangers shall build thy walls"—though the latter city is embraced in their earthly domain.

There are two Jerusalems. The apostle sets forth the fact that an earthly and a heavenly city named Jerusalem exist, when to the Galatians he writes: "Hagar is Mt. Sinai in Arabia, and answereth to the Jerusalem that now is: for she is in bondage with her children. But Jerusalem which is above is free, which is our mother."

Could such an allusion to a city above be made in contrast to a city on the earth, if no heavenly city were to exist? Impossible. It is inadmissible to contrast a fact with a figure. The earthly city is real—a mother of bond children. The heavenly Jerusalem must also be real, as she is the mother of free children. The children in either case are facts, and their political parents must also be tangible. Hence also the free children can say—"Our citizenship is in heaven from whence we look for a Savior." Phil. iii. 20. That our names are inscribed in a city's register is further declared in Heb. xii. 23, and here also the fact of a heavenly city is reasserted, and announced to be God's city—the city of his residence.—Ye are come unto Mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem. . . . to the general assembly and church of the first-born, whose names are enrolled in heaven.

Anciently, as well as at present, it was customary to have the names of citizens enrolled in the city books. The Register which is in the city of the living God contains the names of every saint, and this enrollment makes us citizens of Jerusalem above; and as that city is in the heavens, our names are consequently enrolled in heaven, and our citizenship there.

In harmony with the fact that this inheritance is in heaven, Peter says that God "Begot us unto an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you who by the power of God are guarded through faith unto a salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time." 1 Pet. i. 3, 4.

Here is presented an inheritance which is reserved in heaven, and hence must be distinct from the earthly inheritance of Canaan. This inheritance reserved in heaven is incorruptible—a quality which cannot be ascribed to the promised land in the coming age; it is undefiled—a condition not characteristic of Palestine in the future, for in that land Gehenna will exist as a defilement; it is fadeless—distinguishing it's perennial freshness from seasonable charges which continue on the cosmos throughout the age to come.

The idea involved in the last clause of our quotation relates to the "inheritance" rather than to "a salvation" as "ready to be revealed in the last time." During the chilliad the presence of the Jerusalem which is above "will be clearly revealed by its effulgent glory which bathes the earth to such an extent that the nations shall walk in the light of it."

If the Bible statements so far quoted are not figures (and the laws of language forbid that), then we may truly say "We know that if the earthly house of our tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands eternal [aionian] in the heavens." 2 Cor. v. 1.

The prophets have plainly foretold the dissolution of the present cosmos, and were it not for the promise of an inheritance reserved in heaven, we might well question where the saints of God would abide while the world is being "dissolved with fervent heat," and recreated for the millennial age; but with the inspired information we may complacently anticipate such a change, knowing that it occurs that a better creation may be the result, and that we have an incorruptible residence—a building of God, a house not made with hands,—one which is aionian in the heavens.

The translation of the Greek aionian into the English word "eternal" is, to say the least, misleading. Aionian means age-lasting, and its use in our text is to teach that one building which God has made for us, and which is unaffected by the burning of the earth, is secure from the fact that it is age-lasting in the heavens. This city is not an earthly but a heavenly one, and its suspension for above our atmosphere is age-lasting in duration. In such a city there is no cause to fear the burning of the world, for it is secure far above the conflagration.

The present situation of this city is in the heaven of heavens, but during the chilliad it will be brought down into more intimate relation with the earth; and it is with respect to its visible existence in the new heavens of the millennium that it is said to be "age-lasting in the heavens." This will be apparent from the fact that at the close of the thousand years the city comes down to the earth, which descent must terminate its age-lasting attitude in the heavens; and it defines the age conspicuously indicated by the word aionian. Knowing that this city is to descend from heaven we can say with Paul: "We have not here an abiding city, but we seek after the city which is to come." Heb. xiii. 14.

From Revelations xxi. 9 to xxii. 5, inclusive, we have a literal description of our heavenly inheritance. Within the above limits not a single symbol is embraced. If this description is all a symbol, as the Swedenborg's claim, then each part of the whole narrative must be symbolic.

If the gates of the city are symbolic, then the river of the water of life is. If the golden street is a figure, then the face of God is a figure, as well as his throne. If the wall is a symbol, then the tree of life is unreal, and its fruit and sanitary leaves are also ideal. And if all these be symbols who will tell their antitypes.

How strange it is that where there is not the slightest intimation of there being a symbol in the whole narrative, nor yet an attempt at explanation of such assumed symbols, still some, without a shadow of foundation, prefer to be mistified by declaring it all symbolic, and open a wide door for every manner of interpretation; for since interpretation is given (for the simple reason that no symbols are employed), the attempts of symbolizers are divergent as the points of the compass.

Believing that our readers assert that a literal tree of life once flourished in Eden, we know that they cannot deny literality to the "tree of life in the midst of the paradise of God." Rev. ii. 7. Now while so consistently admitting this we ask that they allow the paradise, or garden to be literal also, and as the river of life is a feature in the garden its literality, of course, cannot be doubted. It would be anomalous to have literal trees in a literal garden watered with figurative water!

The tree of life in the New Jerusalem is in the paradise of God. It is God's garden because connected with his residence, and his throne is there. God and Christ are there personally present, so that their faces are seen by the immortal citizens. The literal water of life issues forth from the base of God's literal throne.

Thus, if we examine every particular of the New Jerusalem, there will appear no reason why it is not a literal description of a real city; and since God must possess a royal city, to which Christ went when he ascended to his Father's house, the only lawful and consistent course for us to pursue is to accept the Savior's description of our heavenly inheritance as indeed "faithful and true"—if we wish to be sanctified by this truth.

From a high mountain the Revelator views in vision the gorgeous scene. A city radiating light like a diamond is seen high up in the etherial blue. Descending from the starry height it takes its station in heaven's vault over against John's elevated position. It is a square city surrounded by a diamond wall three hundred feet high, through which penetrate twelve gates of massy pearl. This, the metropolis of the universe, is measured by the angel attendant, and found to be twelve hundred miles square. Its length, and its breadth, and its height are equal. 1,200 miles in altitude.

One might hastily conclude that the city is a cube, but since such a queer idea is foreign to our conceptions of a city, we should, if possible, ascertain if the measurements as specified do not agree with a more appropriate idea. Since the city is square it is reasonable to concede that 1200 miles is the measurement of each side. But the height of the city is also 1,200 miles, and what we wish to know is what the two extremes of this height measurement are.

If this latter measurement starts from the first foundation stone of the wall, and reaches perpendicular upward along a mass of upright golden mason work inside the wall till a perpendicular height of 1,200 miles is reached, then indeed, we would have a cubical box styled a city—but there is a lack of certainty as to these points being the extremes of measurement, for a more rational solution is consistent with the literal word, and hence to be preferred.

It is certain that John saw this city suspended in the heavens, and that in this suspended location it must have been a definite distance above the earth, and this distance above the earth is truly its height. If a balloon is seen in the sky, and one asked the probable height of it, no one thinks that the question is speaking of the perpendicular measurement of the balloon, but rather of its height above the ground.

The meagre words of inspiration are simply this: "The length and the breadth, and the height thereof are equal"—each 1,200 miles; and it is for us to interpret this language literally, and as consonant with reason as possible. Literally the "cubical" and the "altitude" theory of its application are both legitimate, but when we come to the analogy of things, the weight of evidence preponderates in favor of the altitude of the city being referred to by the term "height," since this is the idea when we refer to distant elevated things, such as the sun, moon, and stars and suspended objects, while the "cubical" theory forces us to attempt to conceive what is incongruous with the narrative, and contrary to our knowledge of things. Just to think of a wall 300 feet high called the "great and high" while it incloses mason work perpendicularly 1200 miles high inside of it—why the wall should then be called "exceedingly small and low" instead of "great and high."

Then again who could imagine at what elevation in this cube the river of life would flow—would it be tunneled above it for the foundation of above structures or would it flow on top of the cube, and its bed of impervious sand be the roofing of mansions beneath it. So we might query with regard to the tree of life, and other features—the cube is unfathomable and quite perplexing as to definiteness, and even invites and invents perplexity of thought.

But the altitude theory suggests no such intricacies. It assumes that the "height" of the city refers to its height above the earth suspended over which the Revelator beheld it. The features of the city are not disturbed by this theory. It is a city 1200 miles square, built as most cities, on more or less of a plain. Its river has the blue dome of heaven as its ceiling, and the basal structure of the city as its bed. The tree of life sends its roots into the golden oxed alluvium, and its mansions tower in splendor from the same general level into the air above. The height of this "beautiful Zion" is 1200 miles above the earth.

Other Scriptures have informed us that our heavenly inheritance is a city which for an age is suspended in the heavens, but they have not told us its exact altitude. The interpretation of the height of the city here suggested supplies this definite information.

The foundation of the wall of the city is composed of precious gems, fittingly employed in a building which is both God's palace and the future home of his redeemed people. The amethyst, saphire, emerald, beryl, etc., embellish and beautify his dwelling. No temple is built in that spacious city—for holy and immortal are all its glorified citizens, and worship and praise is the spontaneous voice of every act.

The city has no need of the sun and moon, for its own splendor of light makes nature's illumination a shadow. The Glory of God and of Christ permeate the city. As might be expected such a brilliant city, and one so transparent, could hardly be otherwise than visible to the earth from so short a distance as 1200 miles high. The inspired penman, anticipating the thought, informs us that "The nations shall walk in the midst of the light thereof." These nations are not the residents of the city, but of the earth, where the effulgence of the city sheds its holy radiance.

"The kings of the earth [Christ and his saints] do bring their glory into it." Glorified with Christ we embrace the glory of the city. We "shall bring the glory and the honor of the nations into it," as rapidly as the subjects of the kingdom of Christ become perfect through the discipline and instruction of the future age. Night and day alternate on the earth, but not in the heavenly city, for there is no night there.

The city is largely built of transparent gold—though the millioneth of its wealth of precious and unknown mineral and metal may be unexpressed, as they are beautifully arranged with theores which are most precious to earth. A large plateau of gold centres the city, and this is divided by the crystal stream of life whose origin is beneath the adjacent throne. Decking the river banks is the forest of life, yielding luscious vital fruit every month, and foliaged with leaves which are made serviceable to the nations on the earth, through their healing virture.

During the millennial continuance of this city in the heavens, the saints with Christ reign over the earth, and billions of happy subjects experience the blessedness of their imperial sway. The nations are in a probationary state, and their life depends upon their fidelity to the perfect instruction given. The saints have each their mansion in the heavenly city, besides their earthly palaces in that section of the world where their particular jurisdiction has been appointed by Christ. The passage of the saints from the Celestial city to any location on the earth is but momentary, and aptly suggested by Jacob's dream of the ladder which reached heaven.

Certainly there is a "city of the living God"—an inhabited place where God resides, and where his throne is. If we believe that God is a real person—such as Christ who is the exact impress of his person—we must believe that there is somewhere a locality resplendent with the most precious substances of creation, where that presence is manifested, for "angels behold the face of their Father" somewhere. Such a place the New Jerusalem is declared to be—and why should we doubt it?

What more natural than that the abode of Deity should be ornamented with forestry, that its fruitage should be generous to the taste, and its foliage health bestowing? And why should not the throne of Jehovah be there and the Diety under these harmonious circumstances, be visible to all his people? Why should not a river of water bathe the verdant strand, and yield delight to the partakers of its vital fluid? "There is a river the streams whereof make glad the city of God."

They who believe that we have intangible and immaterial existence immediately after death: who believe that God is "without body form or parts:" who believe that he is an invisible essence; that this essence pervades all space alike;—they who believe this may well annihilate all reality from the described residence of God, for such an "essence" needs no associate realities.

But we who believe that God is a person, having a form like Christ, recognize the consistency of substantial surroundings; and as mind cannot conceive of associate realities more befitting such a residence as is described in Revelation, we readily accept the inspired pen-picture of our heavenly home, knowing that its glories exceed all earthly imagination; the more so as the portrayal is not ideal, nor beyond the realm of the thinkable.

Indeed it is true with respect to our heavenly inheritance that "eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God has prepared for them that love him, but God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit," and in this instance his spirit communicated through the Revelator.

Glorious revelation to the church of the first-born! Beautiful unveiling of our celestial home! Grand portrayal of the palaces of our God! With what thankfulness should we accept such radiant disclosures of our "treasure in heaven!" With what joy may we confess that "in heaven we have a better and enduring substance" than we can be deprived of on earth! With what humility should we recognize the Omnipotent favor which crowns the incentives of the sacred volume with this finale so superlatively great!

The words of the risen Savior cheering the weary pilgrim with no uncertain promises, declare that "to him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God." Blessed promise; and a blessed seal to the realities of future glories!

Editor Restitution:

As I have not written for THE RESTITUTION since I embraced the Faith, perhaps it would be encouraging to the brethren and friends scattered over the country, to say that I am in the vineyard of the Great Teacher, preaching the word. On the last Saturday and Sunday in September I held a meeting in Guthrie county, Iowa, at the Winebrennarian chapel where I had preached two years, some six years ago. I spoke on Sunday, on the coming kingdom and reign of Christ. Odd of their officials told me, after I preached at night, I could preach in their meeting house no more. At night I preached on the gospel to a large congregation. At the close of the meeting three persons arose and stated that they had decided to start in the new life. And one other man stated that he had not looked in his Bible for fourteen years; that during this meeting he had received such light on God's truth that he should read his Bible again. On Monday morning, just before I started for home, a gentleman invited me to hold a meeting in his neighborhood, some three miles further west. He had heard me the night before.

The Sabbath question is carefully and lengthily examined, and presented and discussed in a somewhat new light.

The work also includes the consideration of Sunday, conditional immortality, the gospel, return of the Jews, the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, punishment of the wicked, the state of the dead, the new birth, the one faith, the one hope, the image of God, nature of Christ, the name, religion, morality, Christianity, etc.

CIRCULAR.

To the Students of Prophecy throughout the World:

The undersigned proposes to issue from the press, either in Chicago or in New York City, as circumstances may decide, the following works, to-wit:

I. The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. In the first division the nature of the Coming Age is fully discussed, as to its physical and moral character: 1. That the earth itself has a crowning age, in which it shall be perfectly adapted to be the residence of man in his highest type; 2. That man, in that resurrection state, will be under the endless reign of the Personal Messiah; 3. In establishing the proximity of that age, the prophecies of Ezekiel, Isaiah, Daniel, Zechariah, Christ, Paul, Peter, and the Apocalypse, are critically examined, relative to its rapid approach.

II. The second work will be devoted to the investigation of the various phases of the Eastern Question:—1. The Egyptian phase, 2. The British phase, 3. The Russian phase, 4. The Ottoman phase, 5. The Hebrew phase, 6. The American phase, 7. Lesser phases of the Eastern Question, 8. The location of each of the Great Powers in the coming contest, 9. All nations marshal under the banners of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. These powers are traced in history to the present time. All the great national issues are fully investigated.

If all that are interested in these great and most sublime topics will aid, they will be issued immediately. They will be printed and bound in a form that will do credit to the vastness of the subjects, and put to subscribers at prices quite reasonable. The books will contain about [illegible] large royal 8vo. pages each.

RUSSIAN PHASE OF THE EASTERN QUESTION.--No. 11.

Who is the Russian? A review of the early history of that people. The tribes composing the Empire. Its physical resources. National character, mental, moral, political and religious.

Who is the Russian? It is said that God "Hath made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation; that they should seek the Lord." Acts xvii. 26, 27. This national location is ordered to suit God's purposes relative to the Jews. "When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel. For the Lord's portion (is) his people: Jacob (is) the lot of his inheritance." Deut. xxxii. 8, 9. In the land of Israel (at Jerusalem) God fixed his dwelling, gave to the Jews a lot, then divided the remainder of the earth into fields for the other nations; thus had the Russian his field given him of old. All the earth, which was not to be occupied and filled by his special family, the Hebrews, was divided out to other families. As, on special occasions, halls have seats reserved for the noted, and for the actors in the entertainment, so has Jehovah reserved a certain land for special occupants, and other fields as specially designed for distinguished guests, such as Egypt and Assyria, (Isa. xix. 25); at the same time he (God) lets out the other fields to more ordinary tenants. This is right. This right [illegible] exercises. The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof. It belongs, therefore, to him to parcel out the fields and to assign them their tenants. To the north he assigned those that, in process of time, gave birth to the Russian. [illegible] have been [illegible] family to the soil. [illegible] fitness. Before [illegible] fitness let us take a [illegible] Beyond the zone of the [illegible] scattered Israel and Judah lie the Arctic belt, through whose [illegible] the constellation of the great bear describes its perpetual circuit round the north pole; and through whose snow and ice regions the white bear of the north wanders in quest of a scanty and precarious subsistence. The tenant family of such a field has appropriately selected the bear as a national symbol. This arctic (bear) field and its tenant will now, for a time, occupy our attention.

The Russian field.—Beyond the zone of the four Gentile monarchies lies the Russian division of the globe. It covers all the north of Asia, and the northeast of Europe, and contains 8,000,000 square miles. It is remarkable, that, at this period, (time of the end), the empires of the north and the south should cover equal areas (8,000,000 sq. m.) The British empire, however, covers the belt of ancient empires, while the Russian dominion lies far to the north of it, outside of the ancient fields of cultivation and refinement.

Let us survey this arctic great bear, or Russian field in its various aspects: its topography, its geological structure, its surface configuration, its soil, its climate, and its resources. We shall then be in a position to appreciate the character and national greatness of its tenant.

Its topography.—Its land and water divisions are exceedingly varied. Its mountains, hills, plains and valleys are almost endless in their extent, form, and aspect. The European division of the Russian field is an extended plain, sufficiently elevated, however, toward its centre, to afford sluggish streams to the Caspian, the Black, the Baltic, the White Seas, and the Arctic Ocean. Great rivers, having their sources principally in the region of Moscow, its geographical centre, course their ways, as from a wheel hub, into these boundary waters. These rivers furnish [illegible] enable drainage, complete irrigation, and, when not bound up in water [illegible] great commercial advantages. Three plains and rivers furnish food and raiment, while the Ural mountains, on the northeast, furnish abundant supply of the valuable metals, gold, iron and platinum. Immense [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

AGRICULTURAL COLONIES IN PALESTINE.

Under this title, the Jewish Chronicle publishes recently an article on the progress of the movement which has for its object to reinstate the Jews into Palestine and make the Holy Land once more the patrimony of the Children of Israel. The writer is very much in favor of the Jewish colonization of Palestine, and his remarks apply with equal force to that of Syria. We reproduce the substance of his remarks in the following. He says:

"Between the adherents of the literal interpretation of prophecy and those who hold that the cosmopolitan mission of Judaism requires for its fulfillment cosmopolitan dispersion there are numerous gradations of opinion which can easily satisfy different minds. Even at the extremes there are distinctly opposite views. Those who look forward to a return may differ as widely as the poles as to the means of attaining it. Some only expect the consummation of Jewish history to be brought about by a direct and visible intervention of the divine hand. Others [illegible] consistently that the divine will only works through human and natural instruments, and that the recovery of Palestine by the Jews will be effected by the ordinary interaction of political forces. And of those who consider the dispersion as a permanent manifestation of Jewish doctrines, some may fear that the settlement of many Jews in Palestine would disturb the Jewish mission, while others consider that the position of the Jews would be strengthened by having a centor for their religious propagandism."

Having stated that of late years Christian opinion has been much more energetically concerned with the problem than the minds of, at least, the western Jews, the writer goes on to say:

"Of course, the fact which has brought the problem of the return within the region of practical politics is the present state of the Eastern Question. The malady of the Sick Man is visibly growing into fatal proportions. The disruption of the Turkish empire seems only to be a question of years. And when the event comes round, the position of Syria is clearly important enough to merit the most earnest struggles of diplomatists. The overland railway to Bagdad is certainly no more Utopian than the Suez canal appeared twenty years ago. And the importance of such a railway as a basis of operation is decidedly not underrated. And the movement for a second canal naturally increases the strategic importance of neighboring lands. It is, therefore, quite on the political cards that in the contest of international interests the foundation of a neutral Jewish republic might be welcomed as a very suitable compromise between the various claims that might conflict for the position of Syria. It is, therefore, with no idle dream that those are concerned who consider that towards a question rapidly becoming practical, an answer equally practical should be found before the time for action or inaction shall come.

Whether Jews should observe an attitude of action or inaction in relation to the return, the author of the article is not prepared to decide off-hand. "Whether to the reconstruction of nations which the present century has seen, the reorganization of Israel is to be added as a crowning episode of modern history, is a question which appeals with intense attraction to the imagination. That the immense labor and sufferings of the Jews should not fall to the ground, but should result in the realization of the hopes of the race, is undoubtedly a wish that irresistibly arouses the deepest feelings of Jewish hearts. The return has formed the aspiration of all the noblest sons of Israel during the dispersion; and it is not strange that it should still retain its hold on those who inherit their spirit. On the other hand, much is to be said for the opinion that any premature indulgence of this sentiment is likely to be prejudicial in view of anti-Semitic accusations of want of patriotism."

Some there are who say, "We are conscientiously opposed to any movement towards a local or national limitation of Judaism," but they do not like to be forced to avow this opposition. To these the writer replies as follows:

"This argument may appear plausible, but in reality it does not take in the true aspect of affairs. The opponents of the return overlook the fact that these colonies have already been founded; that men of Jewish blood are actually engaged in tilling the soil of the land of Palestine; that these brother Jews of ours are in need of friendly assistance; that such assistance is not eleemosynary in character, but will aid the colonists to help themselves. The colonists are there, and must be treated with as on the spot. The advocates of universal Judaism, and therefore the opponents of the return must recognize that apart from, and even against their wills, Jewish colonists have settled in Palestine, and they cannot contend that thereby these brothers of ours have ceased to be Jews or lost their claim upon us."

As we observed before, every one of the remarks relating to the settlement of Jews in Palestine applies with equal force to their settlement in Syria. Altogether, we are glad to notice that the subject is beginning to receive some little attention, even from those Jews who seem to set no store whatever by the prophecies contained in the Old Testament.—Prophetic News.

THE PROPOSED PALESTINE CANAL.

At a time when public attention is being so much drawn to the question of means of communication for our shipping between the Mediterranean Sea and the Indian Ocean, it will interest your readers to consider in what way this subject affects the fulfillment of those prophetical views which have so often been expounded in your journ[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] traction [illegible] Isthmus canal having been withdrawn, it is only reasonable to suppose that the great shipowners of this country, who are at present very dissatisfied with the high rates charged and the scanty accommodation furnished by the present canal, will promote some alternative canal, and thus solve the problem. On taking a survey of the situation it appears that the project which would to the greatest extent benefit England will be the construction of a canal through Palestine. The various schemes are as follows:

1. The present Suez canal, as is well known, leads from Port Said on the Mediterranean to Suez on the Red Sea. It is about 100 miles in length, about 100 yards in breadth, and 36 feet deep. For 25 miles of its length it passes through the Bitter Lakes. The chief objections that England has to make to it are: First, that it is too much under French control, and English interests are not sufficiently recognized, notwithstanding that more than three-fourths of the revenue is derived from English vessels. Secondly, the canal dues are too high, and the pilotage rates oppressive; and, again, the canal is too narrow, and often gets blocked.

2. The Egyptian canal, proposed by Mr. John Fowler, the well-known English engineer, is devised to pass from Alexandria to Suez, and is nearly 240 miles in length. Its construction would doubtless be a very costly and lengthy operation, and might give rise to many complications with France.

3. The Palestine canal, to which I wish to draw special attention, would leave the Mediterranean at Acre and join the Gulf of Akabah. Its length will be about 250 miles. Its course will be from Acre, near Mount Carmel, across Palestine to the Valley of the Jordan, following this valley to the Dead Sea, and thence down to the Gulf of Akabah, which leads into the Red Sea.

The Dead Sea is about 1,292 feet below the level of the Mediterranean Sea, whilst the Mediterranean and the Red Sea are on the same levels. The Dead Sea is 43 miles in length.

The manner in which it is proposed to carry out this great work is to cut an opening from the Mediterranean into the Valley of the Jordan, and to let the waters of the Mediterranean flow in and fill up the Dead Sea and the valleys leading to and from it, and the result will be that a broad lake five miles in width and of great depth will be obtained, along which ocean steamers may proceed at full speed.

No doubt this great work would be attended with cost, but it must be borne in mind how great the advantages of this scheme would be to our country, if promoted by England, formed by English capital, and used for the development of communication between our eastern and western empire.

In this letter I cannot pause to enter into details, to afford statistics as to cost and probable revenue, or to give a more definite or accurate description of the country which this canal traverses. Enough for the moment to say that such a scheme is being considered, and that at the present time, no less than in the past, Palestine seems about to play a very prominent part in the destinies of the world.

The effect which this great work would produce upon Palestine by fertilizing valleys at present arid and desert, and the manner in which it would tend to bring about the return of the Jews, are matters on which, at some future time, I hope to have the opportunity of addressing some remarks to you.—Petra, in Prophetic News.

Recent Terrestrial Convulsions.

The great earthquake in Asia Minor again calls attention to the extraordinary tendency to seismic disturbance manifested of late by the crust of the earth. The recent tremendous outburst in Java and the Straits of Sunda seemed a fitting culmination to the series of earthquakes and volcanic eruptions that preceded it. It is evident, however, that the disturbing forces are yet at work, and that their field of operations extends to nearly every quarter of the earth.

Since the Javan convulsion, we have had news of earthquakes in Europe, North and South America, and Asia. Although men of science do not countenance the theories of Capt. Delaupney, the Frenchman who is credited with having predicted the catastrophe in the East Indies, and who asserts that the present earthquake cycle will not culminate until 1885 or 1886, it is very clear that for several years these convulsions have tended toward a maximum in both number and violence. Nobody is in a position to say that we have yet beheld either the last or the worst of them. During the last five years this stage-coach of the solar system called the earth has several times rudely reminded its swarming billion and a half [illegible] passengers that, while it bears them along so smoothly on its easy axle, and encounters no ruts nor rough places in its noiseless road, it can of itself, on occasion, shake them up and make them uncomfortable. And as there are no stations and no jumping-off places on the journey through space, the earth's passengers must make the best of it. If their coach goes to pieces, there is no help for them.

Beginning with the disasters at Agram, Ischia, and Chios, a few years ago, and running through the list of subsequent shakings and upheavals great and small up to the present time, we have an astonishing exhibition of terrestrial violence. The ocean wave that the convulsion at Java sent across the Pacific was in itself a most wonderful thing, though not unprecedented. The tides excite no astonishment, because they are regular phenomena, and the cause which produces them is understood, but there is something almost startling in the thought that the earth has the power within its own bosom thus to set its oceans into commotion.

One of the chief features of the recent series of disturbances of the earth is the widespread nature of the phenomena. The activity of the subterranean forces in the earthquake period noticed by Humboldt between 1811 and 1813 was confined between the meridian of the Azores and the western edge of the Mississippi valley, reaching to Caracas in South America. The present outbreak has been felt all around the world.

The manner in which old volcanoes, whose chimneys had grown cold centuries ago, have suddenly begun first to smoke and then to belch forth clouds of ashes and streams of lava within the last five years is exceedingly interesting. Nearly every one of the famous volcanic giants of the earth has, within the same period, responded to the universal signal which seems to have been given in the interior of the globe by smoking, shaking its sides, roaring, and in some cases breaking into eruption. During this time about twenty new volcanoes have made their appearance, a whole nest of them having arisen out of the bottom of the Straits of Sunda.

A singular phenomenon, awakening both curiosity and alarm, which has recently been witnessed in two widely separated parts of the earth, is believed to have been in some way connected with the recent earthquakes and eruptions. This is the discolored appearance presented by the sun in southern India and South America early in September. The color was described as green in India and as blue at Panama and Guayaquil. That it was a very striking phenomenon is shown by the fact that in the brief accounts of it which have been received from both countries the fear which it excited among the people is described. This recalls certain mysterious occurrences which have from time to time alarmed the world and puzzled scientific men, such as the great dry fog of 1783, which terrified all Europe, and the famous dark day in New England in 1780.

It is quite natural that the phenomenon of a green sun seen in India should have been attributed to the passage across the southern portion of the peninsula of clouds of sulphurous vapor from the Javan volcanoes. Probably this affords a true explanation; but although the same explanation has been offered of the American phenomenon, there are several reasons why it cannot be accepted. In the first place, and this alone is sufficient, the sun appeared discolored in South America before it did in India. It is evident that if the phenomenon was due in both cases to volcanic vapors, there must have been an emission of such vapors into the atmosphere in the equatorial regions of America. This is partly explained by the news from Panama, that at the time of the eruptions in Java strange subterranean noises were heard, and that shakings of the earth were felt at various places in Ecuador. Ashes also fell there, indicating that there had been an outburst from some of the volcanic vents in the Andes. So far no news has been received of any such eruption, although it is known that Cotopaxi was in action last summer. But the fact that the earth trembled in South America at the time when the western end of Java is shattered and the bottom of the Straits of Sunda was upheaved is alone sufficient to show how general is the disturbance which has resulted in such disasters as those in Ischia, Java, and Asia Minor.

We have reason to be thankful that New York city stands on a rock that appears to be free from earthquake tremors, and has no volcano in its neighborhood.—N. Y. Sun.

THE CITY OF THE LIVING GOD.

Rev. xxi 9-27; xxii. 1-5.

Jerusalem, the city of our God;
O happy home! O happy children here!
O blissful mansions of our Father's house!
O walks surpassing Eden for delight!
Here are the myriads reaped once sown in tears;
Here is the rest by sickness unabused;
Here is the banquet of the wine of heaven,
Richer of glory incorruptible.
Crowns, amaranthine crowns of victory,
The voice of harpers harping on their harps,
The anthems of the holy cherubim,
The crystal river of the Spirit's joy,
The Bridal palace of the Prince of Peace,
The Holiest of Holies—God is here.

The question has been keenly controverted whether the new Jerusalem, Rev. xxi., xxii., is actually the abode of the heavenly citizens, or only a representation of the Church Triumphant under the emblem of a city. The advocates of a purely symbolical meaning maintain, "The bride is a city, and the city is a bride: both expressions are therefore figures to describe the glorious community of ransomed souls, the mystical body of Christ, and blessed company of all faithful people." But to this it may be sufficient to reply that, in the contrasted case of Babylon (Rev. xvii. 1-3, 18), the woman is a city, and the city is a woman. Both expressions are figures to denote the apostate Papal Church. But this does not prevent the existence of the actual city of Rome, a material structure, which shall be consumed with material fire. The site and the buildings are, indeed, of very secondary importance to the character of the harlot Church who occupies them; for it is her faithlessness which gives them all their disastrous significance. But there they are, seven hills crowned with edifices on the banks of the Tiber. So of the new Jerusalem: the city, it is true, is a type of a spiritual building compacted of living stones, which is growing an holy temple unto the Lord, Eph. ii. 21.

But this does not preclude the possibility of an actual fabric, composed of heavenly material, which shall never be destroyed. Here, too, the site and the structure are of inferior moment to the virgin bride who shall dwell therein; for it is her saintliness which gives all its significance to her palace home. That home, however, exists, a glorious reality, an abiding city yet to come—a city which hath foundations, whose designer and builder is God. See Heb. xi. 10, 16; xiii. 14, which Scriptures strongly confirm this view. We are thus irresistibly led to the conclusion that the heavenly Jerusalem here described is both real and typical—an actual city, of which every part typifies the spiritual temple of living stones. For as the glorified body will be the worthy habitation of the perfectly regenerate spirit—a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens (2 Cor. v. 1)—so the celestial city will be the meet dwelling-place of the saints for ever, and their spiritual characteristics will each and all find a counterpart in that marvellous structure prepared for them by their God. Hence it is by no means easy, nor perhaps is it always desirable, to interpret the various details here given. They awaken conceptions of delight which we cannot always define or describe. But let us suffer those images of glory to float through our mind, and to rest in our heart, until we exclaim—

"Jerusalem! Jerusalem! would God I were in thee!
When shall my labors have an end, thy joys when shall I see?"

And perchance this unrolling of the glories to come has accomplished its chief intent; it has weaned us from earth; it has drawn us to heaven.—E. H. Bickersteth, M. A.

EXTRACT FROM A SERMON.

When the apostles went forth on their errand of mercy the burden of their mission was the story of Christ. They told the people how the Son of God had come into the world and died for their redemption. They never perplexed their hearers with subtle questions of theology, or with metaphysical theories of depravity, with discussions of prevenient grace and the grace of congruity, of moral and physical inability, of imputed righteousness as distinct from actual righteousness, of the philosophy of the atonement, of the nature and limits of divine inspiration. They did not undertake to solve the mystery of Christ's double nature, or to explain the mutual relations of the three Persons in the Godhead; but they made men feel that they were sinners, and uncovered the awful depths of corruption in which their souls were sunk; they declared in terms that could not be misunderstood the stern and impartial justice of God and the absolute certainty of punishment for every unforgiven sin; they published abroad the inexhaustible love and mercy of God and how he is always waiting for the return of his rebellious children and ready to receive them with open arms whenever they come back as the prodigal did, sorrowing and repenting. They proclaimed the grace which bringeth salvation and led men to the cross and showed them the Savior bleeding there in expiation of their transgressions; then they taught [illegible] and explicitly what were the duties which they owed to God, and just how those duties must be discharged. They enforced a gospel of righteousness and temperance, and chastity and charity, and honest and honorable dealing. They told parents and children, and masters and servants, and governors and employers and laboring men how they should conduct themselves and what were the motives by which they should be guided; they spoke blessed words of comfort to the weary and heavy-laden, the weak and the suffering, the down-trodden and oppressed. They told men how in Christ Jesus death had lost its sting and the grave its victory, and pointed to a world where the tears are wiped from every eye and where there is no more sin or sorrow or sickness or vision; and it was thus that men were lifted heavenward and brought into the fold of Jesus. And when the ambassador of Christ is in earnest, whether he ministers to the refined and cultivated citizen of the metropolis, or the rougher or more enterprising emigrant on the outer borders of civilization, or to the oppressed and persecuted Indian, or to the unenlightened freedman, or to the besotted and ignorant heathen, it is the same story of a loving Savior which inspires his heart and gives efficacy to his words. —The Independent.

BIBLE RESEARCH.

Among the many difficulties presented by the ethnological lists in Genesis, not the least enigmatical is the one referring to the origin of the Philistines. A comparison of Gen. x. 14 with Deut. ii. 23, Amos ix. 7, and Jer. xlvii. 4, shows that they are mentioned both as descendants of the Casluhim and of the Caphtorim. Interpreters have sought all around the Mediterranean Sea for these places, and have located them very differently, Hitzig even identifying the Philistines with the Pelasgians. Professor Fr. W. Schultz has just issued his article "Philistor," in the second edition of Herzog's Encyclopædia, and there (vol. xi. p. 623, seq.) presents what seems a lucid explanation of the difficulty. Both Casluhim and Caphtorim were settled in Lower Egypt; and from these the people who were later called Philistines migrated to the land where we find them in biblical times. Already the "Targum Jerus" favors this location in reference to the Casluhim; and modern scholars, such as Forster, Knobel, Ebers, and others, sanction this, and find this location in Kasiotis. The name is derived from the Coptic Kar, hill, and Jokh, dryness, a true description of the locality. But how about Caphtor? Schultz correctly sees only endless trouble in connecting it with the island Crete, but acknowledges that as yet the evidences, historical or etymological, for placing it on the northern coast of Egypt are still weak. Stack, Ebers, Dietrich, Dunoker, simply locate it there, deeming the connection with it and the Casluchims a sufficient warrant. An additional proof of the Egyptian origin of the Philistines is found in the Egyptian ending of some of their proper names. Thus Achuzath, Gen. xxvi. 26, and Goliath, 1 Sam. xvii. 4, have the Egyptian ending th, and the ending -on in Soreh, the Philistine title, is Egyptian. Thus, too, the Philistine harbor Mayuma is a combination of the two languages, mai being Coptic for "place," and yam Hebrew for "sea."—The Independent.

Dear Brethren of the One Faith in Ind.:

Thinking you would like to hear from me in regard to my labors in the truth, I will give you a brief account of my work since leaving you. I went from Indiana to Millbrook, Mich., to attend their "meeting of days;" found Brother P. Decker, also sister Richard Decker very poorly in health. Brother Crosier was with us until Monday. I stayed until Thursday, having very interesting meetings each evening. The brethren here are strong in their work, interested and happy. From Millbrook I went to Hesperia, and stayed over the next Monday, baptising one sister. From Hesperia to Byron Center, where I baptized four happy believers, three young people. From Byron Center to Watson, where I am now working for a few evenings five miles from our central place of worship. Here, as well as at Byron, we have a well attended and very interesting Sunday school. Bros. Winchester and Bennett of Byron are throwing their talents into the Lord's vineyard. God bless their noble efforts for the truth. I find everywhere a great need of just such a hymn book as Brother McDonald proposes publishing. The friends of truth everywhere will hail it with joy. May the God of love and truth be with his faithful ones is the prayer of Yours in the Lord,

OBITUARY.

DIED—In Chicago, Sept. 30, 1883, Ralph Tuttle, aged 91 years.

The subject of this memoir was born in Norfolk, Ct., in 1792, was married to Hannah Mather of Chester, Mass., in 1823. Settled in Galesburg, Michigan, in 1836 where he remained until 1867 when he came to this city which was his home until the time of his death. In 1850 he united with the Disciples in Marshall, Mich. Soon after his union with the church he read Storrs' six sermons, which resulted in his embracing the doctrines therein taught; he continued to grow in a knowledge of the truth as well as in favor with God and man. He was strong in his convictions of truth and fearless to express them. He died in the hope of a glorious resurrection and rests to be awakened at the return of the Master. Sermon by H. V. Reed, opening services conducted by the writer,

C. C. RAMSEY.

DIED—In Menomonee, Dunn Co, Wis., Oct. 1, 1883, Grace Adelia, daughter of George Edwin, and Mattie Sedgwick Clark, aged six years and two months.

Our hearts were rent with anguish as we saw our little one pass into the enemy's land. But we sorrow not as those who have no hope. We know that Jesus lives to die no more. We know that he has the "keys of death and hades," and that he will open the prison house of the enemy and "bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison house." O blessed promise and glorious hope! Then sleep, dear little one, sleep until Jesus comes "to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound." Then we will welcome thee back from the enemy's land to this bright fair earth again, not as we welcomed thee six years ago, knowing then that you must suffer and die for the sin of our first parent. But we will welcome you to the paradise of God, restored by the Lamb of God that "beareth the sin (or taketh away the sin) of the world," (and so release the race from the Adamic death) and in that paradise shall be the city of the great King, and in the city shall be the river of life, and the tree of life, to which our little one may have access and live forever if she be obedient to the law of that heavenly country.

MRS. A. C. SEDGWICK HANCHETT.

Elder W. C. Hicks of Union Mills, Ind., will preach at North Salem, Church of God, Marshall Co., Ind., on the evenings of Nov. 5th and 6th; Bremen 7th and 8th, 1883.

The water in the leaves of pitcher-plants is secreted by the plant, and the quantity of water is surprising. In the species of Nepenthes, from the East Indies, where the plants ramble over bushes to a great extent and have numerous pitchers, the weight to be sustained is enormous. Nepenthes Rafflesiana has been found to have about a pint of water in each pitcher, and allowing a pint to a pound, it gives a pretty good weight to a few dozen pitchers. If the object of these wells be to drown insects to be used as food, these plants have to work hard for what they get, "as well as the rest of the world."

I planted a seed—a proper seed,
And waited for summer's golden hour:
It came, and over mountain and mead,
Yell sunlight soft and genial shower.
Then, for with wond'rous and loving speed
The earth was grateful, and sent a flower.

I planted again—a vagrant thing,
Without a name or pedigree,
And one bright morning, in the spring,
There came a plant none cared to see:
'Twas only a weed, and could not bring,
Such joy as the flower had brought to me.

Then I read this lesson to my heart,
Men ever will reap just what they sow;
Time bringeth up with its mother-art,
Only the kind we set to grow;
It may be right, with its better part—
It may be wrong, but the end will show.

Nature will nurse what we plant, with care,
And so will time what we do or say,
Or good, or ill, it is sure to bear,
And we to know it some future day;
O heart of mine, shall your fruit be rare,
Or only weeds to be cast away?

First-Fruits of a New Life.

In the home are seen the first-fruits of the new Christian life. In the home, character discovers itself. Habits are often like the clothes we wear, they vary according to occasion, and many have an in-door and an out-door dress. Many finely clad on the street are slovens in the house, and men polite and smiling in society or in business, are churls and bears in the precints of the home. On the other hand, while many gay-plumed birds of the world are nothing but crows and ravens, there are multitudes that shine to little advantage before the world who are clothed with the goodness and sweetness of an angel when their children climb about their knees or their wives nestle in their bosoms. It is in the home that goodness and piety are seen and felt. The whole structure of society is such, that the inner life of the soul is constantly revealed. Our very thoughts and motives are read by a scrutinizing world. Every day there are a hundred eyes reading the inscriptions upon the tablet of the heart, and the current judgment formed of a man's life is often the true one. We are living in the court of the world, the judge is on the bench and our fellow-men are like a jury rendering their verdict. But allowing all this, our true character is nowhere revealed as in the home. We do not wear masks here. We do not strive for effect nor covet admiration at the fireside, but simply act out our real nature. So when the grace of God touches the springs of our life, its first-fruits are seen in the home.

How Animals Have Foretold Earthquakes.

An Italian writer on the dreadful catastrophe which occurred on the island of Ischia mentions those prognostications of an earthquake which are derived from animals. They were observed in every place where the shocks were such as to be generally perceptible. Some minutes before they were felt the oxen and cows began to bellow, the sheep and goats bleated, and, rushing in confusion one on the other, tried to break the wicker-work of the folds. The dogs howled, the geese and fowls were alarmed and made much noise; the horses which were fastened in the stalls were greatly agitated, leaped up and down and tried to break the halters with which they were attached to the mangers; those on the road stopped suddenly and snorted in a very strange way. The cats were very much frightened and tried to conceal themselves, or their hair bristled up wildly. Rabbits and moles were seen to leave their holes; birds rose as if scared from the places on which they had alighted; and fish left the bottom of the sea and approached the shores, where at some places great numbers of them were taken. Even ants and reptiles abandoned, in clear daylight, their subterranean holes in great disorder, many hours before the shocks were felt. The dogs, a few minutes before the first shock took place, awoke their sleeping masters by barking and pulling them, as if they wished to warn them of impending danger; and several persons were thus enabled to save themselves.

My Dear Nephew:

I am not at all surprised that you say the view I present of Christ and his sacrifice, is entirely out of keeping with all your previous teachings, as it does away with the idea of the Trinity; for surely if Christ suffered for the sake of the joy that was set before him, he could not have been already in possession of all joy and all fullness which belongs to God only."

Let me just here say, that the doctrine of the Trinity has no place in the sacred Oracles. The revelation of our Father is all in harmony with truth and reason. There are no absolute impossibilities there recorded. We are told that our Savior is the only begotten Son of God. If then he is the Son as we are plainly taught, he cannot be the Father. This is only one of the vain dogmas of the creeds, which it is [illegible] to try to follow or explain. It is much better to search for truth, to robe ourselves in its beautiful garments, and, as the chrysalis drops its wasting, drying shell, so let us drop all these former errors and bask in the pure and holy light of revealed truth.

You say you have read Heb. xii. 2, and that it seems to convey the idea that Christ died and suffered for the sake of the reward which was set before him, and then you ask: how, then, could he have died for our sins?

I will give you as briefly as I can my understanding of these two seeming contradictions of Scripture, and I think it is in harmony with God's wise and wondrous plan of salvation. Christ died for our sins because he took upon him our nature which is a dying one, not that he suffered death to save us from death, or instead of us, seeing we all die. From Heb. ii. 14 we learn that he took part of our nature that through death he might destroy him that hath the power of death, that is the devil. Thus we see that he died because, or on account of our sinful nature of which he took part. He suffered patiently, endured all the buffetings, cruel mockings, scourgings, and even the ignominious death of the cross, for the joy that was set before him. This was not a selfish joy. He it was, who, by a life of perfect obedience to the Father's will, was by him raised from the dead before his flesh had seen corruption. For him the Father loosed the pains of death, because it was not possible that he should be holden of it. Acts ii. 24-36. He it was, who, after God had raised him from the dead, and when he was about to go up to his Father's right hand, said to his followers, (Matt. xxviii. 18-20,) "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, or for this reason, because I have obtained this power. Teach all nations, or make disciples of all nations; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and lo I am with you always, even to the end of the age." After that Christ was raised from the dead by the power of the Father, he remained on earth forty days, going in and out among his disciples, teaching them the things concerning the kingdom of God. This was the kingdom to which the thief referred when he said, "Lord remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." This was the kingdom to which the angel referred when giving the promise to Mary that her son should sit upon the throne of his father David, reign over the house of Jacob, and of his kingdom there should be no end. Luke i. 32, 33. This is the kingdom referred to in Dan. ii. 44, which shall break in pieces and consume all other kingdoms and stand forever. Again we read of it in Dan. vii. 14-27. Here we see that all people, nations and languages shall serve him; and furthermore we see that this kingdom is under, not above, the whole heaven.

Please read Mark xvi. 14-20. In verse 15, the commission universal is given to his disciples. In verse 16 the conditions of citizenship in that glorious and everlasting kingdom are laid down. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned. These are the terms and the only terms made known to us in the Bible whereby we may be saved, and this is why I said in my last that Christ, as it were, takes the place of the tree of life.

In the garden, when man stood forth upon the first platform on which he was placed by the Creator, the tree of life would have imparted to him the powers of immortal life. But he rejected the life-giving fruit, and by his disobedience he fell to a life of sin and death. On his first platform man needed not faith; the source of immortality was plainly in view, he had but to stretch forth his hand, take and eat. Then immortality would have been bestowed for simple obedience. Now, or on man's second platform, two things are required, faith and obedience. He must believe on the Lord Jesus Christ; he must believe on the Lord who shall be king over all the earth; on Jesus as a Savior who saves from death and washes away the sins of those who come to him by faith and obedience. He must believe on him as Christ, as the anointed son of David, the king of the Jews, the rightful sovereign over God's chosen people as foretold by all the holy prophets since the world began. More anon. Looking for that kingdom,

Yours,
AUNT CARRIE.

ADOPTION.

"When the fullness of time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons." Gal. iv. 4, 5.

The divine adoption is a good, rich, and profitable theme of study. To get a clear view of it, let us analytically consider its nature, duties, privileges, and conditions.

1. The nature of adoption. The Greek word for "adoption" is huiothesia, which means the placing as a son or child. For example, when the infant Moses was cast out, Pharaoh's daughter found him, "had compassion on him," and adopted him "for her own son," transferring him from the river shore to the royal palace. And when Esther was left a little orphan of the captivity, her cousin Mordecai adopted her "for his own daughter," and she afterwards became a queen.

But the divine adoption infinitely excels all these examples. It springs from and is an amazing instance of the love of God. "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us that we should be called the sons (children, R. V.) of God." 1 Jno. iii, 1. It includes all the blessings of the covenant of grace, for "we are the children of God: and if children, then heirs, heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ." Rom. viii. 17. Of this adoption there are two stages, the one now, the other "at the resurrection of the just." Therefore we read in one place, "Now are we the sons (children, R. V.) of God," and in another that we are "waiting for the adoption, to-wit, the redemption of our body." 1 John iii. 2; Rom. viii. 23. Hence, we see the process is not complete until the physical change by which we shall become "the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Luke xx. 36. "We look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ; who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body." Phil. iii. 20, 21. Thus the adoption will be consummated in making us "partakers of the divine nature." 2 Peter i. 4. No human adoption can work such a mighty physical transformation as this.

A prudent man desiring to adopt many children to bear his name and share his wealth might have to make long search in many countries in order to find such as would show themselves worthy of the honor by complying with the conditions of adoption. And does not this, in some degree, illustrate the fact that the Lord has a long time been visiting the nations, by the gospel, and gathering out from them "a people for his name?" Acts xv. 14. This adoption is, therefore, a separating process. "He that loveth father or mother more than me," says the Savior, "is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me." Mat. x. 37. We are warned that "evil company doth corrupt good morals" (1 Cor. xv. 33, R. V.); and however "strange" the wicked may think it "that we run not with them to the same excess of riot," we are required to "come out from among them." Hence, the adopted are the ecclesia, or, assembly of called out ones, and their adoption is also a change of character as well as of company, for, "If any man be in Christ he is a new creature." Naming a list of evil characters, Paul says, "And such were some of you; but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified." 1 Cor. vi. 11; 2 Cor. v. 17.

2. The duties of adoption. "Come out from among them and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty." 2 Cor. xi. 17, 18. The divine love which caused God to adopt such sinners as we are surpasses thought; and therefore we should "love him because he first loved us;" and obedience is the best way of showing our love, for the Savior says, "He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me." John xiv. 21. We are to let our conversation (manner of life, R. V.) be as becometh the gospel of Christ," and to "show forth the praises of him who hath called us out of darkness into his marvellous light." Phil. i. 27: 1 Peter ii. 9.

Gideon said to some of Israel's foes, "What manner of men were they whom ye slew at Tabor?" And they answered "Each one resembled the children of a king." So should even our enemies have to confess that we resemble, what we really are, the children of a King. Somewhere I have heard that Alexander, reprimanding a misbehaving namesake in his army, said, "Change your name, or show yourself worthy of it." And certainly the adopted children of the Heavenly King should "give none occasion to the adversary to speak reproachfully" of "that worthy name by the which ye are called." 1 Tim. v. 14; James ii. 7.

3. The privileges of adoption. The adopted have the privilege of being "called by a new name." Once they were "strangers and foreigners," but now they are "fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God." Eph. ii. 19. Of course, in becoming so they had to comply with the specified process and ceremony of what may illustratively be called their "naturalization," as it were. Once they were called "children of wrath," but now

"Behold what wondrous love
The Father hath bestowed
On creatures of a mortal race,
To call them sons of God."

Once they had no hope at all, but now they "rejoice in hope of the glory of God." "Ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord: walk as children of light." Eph. v. 8.

Our adoption was, as usual, from a lower into a higher state. We were as a foundling, as a new-born infant cast out, disowned and ready to perish in the open field, with no eye to pity and no arm to save. Then the Lord, passing by, in redeeming mercy, said "Live, yea, live." Ezek. xvi. Moses was born into bondage, but adopted into a palace. And it was into the bondage of sin that we were born, but adopted into the church of God, and made "to sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus." When the crippled Mephibosheth was called from his obscure and impoverished condition in Lodebar, had large estates given him, and was seated at the table "as one of the king's sons" in Jerusalem, he was overwhelmed with the honor, and said to David, his benefactor, "What is thy servant that thou shouldst look upon such a dead dog as I am."

Besides present privileges the adopted have the prospect of a glorious inheritance in reserve, described to them in "the promises made unto the fathers," and secured for them by the precious blood of Christ. Romans xv. 8; Heb. ix. 15. "God, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven their sins," received them into his family, and made them "accepted in the Beloved" who "is not ashamed to call them brethren." The divine kingdom to be established on earth, together with eternal life and its cognate blessings, is the inheritance to be received by all who hold out faithful, when our adoption is completed, that is, at "the redemption of our body," when we shall be "the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." When fully adopted by thus partaking of "the divine nature," there will be no danger (either from sin or death) of forfeiting the inheritance for which we are now on probation. The "spirit of adoption" already given is but "the earnest," or, partial payment as pledge, of what will be given when the adoption is complete.

Daniel and his three companions denied themselves of luxuries and lived on pulse and water preparatory to "standing in the king's palace." And let us deny ourselves of all ungodliness and worldly lusts, for we are in the preparatory and probationary state, a peculiar people separated from the rest of the world and not yet received into the presence of the King of kings, but still "looking for that blessed hope, the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ." We are exhorted to walk worthy of God who "is calling" us into his kingdom and glory. I Thess. ii. 12. This glorious destiny is "the one hope of your calling." Paul does not say "hath called," as the Greek word kalountos is rendered in the Common Version. It is a present active participle, and is rendered by the Revised Version "calleth," but more correctly by the American Bible Union, "is calling."

4. The conditions of adoption. Mistakes here would be a fatal calamity. God has the exclusive right to dictate the terms or conditions on which he will receive us, and we find them nowhere but in his Book. That says, "Ye are all the children ('sons,' R. V.) of God by faith in Christ Jesus, for as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ." Gal. iii. 26, 27. Notice how closely baptism and faith are connected, as being two indispensable items on which are founded our claims to sonship. By baptism believers "put on Christ;" and therefore he being the Son of God, they become sons by adoption, by virtue of his sonship by generation. Now "faith in Christ Jesus" is the belief of what he preacheth, that is, "the gospel of the kingdom" (Mat. ix. 35), and baptism is the initiatory rite of adoption into the divine family—baptized "into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost." Mat. xxviii. 19, R. V. Baptism is one of the great commands of God—"Be baptized and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord." Acts xxii. 16. Thus the Scriptures plainly show that believing the gospel of the kingdom and submitting to the ordinance of baptism, are specified and indispensable conditions without which we have no right to say that there can be any true and valid adoption into the family of God's children.

Both among the Greeks and Romans, in the apostolic age, very stringent legal regulations had to be complied with in civil adoption, in order to prevent fraudulent claims to it. And yet many gladly complied with all those regulations and conditions for the sake of obtaining blessings that were merely temporal. Much more gladly, then, ought we to comply with the mild and merciful terms and conditions of the divine adoption, that our claims may be found not fraudulent but valid, and that we may obtain blessings that will be eternal. I have spoken suggestively, not exhaustively, of those blessings; for even if my lips were, like Isaiah's, touched with a live coal from the altar, yet never could I fully picture the joys of the adopted, nor enumerate those "unsearchable riches" to which they are "joint-heirs with Christ" our glorious Lord and Redeemer. Editor Restitution:

Since last December I have been compelled on account of Asthma to spend the greater part of the time in the mountains. We are living only about thirty miles in a direct line from the Pacific Ocean; and the frequent fogs and chilly sea breezes bring the asthma upon me; and to get over an attack I am compelled to go to a higher and drier altitude. There it leaves me without the use of medicine. I am truly glad and thankful that there are places in reach where I can get relief. I may yet be compelled to remove from this beautiful valley.

In the time mentioned I have made two trips to Lake, Yolo, Placer and Butte counties. In all of them I have spent considerable time in preaching, part of the time among the brethren and sisters, and a portion of the time in new places. In nearly every place the attendance and attention have been good. It is, however, sad to see that the interest to hear is waning; and this is also true to some extent among the brethren.

The zeal should be kept up in order to have a healthy influence in community. There is a work for all to engage in. In order that the preaching be effective, there must be co-operation by the members of the church. It will not be a success anywhere if the preachers are left to do all the work. They cannot do all; and how much more influence for good where all unitedly work together! And when any little troubles come up, and come they will, if all work together for the purpose of disposing of them, there will be little harm resulting; but if, on the other hand, there should be a division, then strife will be gendered, bickerings follow, and if not arrested serious consequences will ensue.

We should not let anything of a worldly character intrude between us and the great salvation. Sometimes very small things are allowed to make serious innovations in churches and in neighborhoods. We cannot be too careful what we say and do. It sometimes is not so much what is said, as how it is said. We ought to be careful to not say in the absence of anyone what we would not say in his presence. The golden rule: "As ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them;" we as a people claim to be governed by.

As a rule, brethren and sisters, we ought not to expect too much from each other. It is the duty of each one to discharge what is due to others—than there would be less exacting. When we think others are not in the line of duty, it will perhaps be well if we put self on trial, and ascertain whether others have not some ground of complaint against us. Let us get the beam from our own eye, so we can see clearly if there is a mote in our brother's eye. Our first duty is with ourselves. When we get ourselves in a proper position before God, then we are ready to properly meet our brethren and discharge our duties.

I expect to hold some meetings in this vicinity if not hindered by asthma, or from some other cause. I fully believe the time for work is comparatively short. Governments are putting themselves in position for they know not what; but the sure word of prophecy says they will prepare for war. Complications are growing rapidly. Dishonest legislation in the interest of certain classes, bribes, and thieving officials, are becoming so common that less is said about them than formerly. These things will grow worse until the coming of the Lord. May we all be ready for that great event. In hope,

RICHARD CORBALLY.

WHEN TO PRAY, AND WHERE.

For an authentic answer we appeal to Revelation, and ask, "What saith the Scriptures?" The authorized example of Abraham supplies answer, that he prayed when and where the occasion called for it. He prayed for Ishmael and obtained an answer for both him and his posterity. He prayed again with reference to Lot in Sodom, and Lot was miraculously delivered. Gen. xvii. and xviii.

Thus Moses, Samuel, Solomon and Samson prayed when and where the occasion demanded. Num. xxi. 7; 1 Sam. viii. 6; 1 Kings viii. 22-43; 2 Chron. vi. 12-40. Elijah prayed in public; Israel was re-converted and 850 false prophets and priests perished for having perverted the people. 1 Kings xviii. 36-46.

The worship was by sacrifice and calling on God, with all, if possible, who shared the service and sought his blessing.

But now "the one offering of Jesus" is "once for all" who accept the gospel call. John iii. 16. It was "for that nation and not for that nation only, but for all the children of God scattered abroad." John xi. 50-52; and for the final deliverance, John xii. 47; Rom. viii. 21; Heb. x. 5-18; 1 John ii. 2.

In contrast with this the worship of Israel was localized at the altar in Jerusalem, etc. John iv. 20-24. But under the gospel all are authorized to pray in faith and hope, "everywhere" (as to place), and "always" (as to time), as occasion requires. In the closet, in secret, with 2 or 3, or the 120, more or less. Matt. vi. 6; xviii. 19, 20; Luke xviii. 1; Acts i. 14-24; xx. 28-36; Phil. iv. 6; 1 Tim. ii. 1-8.

Please read these teachings, and admit that "the entrance of his word giveth light" on this subject of private and public prayer, in both Testaments.

Furthermore, the abounding promise of "good things—the Holy Spirit—is to them who ask." Matt. vii. 11; Luke xi. 9-13. It teaches associated prayer, not private. St. Paul "kneeled down and prayed with them all." Acts xx. 36.

The precept to pray privately in the closet, to fast and give alms without ostentation, accords with the personal calling by the gospel, in contrast with the national worship of Israel. But the personal precepts do not annul or abridge those that are social and more general—"them that ask!"

Note. The command, "When thou prayest, enter thou into thy closet and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to the Father [illegible] blessing to every Christian. But this is entirely consistent with the social terms of prayer nine times in verses 9-13, that follow! The private prayer noted once, has inexpressible importance, yet it can not override or supercede the nine-fold form of associated prayer in the same chapter!—and sustained by such and so many examples of not "private prayer." Acts xxi. 5.

Pray without ceasing, always, everywhere, includes the closet, the congregation, the church, and may be, with intercessions of giving thanks, for all men. 1 Tim. iv. 1-8; 1 Thess. v. 17; Luke xviii. 1. We should "be wise (up to) what is written!"

The Lord "enlarge our hearts that we may run the Christian race—the way, the truth, the life,—victoriously! Amen.

With sincere sympathy and repeated prayer for those embarrassed as to this vital doctrine of the Christian life. My only aim is to be "a fellow helper to the truth." Amen.

By request of Brother Peter Decker, who is sick, and to whom you sent a few copies of THE RESTITUTION for free distribution at our meeting, I now address you a few lines. Brother Decker requests me to say the copies were thankfully received and sent on their mission with many prayers that God would watch over the seed thus sown and give the desired increase. Our meeting commenced September 27 as advertised. Brother O. R. L. Crozier and Brother B. Woodward were the only preachers, although we expected others, but we have reason to believe that our gathering together was not in vain in the Lord. Christian life and character and the hope of the gospel were the leading themes held forth by our brethren, and the church here are encouraged. Duties at home called Brother Crozier away on Monday, but Brother Woodward stayed with us four evenings following, giving us good, practical discourses, when he too left to fill a previous appointment at Hesperia. The interest was on the increase and we think if Brother Woodward could have stayed a while longer much good might have been done here. As it is, the whole plan of salvation shines clearer and has more friends here as the result of the meeting.

Please say through THE RESTITUTION that I have entered on my labors as evangelist for the state of Michigan and the brethren can address me through our secretary, Brother H. S. I want to put in all the time I can during the fall and winter months. Please let me hear from you at once. Yours in love of the truth.

I am now in New York and expect to sail tomorrow for Palestine. Three men, two women and two children will be my travelling companions. We sail in the Italian steam-ship, Archimede, of the Florio Rubatino Line. We expect to be about 20 to 25 days on the way. We know not what things await us, but we go in the strength of Israel's God. We fully believe that the time has come for Christians to turn their attention to the promised land and expect great things to take place there shortly. Israel is coming back and Jerusalem is beginning to lift up her head and prepare to put on her beautiful garments. Yours in hope,

I thank you for your kind continuance of my paper. Enclosed find two dollars which please apply on my subscription. I love to read it more than I can tell. I feel thankful in my heart to those dear ones who labor to make it food for the hungry flock, scattered now so widely, and often wish I could do something to help a little. I hope the day may soon come when I shall meet with those I love now to hear from. I like to read the letter drawer, and the first thing I do when I get my paper is to look it all over to see how many familiar names I can see. I seem to be well acquainted with many of them though they know nothing of me. Oh, what need of watchfulness and prayer lest we be found among the unfaithful at last! May our Father bless and guide and help us to be faithful and watch, for in an hour when we think [illegible] Master will come. Your sister in hope of eternal life,

I TRIUMPH, LORD, IN THEE.

O Jesus! friend unfailing!
How dear art thou to me!
Are cares or fears assailing:
I find my strength in thee!
Why should thy feet grow weary
Of this my pilgrim way?
Rough though the path and dreary,
It ends in perfect day!

Nought, nought I count as pleasure
Compared, O Christ, with thee!
Thy sorrow without measure
Earned peace and joy for me.
I love to own, Lord Jesus,
Thy claims o'er me divine:
Bought with thy blood most precious,
Whose can I be but thine?

Why should I droop in sorrow?
Thou'rt ever by my side!
Why, trembling, dread the morrow?
What ill can e'er befide!
If I my cross have taken,
'Tis but to follow thee;
If scorned, despised, forsaken,
Nought severs thee from me.

O worldly pomp and glory,
Your charms are spread in vain:
I've heard a sweeter story,
I've found a truer gain.
Where Christ's place prepareth,
There is my loved abode;
There shall I gaze on Jesus!
There shall I dwell with God!

For every tribulation,
For every sore distress,
In Christ I've full salvation,
Sure help and quiet rest.
No fear of foes prevailing;
I triumph, Lord, in thee!
O Jesus! Friend unfailing!
How dear art thou to me!

"The Kingdom of Christ—A Divine, Visible Monarchy on Earth over all Nations, yet 'not of this World.'"

PART II.

Let us now give attention to the teaching of the Christ himself, regarding his kingdom. Before doing so, however, it will be well to consider the prevailing ideas and expectations of the Jewish people at the time when Jesus appeared among them. It is conceded on all hands that, then, the Israelitish people, groaning under the Roman yoke, were anxiously expecting their promised Messiah to appear amongst them, to deliver them from the power of the Gentile, to establish his throne in Jerusalem, and reign gloriously over all nations. It is also conceded that these hopes and expectations were founded on such prophetic utterances as we have already cited.

Amongst this people Jesus went forth preaching. And what did he preach about? The kingdom of God. Thus reads the record: "Jesus went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues and preaching the gospel of the kingdom." Mat. iii. 23. Most emphatically, did Jesus himself declare that one grand object of his mission was to preach the kingdom of God. When the people of Capernaum entreated him to remain amongst them, he replied, "I must preach the kingdom of God in other cities also, for therefore am I sent." Luke iv. 43.

When he sent forth his disciples to preach, the subject of their proclamation was the same: "As you go, preach, saying, the kingdom of God is at hand." Mat. x. 7.

It is important to notice that we have no record of the Lord explaining what he meant by "the kingdom of God;" and it is reasonable to believe, in the absence of contradictory testimony, that he used the words in the sense they were commonly understood by the persons addressed. Well, it is constantly affirmed that even the twelve disciples of our Lord were in error regarding the nature of Messiah's kingdom. How is it, then, that in no instance, did their Master seek to dispel their hallucinations, and show them that his kingdom was not, as they understood, an outward dominion, but related to the mind and affections of men? Often had the kingdom been the subject of private discourse between the Lord and his disciples, but never do we find him telling them that the kingdom was something entirely different from a visible enthronement and exercise of kingly rule upon earth; so far from that, he, on several occasions, used language most obviously fitted to confirm their conceptions of that kingdom, founded on the literal understanding of the prophetic word. They had spoken to him of sitting on his right hand and on his left in his kingdom; and enquired of him who should be the greatest in that kingdom. Did he tell them that the kingdom was of an entirely different character to that which the nature of their enquiries plainly showed they were thinking about? Nay, he only replied, "To sit at my right hand and on my left is not mine to give, but for whom it is prepared of my Father." Mat. xx. 23. Fully cognisant of their hopes and expectations regarding the kingdom, these are the words he spake to them: "Verily, I say unto you, that ye who have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory, ye shall also sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Mat. xix. 28. This promise he repeated to them while they were eating the last paschal supper with him. "Ye are they who have continued with me in my temptations; and I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me, that ye may eat and drink at my table, in my kingdom, and sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Luke xxii. 28–30.

It seems to me inconceivable that he who knew the thoughts of these men, would have spoken these words to them, if his kingdom was such as the common theological teaching of the day affirms. He knew very well what his disciples would understand by eating and drinking "at his table, in his kingdom," and "sitting on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel;" yet he gives no warning that they were otherwise to understand the terms. Would any faithful minister who holds the orthodox view, treat the members of his Bible class thus? Is there one of them who will allow the words to go unexplained, even in these un-Jewish times? No, indeed! And so Albert Barnes, in his notes on Mat. xix. 28, explains, "This is figurative." How is it that the Master made no such comment on the words, while Dr. Barnes finds it necessary to do so? Simply this: the words, as they stand, do not square with the conceptions of Gentile Christianity; but they are in complete harmony with the hopes and expectations of the early disciples of Jesus, and the teaching of their Divine Master. Between these disciples and the Lord Jesus there was a common understanding about the twelve tribes of Israel, and the Messiah sitting on the throne of his glory—"When the Son of man shall come in his glory, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory,"—the throne of his father David—when Jehovah shall have anointed his king upon Zion, the hill of his holiness. Then the whole house of Israel shall be gathered from all the countries, whither they have been so long scattered, into their own land, to go no more out; and the Messiah—the Lord our Righteousness—shall reign over them for evermore. Then shall the words of the promise to these disciples be fulfilled to the letter when the Son of man sits on the throne of his glory, they also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel.

The commentator we have already named interprets the twelve tribes of [illegible] not the Jews, not the world, not the wicked.... but the people of God, the redeemed." Here we have an illustration of the truth of Hooker's dictum, that "when the literal sense will stand, the farthest from the literal is generally the worst," for, in this case, it places the Church of Christ in the relation of subjects to the twelve apostles, in the kingdom of God, whereas our Lord promises to each one whoever comes that he shall sit with him upon his throne, even as he is now seated upon the throne of his Father. Rev. iii. 21. Nowhere, in Scripture, are Christians spoken of as subjects of the kingdom of God; neither is Jesus spoken of as their king. He is their Lord—head of the body of which they are members; but their destiny is to reign with him. "To him that overcometh, and keepeth my words unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations, and he shall rule them with a rod of iron, even as I received of my Father." Rev. ii. 26, 27.

The Church the kingdom, about which Jesus and his apostles preached and taught so much! Nay, so far from that, the kingdom is a matter of promise to the Church: "Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." It is a kingdom which God hath promised to them that love him. The early disciples were instructed that, "through much tribulation they must enter the kingdom."

Only try the experiment of substituting the words church for kingdom, and kingdom for church, where they occur in the New Testament, and see what havoc you would make of the sense. It is only the necessities of a false theology that leads expositors to resolve "the twelve tribes of Israel," which the apostles were to judge, into "the Church of Christ."

Some one is ready to say, That looks all very well, but did not Jesus, on one occasion, say, "The kingdom of God is within you?" Yes, he did; and the language quoted, apart from the context, seems to be directly opposed to the evidence we have submitted to you. Please to turn to the passage as it stands in Luke xvii. 20, 21, and keep your eyes on it, while we make the following observations:

1. The objection is founded on the supposition that the words were used regarding the nature of the kingdom of God and that Jesus taught the kingdom of God as a dominion of God in the heart. But does this fit the case? The Lord was addressing the Pharisees. Did he mean to tell these conceited, carping hypocrites, that God so ruled in their hearts? Certainly not.

2. But, observe, the subject of discourse is not what the kingdom of God is, but how and when it would come. The Pharisees demanded of him when "the kingdom of God should come." Verse 20.

3. The Lord's reply is in the future tense, and refers to the time when the Son of man shall come in his kingdom. "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation, neither shall they say lo, here or there! for lo, the kingdom of God is among you (in the midst of you, R. V.)."

4. The words, "Lo, the kingdom of God is within you," are part of what should not be said: Neither shall they say the kingdom of God is within (or in the midst of) you." Why? See v. 22–25. "And they shall say, Lo there, lo, here! go not after them, for as the lightning, when it lighteneth out of the one part under heaven showeth unto the other part under the heaven, so shall the Son of man be in his day."

To the same effect are the Lord's words in Mat. xxiv. 25, 26, 27, "Behold, I have told you beforehand. If, therefore they say unto you, Behold, he is in the wilderness, go not forth; behold, he is in the secret chambers, believe it not, for as the lightning cometh forth from the east, and is seen even unto the west, so shall be the coming of the Son of man." And when he comes in his glory, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory, and reign in righteousness; and the effect shall be peace, quietness, and assurance for ever and ever, "Under the whole heaven."

"But then," it is objected, "Jesus said to Pilate, My kingdom is not of this world." John xviii. 36. Yes; and so say we, too. But why quote this saying as an objection to the doctrine set forth in this lecture? Jesus did not say, "My kingdom is not to be on this world," or "This world is not to be my kingdom." When we read our Lord's words, used on another occasion—"They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world," (John xvii. 16), we are at no loss to apprehend their meaning; and we never imagine that our Lord meant that he and his disciples were not on the earth at the time he was speaking. Then why quote his saying to Pilate, "My kingdom is not of this world," as if it contradicted the concurrent testimony of Scripture, regarding his reign on the earth over all nations? Pilate had been questioning him about his kingship; and had referred to the circumstance that his own nation, whose king he claimed to be, had, with the chief priests, repudiated his claim and pronounced him a malefactor. Therefore Jesus answered, "My kingdom is not of this world. If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight that I should not be delivered to the Jews; but now is my kingdom not from hence." No, Christ's kingdom has a different source. Neither from the votes of the people, nor the conquest of armies, does the Messiah derive his real prerogative and power. He was born king of the Jews, by right divine. "The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and all nations, and languages shall serve and obey him. The kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever."

Oh, that his kingdom were come! The kingdom of men, in all its forms, has failed to secure righteousness, peace, and blessedness for the vast population of earth. But when he who gave his life for the life of the world, takes to himself his great power, and reigns—sole Monarch of the world—"the thrones of iniquity, that frame mischief by a law," shall have passed away; and violence, injustice, poverty, crime and impiety shall not dare to show themselves. "God's will shall then be done on earth as it is in heaven." Righteousness, peace, and joy, and holiness shall prevail in all lands. All nations shall be bless in him, and all shall call him blessed. Therefore we cry: "Thy kingdom come!" "Come, Lord Jesus, O come quickly!"

Editor Restitution:

About a month ago Frank Brinton tendered us the use of his father's house and garden. The old gentleman having gone to England on business to be away some time. In a few days after we got settled, he brought me 250 cauliflower plants. I set them out where onions, beets, potatoes and melons had been planted. The onions and beets had yielded and gone to seed, but the others had been planted after the dry weather set in, and remained in the ground without sprouting. The rule is, in setting out cauliflower plants in the dry season, to water them seven days, and then let them go. Brinton set out about 2,000, and, as he said this evening, they are gone, sure enough. But I watered mine the allotted time, and then every other evening, and will continue doing so for at least a month.

Now there is a point in this, that has helped me out of considerable trouble and perplexity of mind, and I have, through the lesson taught me in this affair, had a great truth revealed to me that had caused me no little uneasiness. Previous to coming here I had been led to believe that the former and latter rains had been restored, as far back as 1853. This error I had been taught by the Latter Day Saints who infest certain parts of Nebraska. Not that I was in any way connected with them, but I heard one of their elders undertake to preach on the restitution, just at the time when the Lord was leading me this way. Not wishing to censure those people, I will simply say that after a little study into the ways of God's dealing with the things of his creation, I find that in the past ages it has pleased him to put lying spirits into the mouths of certain ones, that his allwise plan might be worked out in his way, and I see no reason why he should not do so now. I came here believing that those blessings had been restored. Did not stop at that time to ask myself if it was reasonable to suppose that God would bless the land in that way right over his curse that is to last until the treading down of the Gentiles is finished. This I had to learn after coming here, and stumbling for a little while over the error I had got hold of. Now it is all made plain to me. Before those rains begin to fall, there is something for man to do. Somebody is first to ask (See Zech. x. 1), for the rains. There must first be men here with just that kind of faith—faith that will reach beyond the clouds and cause the rains to be poured out upon this land, now parched and dry. They will also be able to close heaven, so that it will not rain in other parts of the world. This power will no doubt be given to but few, and they will have truth—no fanaticism or presumption.

Now the question is where are those men of faith—such faith as the world has not seen for a long, long time? This question we may not be able to answer, but God knows them. They may be scattered in different parts of the world. He knows where they are, and will bring them in his own good time. God's cause is not being pulled backward in any respect; all can rest easy on that point.

But to the plants again. Around the hills where I have poured the water, are springing up onions, beets, potatoes and watermelons. And it begins to look like I would have a fair crop of all these vegetables. This is what this country needs to make it bloom like the rose. I have not seen any other soil to compare with this when once the water is applied. However, the rains of the winter season are sufficient to keep things moving in God's appointed way. I expect no change in this, so long as the enemy possesses this land. But that the time of the Gentiles is about finished, none need doubt. Everything goes to show that this is true.

Oh, that the stone would begin to roll! that the time would come for it to move! But that the time has not yet come is evident; for we see the destroyer of mankind stalking through the earth, causing distress, sorrow and suffering to increase, filling the minds of the people with fanaticism and false ideas. For there is no truth, no justice, or mercy to be found. Every man's hand is truly being turned against his brother. This plainly shows that what Paul says is true. Evil men are waxing worse and worse; men, women and children are being controlled by an evil spirit to an alarming extent, making loud profession of sanctification, holiness and purity, when they are really being drawn into a whirlpool—Spiritualism, which means sure destruction. This word Spiritualism is a great deceiver; it is too often associated with mediums and a sleight-of-hand performance. This kind I do not refer to for there are many forms and phases of Spiritualism, that do not bear this name, but are in reality just that, and more to be dreaded than the other. The devil is now prince of this world; he is now rolling the stone of eternal destruction, filling the earth with error and self-righteousness. We hear it on every hand, "Behold, I am holier than thou." That I may make clear to the reader the difference between the holiness of Christ, with his mercy and love, in whom there is no revengeful spirit found; and as to the popular holiness feeling marching through the land, I will just refer to some correspondents to a certain holiness paper that comes up to Jerusalem occasionally. In each of the letters referred to the writers, after professing holiness and sanctification full and complete, referred to some who had evidently treated this error with lightness. These holy people wound up by hoping that the time would soon come when they would be made to suffer for their doings. This kind of spirit makes me think of the days of the holy fathers and the inquisition. It is just the same dragon spirit, and the world is being filled with it. But, praise the Lord, his day will come, when the old serpent that is now drawing the masses on to certain ruin will be bound, and then will these who are now talking so loud with their hallelujah chorus begin to say "Lord, Lord," etc; but the Lord will profess unto them, "I know you not."

Yes, the Lord's day is near; then will the Stone, "the Rock of ages," begin to move, and gradually roll along till everything is subdued; and it will at last fill the earth with righteousness. This Stone, or Rock, is Christ. And how are we to expect him to begin the work of righteousness till he comes? How can we be so blind as to suppose that his glorious work is now going on, while he who has power to fill men with an evil spirit, making them to appear as angels of light, has control, and is not bound. "Say to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not: behold, your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompense; he will come and save you. Then the eyes of the blind shall be unstopped." Isa. xxxv. 4, 55.

I suppose it would hardly be necessary to quote Scripture to prove that when our Lord comes he will come to Zion; and that here he will sit in judgment. If the reader is satisfied with this, all right; if not, drop me a card, and I will give you Bible proof. Then we see Jesus, who is to judge the quick and the dead, with the books open before him, on Mount Zion. Then, as those who are judged worthy of outer darkness or destruction, must have a place for the destroying work. I am trying to locate that hell men have said so much about. I think I have looked down into that unlovely place today. Man's place of punishment or destruction for disobedience is on earth, just as much as man's reward for obedience. Why is it not reasonable to suppose that Tophet—it is also called the valley of the son of Hinnom—which I refer to above, and that I had such a good [illegible], that curves around under Zion, and is hard by the judgment seat, is that place ordained of old, where, in ages gone by, the rubbish and dead carcasses were consumed in the devouring flame. But that fire which was kept going night and day so long as the flames were fed, finally died out and is no more. In like manner will those fires of "eternal torment," of Roman supremacy, die out when the last of the wicked are consumed like the fat of lambs, or "burned up like stubble."

How terrible to think of becoming as if we had not been. Would not an existence mixed up with torment be preferable? How much better and brighter is the future for those who are battling with the evils of their natures and trying to overcome and walk humbly every day before God!

A sister, in a private letter, asked Mrs. D. whether the Jews believe that the soul returns to God at night when they fall asleep, and desired an answer through THE RESTITUTION. The Jews are not troubled with Paganism, and as a rule know too much about the nature of man to have any such belief But even if they should believe it, and say so, that would not make it truth. This spirit, or life, this thinking part of us, which loves, hates, and, longs for something we have not, I believe is generally called soul. If it leaves us at night, why are we so restless, and have such horrible dreams at times? However, this soul is a strange thing—difficult to get at, although we may understand perfectly what it is. The Bible says God gave man and beast the same spirit or soul. But it is hardly worth while to quote from the word of God to one who believes himself immortal. The Bible represents the whole make-up of man as he is to be seen by the naked eye, as a "living soul." Then I suppose if the life was removed, he would be a dead soul. And Christ is the life. And "the soul that sinneth, it shall die.

Bible: The wages of sin is death. The soul that sinneth shall not surely die.

Rev. A. The wages of sin is eternal life in torment.

Rev. B. Which shall I believe if I want to know truth. Again the Bible says the dead "know not anything." But our learned friends of the ministry will tell us that we are wafted away on snowy wings, etc.; seldom hear of one intimating that any of their flock had gone the other way, no matter if the departed one was the "blackest goat" in the country. Well always tell those poor souls to study the Bible more and place less reliance on men who are all taken up with self, and are compelled to talk smooth things to the people—"for they like to have it so"—or loose their comfortable living. While this is true of the head men of popular theology, the masses of the ministers of our land teach error because of ignorance. And they can't be themselves because the covering is over all nations.

"By their fruits ye shall know them," is quoted on every hand. But what I had in mind when this text came to me today, is this, it is so very common to hear people who profess Christianity to be continually parading before the public their charitable acts, how much they have done for this one and that one; how is it possible for such people to expect the Father to reward them when it is evident they are seeking the praise of man. But there is one thing still worse than this, which makes a double sin, and this is to tell a lie, claiming more than they had really done. For my part I had rather take my chances on the ravens supplying my wants than to accept of anything at the hands of people who have so little fear of God before them. I told you by card a short time ago about the Americans doing away with their wedding rings. This has created a terrible scandal in Jerusalem. A gentleman said to me yesterday, "This thing has poisoned the minds of the people here terribly against Americans." However this is just as it should be; Satan is doing all in his power to make it hard work for those who shall come up here with truth. Visions, I suppose, are all correct so long as they don't contradict the word of God. Ezek. xiii. 7. I am afraid of these people who know so much and cannot make a mistake, especially women. It appears that woman commenced this foolishness and trouble and is determined to keep it up.

CIRCULAR.

To the Students of Prophecy throughout the World:

The undersigned proposes to issue from the press, either in Chicago or in New York City, as circumstances may decide, the following works, to-wit:

I. The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. In the first division the nature of the Coming Age is fully discussed, as to its physical and moral character: 1. That the earth itself has a crowning age, in which it shall be perfectly adapted to be the residence of man in his highest type; 2. That man, in that resurrection state, will be under the endless reign of the Personal Messiah; 3. In establishing the proximity of that age, the prophecies of Ezekiel, Isaiah, Daniel, Zechariah, Christ, Paul, Peter, and the Apocalypse, are critically examined, relative to its rapid approach.

II. The second work will be devoted to the investigation of the various phases of the Eastern Question:—1. The Egyptian phase, 2. The British phase, 3. The Russian phase, 4. The Ottoman phase, 5. The Hebrew phase, 6. The American phase, 7. Lesser phases of the Eastern Question, 8. The location of each of the Great Powers in the coming contest, 9. All nations marshal under the banners of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. These powers are traced in history to the present time. All the great national issues are fully investigated.

If all that are interested in these great and most sublime topics will aid, they will be issued immediately. They will be printed and bound in a form that will do credit to the vastness of the subjects, and put to subscribers at prices quite reasonable. The books will contain about 500 large royal 8vo. pages each.

RUSSIAN PHASE OF THE EASTERN QUESTION---No. 42.

In our previous number we examined the distinctive features of the field itself: its physical characteristics; that it is the great field of the north, adapted to the development of a hardy race, with great natural facilities, yet requiring great physical and mental powers to develop its resources; we shall undertake to trace and describe the families God has selected to cultivate this field from age to age, till they have grown up into the great empire of the North.

To accomplish such a task requires, perhaps, more research and ability than we may be able to command. We have investigated the subject and shall venture to lay before our readers the principal results of our laborious inquiries. Whence the name, Russian? What people, have, through ages, been so far assimilated as to be formed into an empire ruled by one despotic head? The people and their training are points of great interest; and especially God's purpose in creating and developing such a nationality. We cannot fully explain the character and mission of the Russian empire without keeping constantly before the mind of the reader certain truths, both elementary and inspired:

1. God, as the Creator of the earth, had a purpose in its creation, and has the right and power to execute that purpose.

2. God created man as its subordinate ruler, he himself holding the supreme control.

3. He had the right and the power to say how the earth should be parceled out and governed.

4. He had the right and the power to select any land or spot as his special dwelling place where, by visible agents, he could give instructions relative to his divine will and purposes.

5. He had the power and the right to select and qualify any family, out of all the families, to carry out his instructions, which were to benefit all the families.

6. He had the right and the power to select Eber to give birth to that family of teachers of all the human race.

7. He had the right and the power to locate this world's university, and to appoint its president, and select its faculty.

8. Also to grant them special official privileges, and to sustain them in the exercise of such official authority.

9. Also, to clear the ground of any rubbish occupying the site of the seminary to be erected, or on the lands allotted to the faculty of instruction.

10. In a word, to do with the earth what a land owner has a right to do with his farm.

With these points before us please allow us to read out of the word: "He (God) giveth to all life, and breath and all things; And hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed and the bounds of their habitation." Acts xvii. 25, 26. Men of all nations are brethren by blood, since they have one Father. "When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel. For the Lord's portion (is) his people; Jacob (is) the lot of his inheritance. He found him in a desert land and in the waste howling wilderness; he led him about, he instructed him, he kept him as the apple of his eye. As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings; (so) the Lord alone did lead him, and (there was) no strange god with him. He made him to ride on the high places of the earth, that he might eat the increase of the fields; and he made him suck honey out of the rock and oil out of the flinty rock. Butter of kine, and milk of sheep, with fat of lambs, and rams of the breed of Bashan, and goats, with the fat of kidneys of wheat; and thou didst drink the pure blood of the grape." Deut. xxxii. 8-14.

Here God's purpose relative to the nations is clearly stated; that it was according to the number of the children of Israel. He reserved a location for Israel, and his seminary, and his (God's) special dwelling place where he might, through his Hebrew faculty, instruct all nations; then divided the remainder of the earth among the other nations, according to their habits and his fixed purposes relative to the Hebrews and the future reign of his beloved Son. Dr. Boothroid thus expresses it: "That when God fixed the boundaries of other nations, he allotted also a land sufficiently large to contain the children of Israel; and he so favored, by revealing his will to them and dwelling among them, that they may be said to be his own inheritance." What right, then, had the Canaanites to that land, except that of conquest? God had allotted it to the Israelites, and having held it only by the right of bloody robbery it was their duty to surrender the land to its rightful owners, or pay rent. This was all that the Israelites required. They refused to surrender the land, and were, therefore, legally dispossessed. Jacob Bryant says, "The Canaanites were certain usurpers, and acted in open defiance of God's ordinance, by seizing upon the land appropriated from the beginning to the children of Israel." In the Eusebian Chronicle of Scaliger is the following, "He (Canaan) trespassed upon the rights of his brethren and seized upon the land which had been appropriated to God's future people. When, therefore, the Israelites were brought to Canaan they came to their own inheritance, and those who usurped their property know it, and knew by whom it had been appointed." All the Canaanites, tribe by tribe, were exceedingly corrupt. Their cups were all full under the sentence of execution. God had a right to execute the sentence by any agent he might see fit to depute.

In allotting the earth to the three sons of Noah after the flood, the divisions were made according to a certain natural fitness, as well as according to the divine purpose. God moves with intelligent forethought in fixing human habitation. He works by a divine plan to carry out his ultimate purposes relative to its future government. Ham and his posterity were to people Africa; Shem, Asia, and Japheth the islands of the sea, or Europe with the islands and all those countries which the Jews visited by sea. Now we affirm that this allotment was the act of one who had a purpose and a plan devised for its execution, and that he brought into being and located the nations for the special work of accomplishing that purpose. Such a plan appears in giving birth to the four horns that have scattered Judah. Babylon is God's first executive agent in the punishment of Judah. By the abuse of their executive commission, God brings Cyrus at the head of the Persian empire to execute his judgment on Babylon. To punish the Persian empire for its abuse of delegated power, Jehovah brings the swift judgments upon that empire in the person of Alexander the Great at the head of the Greco-Macedonian empire. That empire by the abuse of their great national authority over Judah, under Alexander's successors in Egypt and Syria, a fourth empire, the Roman was raised up by Jehovah to execute his divine wrath upon the Macedonian empire. Such have been the severe oppressions of the Roman Empire, on the unfortunate Jews that they were obliged to flee out of western Europe, to find an asylum among the nations eastward. Thus has the Almighty not only allotted their special fields relative to the number of the children of Israel, but he has regulated and guided their national movements in such a manner as to grade the punishments of his own people according to the laws of justice and divine mercy. He has not allowed their extermination, though he has often permitted their banishment.

To the casual reader history is simply the record of the acts of independent monarchs, carrying out the dictates of their own free volitions; it delineates the movements of a confused multitude of sovereigns, without any central being to combine all the national systems of political, social and religious actions, into a unity of purpose. To such as see God in history, a hand behind all visible thrones is discovered to be in constant motion, regulating and controling all human volition and action. He learns that all national movements are parts of one great system under the guidance of one supreme, all-powerful agent. Human action, is therefore, in its infinite variety of phases, but parts of one great whole. They tend to the accomplishment of some great purpose. That purpose we labor to bring to the surface that all that read, may see and understand.

So far our remarks have been general; rather preliminary in their character. We have been induced to introduce such thoughts and reflections relative to the Russian field and its tenant for the reason that as an ancient enemy, located beyond the belt of those empires which have been used as the executive agents of Jehovah's wrath against his own chosen, the Almighty has had no special mission for that people, or this great northern empire. Such ideas, are, perhaps, generally entertained. We hope to be able, in our sketch of this people and empire, to demonstrate that God created the Russian and his empire for a special work that, in the past, Russia has, at times, done a noble work for the children of Israel; that she is now accomplishing a necessary act, yet for wicked purposes; and that her future course will be over ruled to the glory of God; and that Russia forms no exception to the declaration of universal appropriateness, that all nations have their divisions allotted them, relative to the children of Israel. That he has had and still has something to do for Israel, besides that of robbery.

We purpose to make visible the divine hand behind the Russian throne also, and that, on some occasions at least, that power has filled, towards the Jews, an office similar to that of the Persian Cyrus.

We shall investigate the Russian Phase of the Eastern Question under the following general divisions: I. The early history of the Siberian or Asiatic Russia. 2. European Russia—(a), the Russian of what race? (b) how formed for executive power? (c) rise of the Russian empire; its growth and mission. The future of Russia—her national elements, or tribes; where located? and how, and for what purpose combined? What position will she occupy in the final struggle? Her position during the age of subjugation. What is her mission—at the close of the millennial era? The Russian field during the joint reign. Its physical aspect, compared with its present inhospitable dreariness.

J. P. WEETHER.

A SHORT SERMON.

I charge thee, therefore, before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick (living) and the dead at his appearing and kingdom, preach the word, etc. 2 Tim. 1, 2, 3, 4.

This Scripture reveals a future judgment for two classes—"the living and the dead." The living are those who shall be alive at the end of this Christian age, in the time of the appearing and kingdom of Christ, whether good bad. The dead are those who have not been rewarded according to their deeds, both righteous and wicked. In view of these solemn scenes of judgment, Timothy was exhorted to preach the word in season and out of season, because the time would come when they would not bear the word but would be turned unto fables.

This great apostacy predicted by Paul began soon after the time of the apostles, when Paganism was overthrown in the Roman empire, and Constantine professed Christianity and exalted the church, and the opposition to the word is very general and bitter at the present time—both to the "word of the kingdom," and the "word of truth, the gospel of your salvation." Hence the great importance of having the word of God preached in its purity at this present time of the end.

In respect to the terrible judgments and plagues that are soon coming upon the wicked nations, and that are necessary to induce them to "beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks," and submit to the King of kings, all intelligent Bible students are agreed. But the passage declares that the dead will be judged, as well as the living. Will this judgment include the wicked dead? If a righteous judgment will be executed upon them, when will it take place, and what will it be?

These are questions of great importance, as the careless sinner should be warned of his real danger. Let the plain word decide, instead of any human theory. "And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment." Will the judgment be immediately after death? The Bible nowhere declares it, but plainly teaches a yet future day of judgment. How inconsistent the teaching of both the Catholic and Protestant church that the wicked die and go to purgatory or hell immediately, and after a longer or shorter punishment, come forth to be tried and sentenced to eternal torment at a future day of judgment! But the Bible is not answerable for such folly. Paul says the living and dead will be judged at Christ's appearing and kingdom. He also declares (Acts xvii. 31) "Because he hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained whereof he hath given assurance unto all men in that he hath raised him from the dead." He now commandeth all men to repent. When he reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and a judgment to come, Felix trembled. He says that by the space of three years he warned the people at Ephesus night and day with tears. What did he warn them of? Read 2 Cor. v. 10: "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad. Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we persuade men." Paul persuaded men to repent by the terror of what they should receive at the judgment seat of Christ, as well as by the goodness of God. Paul affirms (Rom. ii. 5,) that "God will render to every man according to his deeds:" that while he will render eternal life to those who seek for glory, honor, and immortality by a patient continuance in well-doing. He will "render indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil"—"In the day when he will judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ according to my gospel." This class are "contentious and obey not the Gospel."

The testimony of the apostle Peter is similar. "But the heavens and earth which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." This passage shows the time of the judgment of the ungodly scoffers of his day and ours, and what the judgment against them will be—perdition, and not endless pain. Some of the many sleepers in the dust of the earth "shall awake to shame and everlasting contempt" (Dan. xii. 2)—shame at the judgment, and the contempt of the holy universe after their ignominious death. Jesus said, John v. 28, 29, "Marvel not at this; for the hour is coming in the which all that are in their graves shall hear his voice and come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation." The condemnation of evil doers follows their resurrection. The original word here is krisis, which is translated in other places, judgment. Judgment against a criminal is the same as condemnation.

We are not here told what they will be condemned to suffer, or what their sentence will be, but other Scriptures make it plain. Our Savior shows the sentence will be eternal. He says, in Mark iii. 29, "But he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal condemnation." He denounced the Scribes and Pharisees of his day as hypocrites who devoured widows' houses, and for a pretence made long prayers. He said: "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?" This is equivalent to saying that they would be condemned to a miserable death in that valley of Hinnom near Jerusalem where millions have been already slaughtered for their sins.

John sees, in his supernatural vision of the future, and after the triumph of the King of kings, in the battle of the great day over the beast and false prophet and after Satan is bound to deceive the nations no more till the thousand years are finished, he sees the martyrs and all who had not worshiped the beast, and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years, "but the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished"—"this is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years."

As the first resurrection will not take place until the coming of Christ, and as Paul declares that all that are Christ's will be made alive at his coming, they all must have part in the first resurrection, and the rest of the dead must be those not "blessed and holy," those who are not Christ's—the wicked dead, who will not "be made alive till the thousand years are finished." This language is equivalent to saying that the wicked will be raised at the end of the thousand years reign of Christ and the saints, and that the second death will have power over them. Thus the day of the Lord, or day of judgment, will be not twenty-four hours in length, but a thousand years, and the wicked will be judged at the end of this period.

"He that hath an ear to hear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches: he that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death." This implies that those who do not overcome will be hurt of the second death. After the millennial reign, and the "little season" of Satan's gathering a vast multitude against the saints and the beloved city, and fire from heaven has devoured them, John sees the great white throne and him that sat on it, and the dead, small and great, standing before God, and the books are opened, and another was opened—the book of life—and the dead were judged out of those things written in the books, according to their works. The sea, death, and the grave, deliver up the dead which were in them, and every man is judged according to his works. And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire.

John next sees the "new heavens and earth and the new Jerusalem," and he heard him "that sat upon the throne say, Behold, I make all things new." He told John to write those words, "for they were true and faithful." The great Creator of the new heavens and earth, as he sat upon the great white throne, speaks in the hearing of John other true and faithful and immensely important words for us all to hear and believe. "He that overcometh shall inherit all things (made new), but the fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolators, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone; which is the second death."

In these plain, literal and solemn words is contrasted the great reward of the "blessed and holy"—the inheritance of the new earth and new Jerusalem, and in them endless ages of bliss and glory; and on the other hand, the second death in the lake of fire—the doom of the wicked characters spoken of. These Scriptures speak for themselves—they need no explanation. They make the judgment of the wicked dead, as to the time and place and result, exceedingly plain. The time is the day of his appearing and kingdom—the day of the Lord and of fire to which the heavens and earth are reserved—the resurrection of the unjust at the end of the next age—the thousand years' reign. The doom of the wicked, often expressed in the same connection, will be as literal as the reward of the righteous. If the righteous awake to everlasting life, the unrighteous will awake to shame and condemnation. If the just, through resurrection power, gain an incorruptible body, the unjust will reap a corruptible one; if the former gain eternal life, the latter will get the wages of sin—eternal death. If the Christian is made alive at the second coming—if they live literally by a first literal resurrection, then the rest of the dead besides the blessed and holy, will live literally at the end of the thousand years by a literal resurrection. If the meek shall literally inherit the new earth, a second literal death will be the portion of the wicked. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom."

THE ISRAELITE'S ADJURATION.

"Nor have given aught thereof for the dead." Deut. xxvi. 14.

To understand this solemn adjuration of the ancient Israelite, it is necessary that we be familiar not only with the law of tithing, but also with the customs of the country, in mourning for the dead.

All the increase of their seed, the fruit of their trees and of their vines, must be faithfully tithed. The first-lings of their flocks and of their herds were the Lord's.

These tithes were to be laid up year by year unto the end of the third year, when they were to be brought to the place where God had chosen to set his name, and there eaten before him. Not only were those who gave the tithes to partake, but the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless and the widow were to come and eat and be satisfied. There were they to rejoice with their households, and there receive assurance that God would bless them in all the works of their hands.

When they had made an end of tithing, and the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless and the widow, had eaten and were filled, they were to come before the Lord and say "that all the hallowed things had been brought out of their houses, they had been used as the Lord commanded; his commandments had not been transgressed nor forgotten; naught had been eaten of in mourning, taken for any unclean use, nor given for the dead." Then followed a prayer that the Lord would bless the people and the land.

We may infer from the customs of the East at the present day, what they must have been in the time of Moses. Funerals are now very expensive, and often ruinous. A feast must be made on behalf of the dead. All the relatives, acquaintances, passing strangers, and frequently whole tribes, partake of this feast. Those from a distance are entertained for the night. These gatherings and feasts occur at stated times for forty days. Large quantities of food, in the name of the dead, must also be sent to the friends of the family.

People are often reduced to abject poverty by observing these onerous customs, and one can well imagine how great the temptation must have been to the Israelite to appropriate the sacred things to his own use in the days of his affliction. If he had not "given thereof in his mourning, nor given aught thereof for the dead," it was a strong proof that he would be faithful on all occasions, that in everything he could be safely trusted.

Now, though we, as Gentile Christians, may not come under this tithing law, there is nevertheless, in the example of the pious Israelite, an excellent lesson.

The unrighteous mammon that is put into our hands is not our own; it belongs to another man; it is God's. Luke xvi. 12.

We are not our own; we are bought with a price; our bodies and our minds are God's.

Then, there is some like service due from us to God. We may not ask to have all sufficiency of all things, and then consume that sufficiency upon our lusts. In our professed subjection to the gospel of Christ, there must be liberal distribution to the necessities of the saints and to all men, what belongs to God, (and if we belong to God, all that we have belongs to him) must not be put to any unclean or unholy use.

God is able to make all grace abound toward us. He is able to multiply the seed sown; to increase the fruits of our righteousness. Let us not sow sparingly, but with bountiful hand. The naked and the hungry plead; the minister, in place of the Levite, is asking for bread. God's truth must go to the perishing ones. Are we appropriating aught of God's sacred things? If we are, will he bless us and our land? Can we ask him to do it?

Notes by the Wei.

DENVER, Ind., Oct. 21.

Editor Restitution:

At the earnest request of the brethren in Eastern Michigan, I attended the conference held at Raisin Center, Lenawee county, Oct. 12-14. This meeting deserves more than a passing notice. Others will doubtless report it, but to the writer it has been such a feast that, stimulated by the rich gospel food bounteously provided by the earnest workers, he would speak of things that are essential to all good meetings of this kind.

The first essential for a good meeting is that each individual composing the meeting shall contribute something good for mutual enjoyment. As a column of soldiers marching on the enemy's works, and as the firmness and faithfulness of each composing the column will insure the victory, so must we advance to the assault of the strongholds of unbelief and sin. We must be coworkers in the cause. Each should be animated by the thought that stirred the Swiss soldier. At the battle of Anspach, where the solid columns of the Swiss and Austrian armies stood face to face, this living wall of humanity could only be broken by the brave deed of Arnold Winkelried, who leaped upon the advancing column, receiving the keen points of a dozen spears and falling to the ground opened a breach into which his comrades poured, putting to flight the Austrian army. Had this brave deed not been followed by the united force of the army, the brave life would have been sacrificed in vain. Oh, how often has a conference failed that has been managed not upon the co-operative system, but upon the "exhibition system," that is, upon the same principle that a fair or other entertainment is made attractive! Do you know that a disease has prevailed in the religious world called "Big preacher on the brain"? And sad to think that even among those who are commanded to "call no man master," but to be servants together in the one common cause—even there the baneful effects of the dread disease are seen. Do not regard this as complaining, nor from one who feels that his talents have not been appreciated! No, no; the writer is a firm believer in the theory that the Lord needs some "little preachers" to successfully present the gospel, and I shall be real glad if I possess the requisite qualifications for the position.

Another essential for a good conference meeting is an entire absence of hobbies. Dear brother, if you have a hobby and must ride it, please do not take it with you to a conference meeting. Leave it at home, put it away among the old rubbish in the garret, and go to the work of telling dying men of the present age how they may obtain eternal life. The "Plan of the Ages" is too deep for me, but the "Plan of the Age" is a glorious system. I can more readily understand the wants of the present race than the wants of those who will live a thousand years hence, or who have lived a thousand years in the past. I have a desire to see the scroll that contains the future unrolled, but am willing to wait. I live in this age to prepare for the one that is to come. My duties and obligations are here and now. The present age and its future destinies are plainly revealed—the succeeding ages will in due time be unfolded.

A third essential element that constitutes a large part of a successful meeting is a full and hearty unity. Each separate part of that pleasant meeting seemed only so many links of the beautiful chain of truth. The topics selected were appropriate to the occasion—it was present truth for the present hour. A harmonious blending of the topics of the different speakers was a marked feature. This spirit pervaded the social meeting to the extent that it seemed one pleasing story repeated with pleasant variations.

A fourth element that entered that meeting, and, by the way, a very important one, was the admirable system by which everything worked. Brother Chase truly says "order is heaven's first law." All moved with the precision of well-organized machinery. That veteran in the cause of truth, Elder Chase, whose voice is now stilled in death, left a noble example that his sons and others who heard his Christian instruction are profiting by. Truly does the inspired writer say that the fruits of the Spirit (teachings of the Spirit) are peace, joy, long-suffering, patience, gentleness, meekness.

A kind greeting to those faithful laborers, Brothers Hoyt, Hatch, Wilson, Watkins, Chase, and others who contributed to the pleasure of the meeting. We can truly say it was good for us to be there; and adown life's journey we may look back with pleasure to the time when we exhorted one another to faithfulness and holiness of life.

Yours in the blessed hope.

STOCKHOLDERS' MEETING.

The annual meeting of the Stockholders of the Christian Publishing Association, for the purpose of electing a new Board of Directors and for the transaction of such other business as may come before it, will be held in Plymouth, Ind., Saturday, November 10, 1883.

E. K. BARNHILL, Sec'y.

SOME communications that we hoped to find room for this week are deferred to future numbers.

WE have been receiving some books and pamphlets but must defer reading and notice till after the Annual Meeting.

THE news from India in this number shows that the doctrine of eternal life through Christ alone, and kindred topics, find believers and advocates in that distant land. May God bless his faithful servants. We hope to find ways and means to send some books and tracts as requested.

THE letter from C. Masillamini, living in South India, was accompanied with a short note from J. Spence, Gun Powder Factory, Madras, who says toward the close of his brief letter: "I shall be glad to print any brother's work in Tamil and Telugu, if they will send the means—or I mean I will see it done. Brother Magruder's works ought to be the thing for Bradlaugh reading Hindoos of Madras. I am thankful in being able to state that a spirit of inquiry is rising amongst the native Christians here regarding the nature and destiny of man.

Yours in the Lord,"

CONFERENCE ORGANIZATION.

On Saturday, October 27, 1883, at Blooming Valley, Crawford Co., Pa., according to previous arrangements, a few of the brethren and sisters came together with the delegates that were sent from other churches and organized with the following results:

Brother Miles of Wolcot, N. Y., called the meeting to order at 1 o'clock p. m., and stated the nature and business of this conference, and also rendered us much valuable aid in our organization. The name of this conference shall be the Western Pennsylvania Advent Conference. An election of officers then being in order, Brother Wm. M. Darrow of Blooming Valley was chosen President for the ensuing year, and Brother F. M. Gibbs, of South Oil City, Vice President, Sister E. L. Hurd of Blooming Valley secretary, and Brother John Niles of Edinboro was chosen treasurer.

It was then moved that the chair appoint a committee of three to draft a constitution and by-laws to govern this conference. Brother Wills of South Oil City, Brother Wait of Blooming Valley, and Brother Niles of Edinboro, were appointed. The next thing in order was to nominate and elect seven trustees which resulted as follows:

Brother J. H Cratty of Franklin, Brother Levi Hall of South Oil City, Brother D. W. Harroun of Geneva, Brother Silas Goodwin of Edinboro, Brother Thomas Atwater of Cambridge, Brother F. H. Adsit of Geneva and Sister Maggie Darrow of Blooming Valley. Moved the chair appoint a finance committee of three; Brother Warren Perry of Edinboro, Brother Wm. Mathers of Geneva, and Brother Levi Wait of Blooming Valley were then appointed. The minutes were then read and approved; on motion adjourned to meet at call of the chair.

It was thought best to hold regular quarterly sessions for the coming year, that the work of the Lord might be expedited as fast as possible and this conference put into working order. Now brethren and sisters we do pray and solicit every believer in the soon coming of our Lord and Savior and who are willing to rely on him for immortality that is to be brought unto us at the revelation of Jesus Christ, to give us your hearty co-operation and support according as the Lord of life and glory hath given you means and the good work begun will go on. We have now about $50 subscribed and we expect that this amount will soon be enlarged that the mission work may commence at once.

Now we do expect, if the Lord will, to hold our next meeting in ninety days and we wish to place it where the Lord directs and where the friends of Jesus want it. Therefore any that want to take the advantages and benefits of this conference should send in their request at once that we may know where to appoint our next meeting. Sister Stoddard of South Oil City preached on Thursday evening October 25, one of her grand opening discourses in her eloquent manner of speaking. Such profound attention we think never was given in this place before to any speaker. The discourse was made so easy and simple that the children could understand it all, and it was edifying and encouraging to the older class. Brother Miles spoke on Friday and Saturday evenings and over Sunday to good acceptance and with increasing interest. On Monday morning he planted three willing souls in the likeness of Christ's death and raised them up to walk in newness of life.

Our son, Platt M. Corbaley, who lives in the "Big Bend" country, in Washington Territory, was in the Badger range of mountains in the latter part of September, searching for a missing man—a neighbor who had gone for a supply of provisions for winter, and who is supposed to have been killed by Indians. The horses and one saddle were found, but the goods and the man are missing. While searching for this man, Platt was bitten on one hand by a rattle snake, and having no antidote for the poison with him but tobacco, applied it to the wound, and was suffering from the poison in his system. These facts we learn from a paragraph in the Spokane Falls Chronicle, W. T. We are very anxious to learn more of the particulars, and of his condition. As he lives about forty miles from any postoffice, with only a path to follow, it is difficult to send or receive news.

Our health at present is reasonably good. I have been holding a series of meetings recently near Geyserville, which were very well attended.

A protracted meeting will be commenced at Kelseyville, in Lake county, about the 3d of November, to continue some ten days or more. Any brethren and sisters who can are invited to attend the meeting.

Editor Restitution:

We are living here isolated from any church of our faith. Four years ago we laid away our darling and only son, the joy and pride of our home. Since that time we have had many dark hours and almost ready to say that God has been unjust. Then we remember the precious promise, "Come unto me and I will give you rest." The eye of faith looks up to our high priest who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities and who, when clothed with humanity, was himself a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. We cast all our care upon him who careth for us and his tender heart is moved with compassion towards us as it were toward the suffering and fainting multitude who were as sheep having no shepherd. They come to us these dark hours from our Father's hand and though they are sometimes very bitter we live through them and come out into the sunlight again with purer and nobler hearts. His hand leads us through the dark waters to bright fields beyond. It is in these dark hours that we remember he leadeth the broken in heart and bindeth up their wounds. And now may the Lord sustain you in your labors is our prayer.

The Child and the Bird.

MARGARET SANGSTER.

"Oh, where are you going, my dear little bird?
And why do you hurry away?
Not a leaf on the pretty red maple has stirred
In the sweet golden sunshine today.

"I know, little maiden the sunshine is bright,
And the leaves are asleep on the tree,
But there 's threat the dream of a cold winter's night,
Has come to my children and me.

"So good-bye to you, darling, for off we must go,
To the land where the oranges bloom,
For we birdies would freeze in your storms and the snow,
And forget how to sing in the gloom.

"Will you ever come back to your own little nest?"
"Ah, yes, when the blossoms are here,
We'll return to the orchard we all love the best,
And then we will come to you dear."

Footprints.

"What is that, father?" asked Bennie.

"It is a footprint, my son, and it is a sign that some one came into our front yard last night."

"It must be," replied Bennie, "for there could not be a footprint without somebody had been there to make it."

"That is true, Benjamin; and now show me some of the footprints of the Creator!"

"I don't understand you, father."

"Well, who made all these beautiful flowers, these splendid trees, the clouds up in the sky, the great round earth, and the mighty sun flaming in the heavens, and started the bright moon to roll around the world?"

"Oh, God, to be sure."

"Then all these things are but the footprints of the Creator. They are the signs that there is a Creator, and that he has been here. See this ice-plant that I hold—man could not have made it. See all the glistening grass; hear all the chirping birds—man did not, nor could not, make them! God made them, and they are simple 'footprints' of the great Creator, to prove to us that there is a good and great God, whom we love, worship and obey. Do you understand?"

"Yes, father, I understand very well now, and I thank you for teaching me that lesson."

Ants—Their Homes and their Habits.

Master Charles R. Bolton, fifteen years old, contributes this most interesting article on the above named topic to the Congregationalist:

Some warm day, when you do not know what to do, find an ant-hill under a shady tree and watch the little fellows at their work. This is what I have been doing. The ring of earth around the hole, like the wall of a fort, is familiar, but the most interesting part of their home is underground. See them drag the pebbles out of the hole in the centre. If you could follow it down you would find the way irregular, and at the end a number of galleries each supported by little pillars of earth. The young ants are kept on these shelves, and in fact, it is their city.

Here the chief men meet to talk over the matters of the colony. But how can they talk? Put an ant under the microscope and you will see two little projections on the head, called mandibles. The ant touches its mandibles to those of its neighbor and thus they speak. Ants are very strong, persevering and industrious, some working all night. I have seen an ant carry a stone three or four times its size. They are fond of sweet things. Once I laid a piece of sugar near a hole. An ant soon found it, and although the piece was many times as large as itself, it lifted the sugar above its head and started for the hill. All went well until the hill was reached. It would get hold of the sugar and attempt to drag it up, but when the first pebble was struck it would roll over and over. At last, by leveling a place so as to get a start, by the occasional help of a passing ant, the sugar was pulled over the hill.

I noticed a spider, one day, stop to rest near an ant hill. The ants soon saw him and four or five came out. They took hold of his legs and swarmed on his back. He was dragged into the hole and the rest flocked out to help eat him up. The ants carry their young out every pleasant day to lie in the sun, and at the first sight of rain they hurry them into their house. These little creatures have good memories and never forget their friends. If an ant be taken out of an ant-hill, kept for two months and then put back into the same hill, it will be received; but if it be placed in another, it will be killed.

In Texas there is found the "agricultural" ant. These clear a place from weeds and grass for about two feet around their house. They then drop the seed of a kind of grass, whose grain they like very much. The ants take care of the young blades, protecting them from insects, and when the grain is ripe carry it into their homes. But what is more peculiar, if the store of food should become damp during a rain, it will all be carried out on the first sunny day and dried, and then brought back.

One of the most interesting things about the ant nation is their cows, which are kept and herded like ours. Some small insects, called aphides, or plant-lice, have two little horns on the abdomen. When the ant is hungry it touches these horns with its mandibles, and the aphis gives out a drop of sweet fluid of which the ant is very fond. These aphides live on the sap of trees. The "miner" ant, which is very timid, makes a little room under ground for its flock. The colony which has the most cows is considered the wealthiest.

In South America, great armies of ants start out plundering everything they meet. Even horses and men flee before them; they go all through a house killing and eating up everything that they can find. When they come to a river, they climb upon a limb that hangs over the water. One ant holds on to the end of the branch; another takes hold of the first, and so on until they have formed a long string. They hang in this way until the end, floating on the water, is carried across by the wind or current. When it touches the opposite shore an ant catches hold of a stick or weed and so makes a living chain. On each side of this chain another row is formed, so that the bridge is three ants wide. Over it the whole company pass. It is even said that these bridges are sometimes made hollow or tubular, so that the young ants may be protected from the sun. When the wet season comes and the ground is covered with water, the ants form themselves into balls, as large as an orange, and float around until it goes down.

In some parts of the world there are "red" or "warrier" ants. These do not like to work, and are unable to feed themselves. Huber, the naturalist, to prove this, put a number of ants into a glass case with some of their favorite food, but they could not eat it and many died of starvation. He then put in a single black ant, which had been kept as a servant by the red ants. This immediately carried food to them, and in a short time they were prospering. The black ants are very industrious, so the warrior ants steal their young to bring up as slaves. The red are great fighters and the black like to work for them because they are well protected. Each summer the warriors make a raid on their black neighbors, because if the slaves should die, the colony would perish. The robbers form themselves in a line—an officer to about every twenty men—and send scouts ahead to find a suitable colony to attack. When one is found they inform their friends. The soldiers march to the place, where they are met by the inhabitants. The blacks swarm around their home. When one climbs on the back of a red ant, another warrior pulls him off. Soon the poor little blacks are obliged to flee, and the victors carry away their children in triumph. These are taken home to their slaves, who care for them until the little fellows are able to work.

The slaves, instead of being sorry for their relatives, like to have them stolen, because they think that the black ants are better protected by their warriors than they would be at home. If the attempt should be unsuccessful, and their masters should return without slaves, the blacks will block up the door and sometimes drag them back and make them fight.

A Remarkable Omission.

One thing is remarkable; though each of the four gospels devotes whole chapters to the minutest narration of all the particulars pertaining to the death of our Savior, there is not, in the whole of them, a single account or hint of the time or manner of the death of any of the apostles. Thus, for example, the book of Matthew does not tell us what became of Matthew, nor of any other apostle; nor does the book of John tell us what became of John; the epistles of Paul do not inform us what became of Paul; nor do the epistles of Peter inform us what became of Peter. Even the book of the Acts of the Apostles gives us no information on the subject. It closes thus: "And Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all that came in unto him, preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ with all confidence, no man forbidding him." Now, if this book had been written after the martyrdom of the apostle Paul, it would most certainly have contained an account of that event; but not one word does it say on that subject. It traces the apostle Paul, from his conversion, through his ministry, his journeyings, his perils by land and sea, until it leaves him chained to a soldier in his hired house at Rome, teaching the gospel of Christ. He must have been living when it was written, and if so it was written within about thirty years of the time when our Savior died. The epistles of Peter, written evidently in his old age, inform us that he was at that time an older, and that he must shortly put off this tabernacle, or die. But they give us no intimation as to how or when he died. The writings of John bring him to view as a witness of Christ's life, and ministry, and sufferings; as banished to the Isle of Patmos for the testimony of Christ; and as looking with fatherly love on his younger brethren, and having no greater joy than that his children walk in the truth. But they say nothing whatever of the close of his life, or the circumstances of his death. And there is no reasonable way to account for these facts, except that those men were living when these books were written, and that no one presumed to add to the writings they had left. To the Corinthians Paul wrote that Christ who died and rose "was seen of above five hundred brethren at once; of whom the greater part remain unto this present, but some are fallen asleep." 1 Cor. xv. 6. The apostle Peter declares that he was "a witness of the sufferings of Christ," and he also says, "We were eye-witnesses of his majesty . . . . when we were with him in the holy mount." 2 Peter i. 16. The epistles of Paul must certainly have been written before the death of Paul. The death of Paul occurred about A. D. 65—or prior to the death of Nero, at whose command he was slain;—and hence the books of the New Testament which we have, are traced back by chains of evidence which cannot be broken, until we reach their authors, who were the personal friends and acquaintances of the Lord Jesus Christ, and who testified of the things which they had seen, and at the peril of their lives bore witness, not to theories, dreams, or imaginations, but to facts and events which had come within their observation.

We may hence conclude and assert without fear of successful contradiction, that the books of the New Testament which we have, were in the hands of the church before the death of the apostles of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is true that one or two of the later epistles were not immediately received by all. Those churches would not be imposed upon. They had no such means of communication as we have; printing presses and mails were unknown; hence books made their way slowly through the world, and no book was admitted to that sacred number until it could be positively demonstrated that it had a right to stand among the Scriptures of divine truth. Peter speaks of the writings of their beloved brother Paul, as among "the other Scriptures," and as containing things "hard to be understood" (2 Pet. iii. 16); and no unauthorized manuscript could be admitted to such companionship; and hence these books must be identified and authenticated before they could be received.

But at last they were received, and have held their ground; while numerous other books, written in the next succeeding ago, were rejected then, and have been rejected ever since, as spurious and unworthy of the confidence of Christian men.—From The Corruptions of the New Testament, by H. L. Hastings.

Earthquakes.

NEW YORK, Oct. 20.—A cable special from Constantinople says: Ever since the great earthquake of two weeks ago today there has been a constantly recurring succession of shocks in all directions from this city, making a circle of earthquakes, of which Constantinople seems to be the geographical center. The reports which have been brought every day by Arabs from the desert, Christians on their tours, and sailors coming in on ships, have created alarm here, and some of the inhabitants of the city have made preparations for hasty flight from the sections where buildings are put up closely together. Scio Island, Samos, Mitylin and Lesbos, all a few miles off the western coast of Anatolia, in the Ægean Sea, were all severely shaken up, and there was a large loss of life and property on Samos and Lesbos, while the other two suffered much loss.

Smyrna is in ruins. Saturday night the shocks which have been of daily occurrence for the past fifteen days became quite severe, and before daylight nearly all the people in the shaken districts had left their homes for the open country. Soon after the sun came up, the sky became suddenly overcast, and great black clouds rolled up from the eastern horizon with great rapidity, in a few moments forming a complete inky canopy where there had been a clear blue. Then the agitation began to increase in violence and frequency.

Ten clearly defined shocks occurred before 8 o'clock. The waves then became almost continuous, extending from northeast to southwest. As they continued, buildings tottered, and about 11 o'clock, at which hour the shocks, for some unexplained reason, are always more severe, there came a tremendous crash, and the entire destruction of the city seemed sure.

The walls of Smyrna, which have been standing since the time of the crusades, were completely demolished. With them many of the remains of ancient Smyrna have been destroyed. On the castle hill some large fragments of ancient columns were thrown and smashed into pieces, and many of the handsome monuments in the great Turkish cemetery were also broken. The remainder of the old walls built around the old castle on the hill are gone, and the remains of the castle itself are now only a heap of marble fragments and small stones. The relics of the temple within the castle enclosure are now destroyed, and the stadium in which St. Polycarp suffered martyrdom is lost to sight. Numerous columns, busts, cornices, and other architectural fragments built into the walls of the Turkish town are broken into bits. The ruins of the antique mosque, said to have been the primitive church of Smyrna, which stood within the castle walls, have fallen.

The British military hospital is shaken down, but the patients under treatment there had been removed before the great crash came. The stations along the line of the Smyrna and Odden railway are all in ruins, and the tracks are twisted into such shapes that it is thought new lines will have to be run. Hardly a human being is visible within the city. Tents dot the hills about the city, and in these the population now find abode. In the White Walleo village there is no distinction between Americans or Greeks, Hebrews or Christians. All are huddled together promiscuously without regard to race, the one idea being that of self-preservation.

The loss of life in Smyrna was not great, probably not over 125 persons owing to the absence of so many of the inhabitants from the city, and the precautions taken for instant flight by those bold enough to stay until the last. Some 200 or 250 people were injured while making their escape, but only a few seriously.

The destruction of property and life in the outlying country, and in the districts remote from Smyrna, has been very large. At Albanda ninety lives were lost. A fugitive from Keupil places the deaths there at fifty, and the number wounded at 126. At Ak-Hissar fifty persons were buried beneath a landslide, and a few more were killed by falling walls. Bogassunda suffered a depletion of about one-half of her population. Of the population of Surgellis, about one-third survived to mourn the others. From scores of other hamlets come similar reports, and when all are in the loss of life will probably be found to aggregate well up into the thousands.

Advices say that all through Anatolia the inhabitants have been leaving their homes and seeking places of greater safety, and that their fears were well founded the developments of the past forty-eight hours show.

Along the coast of Greece the shocks yesterday were very severe and caused great loss of life and property. Advices received from that section are somewhat meager. At Capan Valia many buildings were thrown down, and some eighty persons were killed, while 125 more were severely injured. At Missha some twenty-odd people were killed, and double that number injured. Monombasia also suffered considerable loss to both property and life. It is believed here that the results all through the western coast of Greece will prove much more serious than now reported. Shocks all through Asia Minor continued through the day and night with less severity, but as noon approached, they became more severe, reaching their worst at 1 o'clock. At 6 this evening the shocks still continue, and the people, like the country, are trembling for fear that some of the slumbering volcanoes will break forth and add to the horrors they now have to undergo.

INVENTIONS OF A HALF CENTURY.

The number of inventions that have been made during the past fifty years is unprecedented in the history of the world. Inventions of benefit to the human race have been made in all ages since man was created; but looking back for half a hundred years, how many more are crowded into the past fifty than into any other fifty since recorded history. The perfection of the locomotive, and the now world-traversing steamship, the telegraph, the telephone, the audiphone, the sewing machine, the photograph, chromo-lithographic printing, the cylinder printing press, the elevator for hotels and other many storied buildings, the cotton gin and the spinning jenny, the reaper and mower, the steam thresher, the steam fire engine, the improved process for making steel, the application of chloroform and ether to destroy sensibility in painful surgery cases, and so on through a long catalogue. Nor are we yet done in the field of invention and discovery. The application of coal gas and petroleum to heating and cooking operations is only trembling on the verge of successful experiment; the introduction of steam from a great central reservoir to general use for heating and cooking is foreshadowed as among the coming events; the artificial production of butter has already created a consternation among dairymen; the navigation of the air, by some device akin to our present balloon would almost seem to be prefigured, and the propulsion of machinery by electricity is even now clearly indicated by the march of experiment. There are some problems we have hitherto deemed impossible, but are the mysteries of even the most improbable of them more subtle to grasp than that of the ocean cable or that of the photograph or the telephone? We talk by cable with an ocean rolling between; we speak in our own voices to friends a hundred miles or more from where we articulate before the microphone. Under the blazing sun of July we produce ice by chemical means. Modern science with all its crystalline production of beauty, surgeons graft the skin from one person's body upon another to the face of another, and it adheres and becomes an integral portion of his body. We make a mile of white printing paper and send it on a spool that a perfecting printing press unwinds and prints and delivers to you folded and counted, many thousands per hour. Of a verity this is the age of invention, nor has the world reached a stopping place yet.—Home Journal.

Sir Moses Montefiore, the famous Hebrew philanthropist, completed his ninety-ninth year on Wednesday of last week. He was born at Leghorn, Oct. 24th, 1784, of a family of the Sephardim, his father being an English merchant who traced his ancestry back to Spain, the family having removed to England soon after Cromwell removed the interdicts upon the Jews. He became a member of the London Stock exchange early in the century; became allied with the Rothschilds by his marriage with Judith Cohen in 1812; has been treasurer of the Portuguese Synagogue in London since 1814; in 1824 founded the Alliance insurance office, and has been its only president; and since 1827, when he visited Palestine, he has devoted himself especially to the relief of his brethren in that land, having been administrator of the Palestine fund for these 56 years. He was knighted by the Queen in 1837 and made a baronet in 1846. His labor in behalf of his people among the nations has been very great. He it was who influenced the Pasha of Egypt and the Sultan of Turkey in 1840, who secured the good offices of Louis Philippe in the French persecution of 1847; he gained favor for the Jews from Czar Nicholas and from Alexander II. Sir Moses believes in the prophecies which restore to his people their old domain, and has assisted thousands of European Jews to migrate thither. Not all the benefactions of this good man have been exclusively for Jews; for he has done much for charities in England besides. Sir Moses is in good health, physically and mentally, and his brethren in various parts of the world are making great preparations for his centenary next year, feeling assured of his continuance of life.—The Independent.

No book has ever had the circulation of the Bible. The British and Foreign Bible Society alone, since its organization in 1804, has circulated nearly 94,000,000 copies. To this we may add the issues of the American Bible Society, organized in 1816—40,000,000. Also, we must add the issues of the National Bible Society of Scotland—which distributed nearly 500,000 copies, in whole or part, last year. There are other Bible societies—the American and Foreign, the Russian, German, etc. What book has had a circulation of 150,000,000 in the past seventy years? The Bible has been translated since 1804 into 226 languages.

News Items.

ALEXANDRIA, Oct. 28.—The deaths from cholera here are averaging from 8 to 10 daily. The fatal cases occur chiefly among the Europeans. Several cases have appeared in the interior.

In Tapachula, State of Chiapas, Mexico, a panic reigns on account of the black small pox. Out of a population of 10,000, 1,200 have died, decomposition in many cases setting in before death.

The cyclone which demolished the town of Arcadia, Wis., Wednesday night, October 10, was preceded by air so charged with electricity that lights refused to burn. There was a strong odor of sulphur, which, with the darkness and the deafening roar of the coming tornado, caused strong men to quake with fear. Buildings were lifted from their foundations and torn to pieces. Bricks were thrown through the air with such force as to pass through the walls of buildings left standing. People took refuge in their cellars, and but two persons were injured.

Oct. 31.—A diabolical attempt was made to destroy the Underground Railway of London and to destroy the lives of passengers, last night, by two dynamite explosions. One of these explosions occurred under a passing train of cars, which was wrecked, twenty-eight persons being injured, but none killed. The perpetrators of the outrage are unknown, but the general belief is that it was the work of Irish dynamite conspirators.

The day is done!
I thank thee, Lord, alone.
'Tis evening, and I cry,
O Savior, be thou nigh!
This night from sin me keep,
Preserve me while I sleep.

The day is gone!
I bless thee, Mighty One.
'Tis evening, and I cry,
O Savior, be thou nigh!
This night from ill me keep,
Preserve me while I sleep.

Thy day is gone!
I praise thee, Holy One.
'Tis evening, and I cry,
O Savior, be thou nigh!
This night from blots me keep,
Preserve me while I sleep.

Light to these eyes afford,
O Christ, my God and Lord!
Dispel my soul's death-gloom,
Lest I should sleep in death ere day—
Lest my great foe should boast and say,
I have him overcome.

Defend my soul, O God!
For prayer beset my road,
Thou art my help alone.
Deliver me from sin and fear,
Preserve me in my peril here,
O good and gracious God!

Communications.

NAGERCOIL, South India,
September 15, 1883.

Editor Restitution:

I most thankfully acknowledge the receipt of your valuable paper THE RESTITUTION, which regularly comes every week to my hands. I render my heart-felt thanks to our sister in Christ, Mrs. Jane Railsback of Argos, Ind., who has purchased this excellent paper, for me, earnestly wishing to continue it for the future. I like THE RESTITUTION very much, and always read it with much pleasure. Some of the remarkable and interesting facts found in it are taught by me to many Christian friends and heathen, and many of these are also translated and published in our small monthly periodical, the Bible Banner, edited by me in Tamil. After reading, I circulate it among friends who know English, and they too are much interested by the reading thereof. Out of many that give expressions of interest from it, I quote here what one brother, C. I., who lives in a Mission Station ten miles from here, and who takes much interest in disseminating the gospel truth, life only in Christ Jesus, and kindred doctrines, writes,—

"I return THE RESTITUTION all numbers but one which will be sent by the next time. I tender my hearty thanks for the papers; they all are very interesting. English tracts are much liked. On reading the Rich Man and Lazarus, a man said, 'This is the right interpretation and I concur with it.' Some desire tracts on the second advent of Christ, etc., and a few have asked for the tract on baptism. Several talk about your paper; some seem to think differently from what has been published. However it shall be better as you were advised by an European lady to publish first the second advent of our Lord, the life only in Christ, etc., before saying other things. I am carrying on the translation of the Controversy. I shall feel obliged if you would send me for perusal the other numbers of THE RESTITUTION and any copies of the Christian. I shall return them after reading."

The writer of this letter is a well educated young man who was first convinced of these glorious truths through me, and is now a sincere believer on the pre-millennial and life truths. He greatly helps me in circulating the Tamil and English tracts and pamphlets I send him to be distributed in the district in which he lives. He wishes very much to accompany me in my intended preaching tour to other places.

By close study of the Holy Scriptures I was led to believe that man is mortal and immortality is the gift of God through Christ and that our Lord will soon come to the earth to restore things and reign with his saints in his literal kingdom here. No sooner had I become a firm believer on these glorious doctrines than I began to preach openly. Although I have translated and prepared several tracts on the life and advent subjects, I was not able to print and publish them until July, 1882, when No. 1 of our Tamil Bible Banner was first sent out from the press and circulated in the Tamil country. This was the first tract or pamphlet ever published in South India on this most important theme. It is regularly published every month through pecuniary help most generally rendered by those veteran servants of God, Mr. J. Spencer and Col. E. Armstrong of Madras.

I consider myself very happy as I have been associated with these excellent servants of God in disseminating the true gospel in this heathen land of idolatry and superstition. Since then the Lord has enabled me to withstand boldly all the inevitable opposition and the ridiculous rumors of the people in India, and to publish 12 numbers of our monthly T. B. Banner and to continue it for another year. I am glad to say that about 1250 copies have been printed and circulated during the last 13 months. Our Tamil tract has been translated into Telugu and 1000 copies are published every month for the benefit of the numerous Teloogoo community who occupy the wide spreading country in and north of Madras. I am very thankful to acknowledge from that time forth I have been greatly encouraged in the Lord's work by our Christian brethren in England and America who have sent me many excellent books, tracts, pamphlets, papers, etc. Through the publication of these Tamil and English papers, etc., as well as through my preaching, the truth of the glorious gospel here is rapidly spreading in various parts of South India and Ceylon. Some friends who have through my teaching become believers in the conditional immortality and advent truths, have since come forward to help me in the Lord's work.

Besides personally distributing with my hands these papers among the Christians in South Travancore, I monthly send them out by mail to many important towns such as Trivandrum, the capital, Quilon, Tanjore, Coimbatore, Cottacamond, Vellore, Salem, Yercaud, Madura, Palamcottah, Ceylon Island, etc. A few week ago, I had an opportunity of conversing with a native missionary in connection with the Cooly Mission in Ceylon. He was received as a guest in my house. He has spent many years in the Lord's work in Ceylon, and he gave me some interesting accounts of the progress of the gospel of Christ in general, and the life and advent truths in particular. He informed me that he has read all the tracts sent by me to Mr. S. (a brother who was led to believe the life and advent truths by listening to my teaching while he was at Nagercoil and who is now an evangelist connected with the Cooley Mission in Ceylon) and became convinced of the truth and was led to believe on "Life only in Christ," and the kindred Bible doctrines. I read and explained to him the difference that exists between the Paradise and the Zoe life which the Bible very plainly teaches. On his departure he took with him some of our tracts, pamphlets and papers, both Tamil and English, amounting to about 400 copies, saying that he would circulate them among the mission agents and other Christians in the Island of Ceylon. May the Lord bless these papers for the eternal benefit of many souls in that distant island.

I wish very much to visit Ceylon on a preaching tour whenever God will open me a door by sending me means for my travelling and voyage. From the above mentioned particulars you will easily understand what kind of work the Lord has put upon us to do in this most degraded heathen land. You would likely wish to know what is the principal object of the worship by the heathen at Nagercoil. The meaning of Nagercoil is Nagor, a serpent, and coil, a temple. The serpent is very generally worshipped everywhere by the heathen of Travancore. The large heathen temple for the serpent stands near my house. Many stone images of the cobra are found in the temple and its sacred localities as well as in the houses of its worshippers. The national deity (Vishnu) is supposed to recline on a great five-headed serpent. A large brazen gilt image of the five-headed serpent which is worshipped at Nagercoil is carried out in procession in cars like other idols once a year, offerings of fruits, cakes, flour, milk, sugar, rice, etc., are made to the serpent god by the Hindoos. Brahmins, Indras and other high caste people only now worship the snake god; other heathen worship chiefly the spirit of the deceased which are supposed to wander in their villages after death, and make offerings to them.

The Brahmin kites too are generally worshipped on every Saturday evening as a vehicle of Vishnu. Once I asked my school boys, Whose is God? One of them, a little boy, answered, God is on the stem of the cocoanut tree. Kites generally build their nests on the stems of the cocoanut tree and live there. The kite worshippers resort to such places to worship kites. As the little boy had observed this he gave such an answer. More than five lacs of rupees are dedicated to the service of useless and abominable idol gods in Travancore. In addition to this more than three lacs of rupees are spent in feeding crowds of sensual, idle and dissolute Brahmins who are thus encouraged to continue lazy to regard caring for themselves. This sum being equal to £8,000. Thus more than one-fifth of the whole annual revenue of the state is squandered in dishonoring the only living true God who is the almighty creator and giver of all things. This is called a benevolent act in Travancore, and the land is therefore named, "Dharmma Bhume," the land of charity or piety.

I shall feel very thankful if you will kindly furnish me with a copy of "The Emphatic Diaglott" by Benjamin Wilson. It seems to be just the book required for students of the New Testament. I hope it will be a most helpful book for such a person like myself to the careful and critical study of the New Testament with its original. By favoring me with a volume you will supply me a want which I often feel, when read and interpret the living word of God. Again I should feel very thankful if you could favor me with a copy of Jones' Key Words and other books you have advertised in your precious paper THE RESTITUTION. Such books will be thankfully received and made use of. One brother who has read some of your books says: "After I have read these books and periodicals published by this Society (American Advent Christian) I have no taste at all in traditional theologies. The recreation of the universe into paradise, and the blooming immortality of the saints at the resurrection and the kingly majesty of our Lord in the new earth are sublime doctrines which develop the glory of the gospel and aspire the minds to eminent piety."

My hearty aim is to devote my time which I can spare in preparing tracts on the most glorious truths, "The Life only in Christ," "The second advent of Christ," etc. For the printing and publishing of them in Tamil I shall need funds. Some of Brother I. C. Welcome's tracts have been translated and sent to the press. He has collected and remitted the money to us for the object of publishing his tracts in Tamil. I often remember you and other Christian brethren and sisters in America in my prayers. Pray for me that God may help me with his spirit in fighting the good fight of faith amidst so many difficulties and oppositions and that he will open the way and means for preaching and publishing the glorious truths of the gospel. May God bless your every effort to propagate Bible truths not only in America but also in benighted India and other parts of the heathen world. I tender my hearty thanks to Mrs. O. Goodwish, H. H. Tucker, F. L. Piper, J. C. Wellcome, H. H. Hastings, and to the sister who has purchased THE RESTITUTION for me, and other brethren and sisters who take some interest in promulgating the true gospel in South India. May God in his great mercy reward them in the glorious appearance of his Son, is my constant prayer. I remain with my humble regards a poor brother, working, waiting for Jesus' coming.

THE GOSPEL.

The golden mean was the proverbial path of wisdom even with the Greeks of antiquity, and the most modern philosopher has never had occasion to doubt the safety of its course. And if it is a safe and true course to pursue in the ordinary avocations of daily life, and in the study of secular subjects, how emphatically so with regard to higher and spiritual things.

How often have we, as students of the Holy Scriptures, seen the truth of God, that we endeavor to promulgate, suffer at the hands of some enthusiastic, who in well-meaning but clumsy ignorance distorts the whole system, and reverses the whole plan of our God-revealed religion, by some disproportionate reading of some obscure text misconceptised, and his wild sequences thereon! And have we not seen the fiery zeal with which they announce some mare's nest discovery, and rally round them a handful of devotees to start a brand new sect, and perhaps an "organ"? I speak for myself when I say I have seen it time and again, and have smiled a sickly sort of dyspeptic smile, and wondered how even the dexter hand of Omnipotence could work order from such chaos; then I have seen the sweet spirit of charity, the gentleness of truth, take the wings of the morning and fly unto the uttermost parts of the earth, and the spirit of strife and vainglory take her place and ape her manners; then the jeers of the adversary have made us ashamed, and the grand truths of the love of God in the redemption of man, through Christ by the resurrection, the deliverance of Israel, the blessing of all nations, the lifting of the curse, and the wiping away of all tears from all faces, when there will be no more pain—these grand and soul-inspiring truths that fill our hearts and flood our eyes with reverence and thankfulness, and wonder, have been pushed out of the way to make room for a new quibble which is to be believed as the gospel for our salvation, and we are required to be baptised into it too! I suppose that it goes without saying that such things are not in the spirit of the gospel.

"Unto what were you baptised?" I hear talk of being baptised into the gospel, but I never read of such a thing. I read of "as many as have been baptised into Christ," of being "baptised in the name of the Lord," and so on, but never into the gospel, nor in "the name of the Scripture," nor anything of that kind. I do not underrate the gospel or the Scripture. They are good in their place, but their place was not to be worshiped, or even to take the place of the Christ of God, even Jesus of Nazareth. He personally is the living head over all things to the church. It is not necessary for me to occupy several columns of THE RESTITUTION quoting the language of Christ and the apostles to the effect that the recognition of Jesus as the Christ the Son of the living God is the foundation of Christian faith, that many have cringly constructed hay and stubble erections on this foundation, and will suffer loss, is, I think, equally evident, and we endeavor on all occasions to try and make a little light to fire up some of their construction, but to say that faith in God and in his Christ requires a full knowledge of the gospel, is both unreasonable and unscriptural.

What is the gospel? Good news concerning Jesus. Is the announcement of the name, the universal publication and advertisement of him as the friend of sinners to save people from their sins, even in the vaguest possible way, is that not a point gained? It is, and we should thank God for it, and as wise builders ought to take advantage of the points already made, and construct upon them, not wildly kicking everything down because we did not have the honor of putting it all up. Does a man believe in God? So good. In Christ? So much better. In the restoration of Israel? First-class. In life only in Christ? Delightful. But—but—but he does not believe in so and so. That is all right; give him time. But he has had time. Give him more. But—Oh, I see you want to butt him out; that is wrong.

My dear brethren, if you will only consider for a few moments what a mixed multitude the early church consisted of, and moreover, if it had not been that they were a most bewilderingly ignorant set of people we would have been deprived of the grandest letters of the apostles, for those letters were only called out by the necessity of the case, and they ought to teach us a lesson of apostolic forbearance with those who do not see as clearly as we do. We see thus, that in the early Christian church some were filled with wild superstitions that would be laughed at today, imported from heathendom, and customs that would be simply intolerable now, imported from Judaism. Some even denied the resurrection of the dead. Nevertheless the apostles bore and instructed and corrected, commending what was good, reproving what was evil. That is what we ought to do, and not trouble ourselves so much to know just exactly how much information one possessed when he was baptized into Christ, so that if he did not have the requisite amount we would have the right of scoring him as a heathen.

If a man walks disorderly, denounce him at once; if he cheats, if he bears false witness, or prostitutes the cause of God for evil, put him out, even if he knows the whole counsel of God and talks like an archangel. But with a humble man, a listener and a learner, have patience, and do him good, and "bind no heavy burdens on men's shoulders," as the Pharisees did for a show of piety and religion, and even if there is some brush on his head that your fire cannot reach, don't trouble, the fire of God will lick it up clean and better than yours could. And let us leave plenty margin for ourselves, "for it is written with what judgment ye judge ye shall be judged, and with what measure ye mete it shall be measured to you again."

Report of Labors.

SUNNY SLOPE, Kan.

Editor Restitution:

I left Topeka, Kansas, September 18, arriving at Sunny Slope the same day. On the 19th preached on the Nature of Man to a small but interesting congregation. Then by the urgent request of Brother and Sister Winchester, of Ness county, to come over and help them, we thought best, by consent of brethren, to adjourn the meetings at Sumner until after visiting Ness county.

Arrived at Ness and commenced meetings on the 21st of Sept. Gave twelve discourses on the grand themes of the Bible. Our meetings were well attended and best of interest. Baptised two very intelligent believers into the One Faith, the brother being over sixty-six years old. We found some of the best of brethren and sisters in Ness. They were mindful of the fact that those who administer the word had to be fed and clothed. May God abundantly repay their labors of love and good works.

Left Ness Oct. 11. Stopped at Hutchinson. Spent a pleasant day with Brother Winslow. Preached in the vicinity three discourses to fair assemblies started the 19th for Sumner in wagon conveyance, it being seventy-five miles, to resume our meetings in that place. More anon.

W. S. FINN.

Editor Restitution:

As it is in harmony with the order of God that not by one only but by the mouth of two or three witnesses a matter may be established, and as Brother Wilson has given his so very terse account of his visit to our annual assembly, and Brother Gellatly has so workmanlike given the business face of the meeting, in view of the fact that it was a demonstration which we have so long prayed and labored for, I cannot refrain from testifying to that part of the transaction, which it seemed to me in the providence of God, was left for me to present to the household of faith.

At the commencement of the meeting the usual introductory discourse was delivered by the writer from the first chapter of the first epistle of Paul to the church of God at Corinth. And while considering the union, based upon the relation which the church of the apostles planting sustained to Christ the elder brother as the foundation of Christian paternity; and while having the pleasure of inviting so many self-sacrificing and faithful witnesses for the truth to our fellowship with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ; some of whose names are mentioned in the report, I was made to exclaim in the language of old Simeon, an ancient and devout servant of God, who waited for the consolation of Israel, on seeing the holy child Jesus, said, "Lord now let thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." Especially when considering the manner of the dear ones who came from a distance and some of the local brethren and sisters, who are ever ready to lay all down at the feet of Jesus and work for the glory of his holy name.

On account of one hinderance or another a good portion of the delegation were belated, so while the three bright stars in the religious horizon of God, Brethren Wilson, Keim and Gellatly were in turn watering the little garden or church of God, from the fountain of living waters by their glowing reasoning from the form of sound words, our hearts were made to glow with gratitude to God by their flowing in one by one, and sometimes several together, like so many water courses running into each other; to see them come right in and take their seats, (as one family of children coming home once a year to see their father and mother and one another) as much as to say, this is the house of the brethren, the house of God, the church of God, the pillar and ground of the truth, and the truth having made us free we are free indeed. And after the sombre curtain of night had closed all that were herein, some of the dear ones knocked for entrance and were received with glad hearts and hands by the assembly; then some even after we had retired for the night, to show the determination of those precious ones to be at the meeting, cried out at the late hour of two o'clock, saying, let us in, the trains failed to make connection, and we had to wait for the next train. This aroused and caused a thrill of joy in the hearts of all throughout the house of the brethren as they were sweetly reposing upon their pillows of rest; and it was like Benjamin's mess to the writer a double portion, to arise and administer to their comfort (thus reminding us of the much desired midnight cry which will arouse all the sleeping saints to go out and meet the Bridegroom at his coming).

At the close of the meeting, while participating together in the rich memorials of a Savior's love, on considering the end from the beginning of the meeting, and seeing the eyes of so many of the dear children of God overflowing with tears of joy and gladness while giving each other the right hand of fellowship; and singing one of the sweet songs of Zion in token of their love to God, and that they like the ancient worthies were of one heart and one soul, we were made to think and refer to the living waters that the holy seer saw in vision issuing from the house of God, which arose from the ankle state until it became a river that could not be passed over; here my brother and brethren my little cup ran over. In conclusion will say that our feast was continued for two weeks by our much esteemed Sister Wilson, who, on being given her choice by Brother Wilson either to spend the balance of her time which they had given her from home, with us or by visiting her friends in Chicago, like Moses the holy man of God, who chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, cast her lot with her two dear, little ones, in here with the little body of the one faith, and went to work for the time being as deliberately in the cause of the Master, filling her place at the organ, in time of service in the house of the brethren, and by her cheering words of faith and hope, as if she felt commissioned by the spirit of God to come here to us and stay with us until she built us all up in that most holy faith and the glorious privilege once delivered to the saints; and we believe that it was all of God that all the dear ones who attended the meeting were permitted to do so for his glory and the building up of the entire household of faith, which we have reason to believe has been the glorious effect wherever the report of the meeting has been read in the spirit of Christ, as given by our very worthy brethren Wilson and Gellatly. And now brethren may the God of all grace be with us all, and may we as so many watchman upon the walls of Zion lift up our voices together and all that make mention of the Lord keep not silence, and give him no rest till he establish and make Jerusalem a praise in the earth.

Extremes.

I was glad to read Dr. Welch on the earthly and the heavenly. I wrote a few passages briefly suggesting such thoughts. Miss Hatch wrote a pleasant reply.

There is another common expression—Kingdom under the whole heaven. It is always coupled with dominion. There is no kingdom under the whole heaven. There never was. Adam was at the first in a limited local kingdom. His dominion would have been universal. He was driven out. Gather out of his kingdom, etc. Without are dogs and sorcerers, etc.

The earth is to be peopled with mortal saved nations who have need of the tree of life to keep them from dying. But the church of the first-born, whose names are written in heaven have the divine nature, and cannot die. A new creature—a new order of beings, who do not increase—do not marry—sexuality has no place. There is neither male nor female, Scythian, Jew nor Greek—an order of beings raised up from fallen sinful creatures to be the sons of God—perhaps to fill the place of the fallen angels.

Wonderful grace! Wonderful plan! O the depth, both of the wisdom and the love of God.

Iowa Conference Report.

The Christian Association of Iowa convened near Gladbrook, Tama county, Iowa, Sept. 14, 1883. The weather being unfavorable, there was not as general a turn out as was expected. The preaching brethren present were Brother Wright, of Minneapolis; Brother Myers, of Lanark; Brother Adams, of Gifford; and Brother Whitesett, of Buena Vista county. The word was ably expounded, and attentively listened to throughout the meetings.

The business transacted was the election of officers for the ensuing year—as follows: President, P. Cady, of Gifford; Secretary, John Fitz, of Luzerne; Treasurer, A. Adams, of Gifford. Additional members of the Board were chosen, as follows: J. Kisling, of Marysville; B. P. Story, of Gifford; and G. Allard, of Gladbrook.

A committee was appointed to examine and determine the cost of repairing the tent.

A resolution was carried that we hold a June meeting, and that a copy of these minutes be sent to THE RESTITUTION.

The report having been unavoidably delayed, the writer assumes to give only a synopsis of the report, thinking your space can be more profitably employed.

War Symptoms in Europe.

If we are to believe the emperors, czars and kings of Europe, and their ministers and confidential advisers, all is permanent peace and neighborly love and harmony on that continent. We are to believe that the millennium has arrived, or is close by, and the German wolf lies down in peace beside the French lamb, and the Russian bear fondles the Austrian kid. At openings of reichstags, parliaments, and diets, the royal speeches breathe a spirit of Quaker-like amity, and one would imagine that the Peace Society had everything its own way. Yet the moneylenders of England and France, and of the world, refuse to buy the bonds of the Continental monarchies, though they are offered at reduced prices, and there are millions of money waiting for investment.

This may seem strange. But an explanation may perhaps be found in the fact that at the conclusion of most of the pacific royal speeches a request is made for large grants for purposes anything but peaceable. Supplies are demanded for military and naval equipments, for the purchase of improved armaments, newly invented destructive machines, and new forms of explosives.

The Continental nations are also improving their fortifications, vast and well disciplined armies are being manœuvered, officers are recalled from their furloughs, and ministers and ambassadors are holding secret meetings; cipher telegrams between the capitals are matters of growing frequency, and we read such dispatches as the following in the cable news:

BERLIN, Oct. 26.—Germany and Russia are largely increasing their forces on the frontiers. The Russian villages are crowded with Cossacks, while the German garrisons and fortifications are being strengthened.

What does this mean? Does it portend peace? Or is it a calm before a storm? France and Spain are snarling at each other across the Pyrenees because the Spanish monarch has accepted a German uniform. The Balkan Peninsula is in a ferment, and people begin to think that Austria and Russia are both too eagerly looking towards Salonica. England is getting ready to make haste out of Egypt.

Well-informed Americans who have been "doing the Continent" have not failed to note the ominous signs or to mark the perturbed spirits of the people who are preparing for the worst. The political atmosphere is charged with electricity.

Germany is the only Power, notwithstanding all the protests of the others to the contrary, which is not disposed to pick a quarrel. It is satisfied with what it has. It has no lust of territory or of increased power. Its people are attending to their own affairs. The German people and the German government have no colonial or territorial aspirations. Indeed, the strength of Germany, the wondrous discipline of its vast army, the splendid physique of its soldiers, the marvellous perfection of its armaments, are at present the only guarantees of peace on the Continent. The pledge made when the empire was restored twelve years ago has been fulfilled to the letter as far as martial conquests are concerned. An official chronicle says:

The German nation has recovered its ancient position in Europe, and neither fearing an adversary, nor envying any neighbor, discreet and temperate in its acts and aims, it accepts the destination prescribed to it in the proclamation of its new emperor. This destination is to add to its power, not by martial conquests, but by promoting culture, liberty, and civilization. As far as the German people are concerned there will be no more wars in Europe after the termination of the present campaign.

But peace costs Germany dearly. Her people are taxed to death to support an army which shall be a warning to her neighbors to let well enough alone. Her rulers feel this. It is what prompted her greatest statesman to propose a proportional disarmament some time ago, a proposition which has not been accepted in a kindly spirit by the other Powers, especially France, to which it ought to be most welcome.

Indeed, the danger which threatens to involve Europe in a terrific struggle now comes from the restive, revengeful, and insanely ambitious policy of France and the half barbaric racial feeling of Russia. Their intrigues and restiveness are apt to bring about that which they more than any other nations have to fear.—Chicago Tribune, October 27.

NAPKIN.

L. M. FOX.

I know, Lord, thou hast clad,
So clinging to thy side
I hold my faith in thee;
Certain, whatever may betide,
Thou wilt be good to me.

Why should'st thou give for me
All that we dear to thee,
And suffer grief and pain?
If all uncared for I must be
And ever thus remain?

That sacrifice would be
In vain, could we not see
And feel thy abiding love,
Thy hand reached down to we Look through our tears anew.

Oh, let me still abide
Close to that wounded side
In faithful prayer;
Certain, whatever may betide,
That safely still is there.

DOING GOOD.

"As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith." Gal. vi. 10.

This exhortation is addressed to those who are "in Christ" and therefore "new creatures." "Let us do good," it is not to be expected of worldlings, for we must be good before we can do good, according to the precept which says, "Make the tree good, and its fruit good." Here the order of the process is first on the tree, and next on the fruit; for "a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit," and "of thorns men do not gather figs, nor of a bramble bush gather they grapes." Mat. xii. 33; vii. 17; Luke vi. 44, 46.

Let us therefore consider 1, the times; 2, the ways; 3, the extent; and 4, the special preference of doing good to our fellow-creatures.

1. The times of doing good. Every opportunity must be used. Many of these occur in life, but none in death. Hence, the exhortation, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave whither thou goest." Ecc. ix. 10. Many of us have to bitterly regret some neglected opportunity that might have been a blessing to one that is now beyond our reach forever. "Opportunity" appears to be the emphatic word of the text—the pivot on which the exhortation turns.

2. The ways of doing good. We may do good by instructing the ignorant and erring, and setting them a good example. "Ye shine as lights in the world; holding forth the word of life." Phil. ii. 15, 16. "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven." Mat. v. 16. Also by ministering to the poor, needy, and afflicted. "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this: To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." James i. 27. Job said, "If I have withheld the poor from their desire, or have caused the eyes of the widow to fail: or have eaten my morsel alone, and the fatherless hath not eaten thereof; (for from my youth he was brought up with me, as with a father, and I have guided her from my mother's womb;) if I have seen any perish for want of clothing, or any poor without covering; if his loins have not blessed me, and if he were not warmed with the fleece of my sheep; if I have lifted up my hand against the fatherless, when I saw my help in the gate; then let mine arm fall from my shoulder blade, and mine arm be broken from the bone." Job. xxxi. 16-22. These words of Job show what great importance, even in the earliest ages, was attached to works of kindness and benevolence. They are sterling virtues, never obsolete, and continually within reach. "The poor ye have always with you and whensoever ye will ye may do them good." Mark xiv. 7. Such virtues are not at all beneath the attention of the great and wise, for even the illustrious Daniel exhorted a heathen king, "Break off thy sins by righteousness, and thine iniquities by showing mercy to the poor, if it may be a lengthening of thy tranquility." Dan. iv. 27, and the celebrated apostle Paul was "forward" ("zealous," R. V.) to "remember the poor," and has told us to "Remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive." Gal. ii. 10; Acts xx. 35. "Blessed is he that considereth the poor; the Lord will deliver him in time of trouble. The Lord will preserve him and keep him alive; and he shall be blessed upon the earth; and thou wilt not deliver him to the will of his enemies. The Lord will strengthen him upon the bed of languishings: thou wilt make all his bed in his sickness." Psa. xli. 1-3. "But when thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth: that thine alms may be in secret: and thy Father which seeth in secret himself shall reward thee openly." Mat. vi. 3, 4.

We may also do good to our fellow creatures by prayer. "I exhort, therefore, that, first of all supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks be made for all men." 1 Tim. ii. 1.

3. The extent of doing good. It is not confined to our brethren only, but must extend "to all men." "Do good to them which hate you, bless them that curse you, and pray for them which despitefully use you." Luke vi. 27. So the Savior prayed for his enemies, "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do." And Paul for unbelieving Israel, "My heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved." Luke xxiii. 34; Rom. x. 1. "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink." Rom. xii. 20. Our Heavenly Father "maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust." Mat. v. 45. Think of the richly varied forms of blessing and comfort which he confers on even the vilest and most unthankful of the human race by means of sun and rain! Were these two instrumentalities withdrawn from the mundane system, what chaos, misery and destruction would ensue! But the Lord bestows their benign influence even upon his enemies. "Be ye therefore followers (imitators, R. V.) of God as dear children." Ephes. v. 1. Yet notice,

4. The special preference in doing good. It must be "especially unto them who are of the household of faith." These are our brethren and sisters, members of the same family. Therefore "bear ye one another's burdens and so fulfill the law of Christ." Gal. vi. 2. "Exhorting one another daily, and so much the more as ye see the day approaching." Heb. x. 25. "Distributing to the necessity of saints." Rom. xii. 13. "Whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" 1 John iii. 17. The strongest of inducements encouraging us to do good to believers is the promise that the Master will say, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me." Mat. xxv. 40. How then can we refuse kindness to even "the least" of our Savior's brethren, since that is to be reckoned as refusing it to our Savior himself?

Doing good is compared to sowing that is followed by reaping "in due season;" and we must sow not sparingly but with full hands if we would reap with full arms. We should, therefore, as whilst and whenever we can, "do good to all men, especially to them that are of the household of faith." This duty is enjoined upon us not only by the precept of the text, "Let us do good," etc., but also by the example of the Master who "went about doing good," "leaving us an example that we should follow in his steps."

KEDESH—NAPHTALI.

I did not take the direct road to Kedesh. It was always my plan in traveling through Bible lands to select the routes of greatest interest, though they might not be the shortest. I did so now. Diverging to the right I rode round the head of a ravine, and then along the eastern base of a conical hill which overtops Safed. In half an hour we reached the brow of the mountain ridge, overlooking one of the most magnificent prospects in Syria. At our feet lay the plain of the Upper Jordan, covered with verdure, and having the lake Merom sleeping peacefully in its southern end. Beyond it rose Hermon, towering fully ten thousand feet above the plain, its top covered with snow, and sharply defined against the clear blue sky, as if chiselled in marble. To the left the long serried ridge of Lebanon ran away, peak upon peak, all snow-capped, until lost in the distance. We stood spell-bound—

"While admiration, feeding at the eye,
And still unsated, dwelt upon the scene."

Over the undulating upland plains of Naphtali our path now led—past little villages, through ripening fields of wheat and barley, and across luxuriant wastes, over which gazelles bounded before us in joyous troops. We zigzagged down into the wild ravine of Hendaj, and ate our lunch where a willow drooped its weeping branches over a foaming torrent. On the banks of this stream, farther down, lie, as we shall see, the remains of royal Hazor. As we sat there amid gorgeous oleander flowers, the thought occurred to us that Sisera in his flight probably crossed the glen near this spot; for it was on the high plain to the north he fell by the treacherous hand of Jael.

At length we reached Kedesh, the "sanctuary" (such is the meaning of the name) of Naphtali, and the city of refuge for the northern tribes. The site is beautiful—the summit and sides of a little ridge projecting from wooded heights on the west into a green plain. But the royal city of the Canaanites (Judges xii. 22), "the holy place" of Northern Palestine, is now ruined and desolate. True, there are a few hovels on a corner of the site, and a few shepherds on its pastures; yet the glory and the sacredness of Kedesh have long since departed. Nought remains to mark them save the old name and widespread ruins. The ridge is strewn with ruins—columns half buried in the soil; hewn stones gathered in heaps among cornfields, or built in rude fences around tobacco gardens; and foundations too massive to be removed by the spoiler's hand.

But the most interesting remains are in the plain. The first building I examined was a square mausoleum, massive and simple; its only ornament a bold moulding around the doorway. The interior is cruciform, and contains a number of recesses, or loculi, for bodies, in some of which are mouldering bones. I had before seen similar tombs in Bashan and anti-Lebanon. They are all probably of the Roman age. Not far distant is a group of beautiful sarcophagi, placed together on a platform of solid masonry some six feet high. I have seen hundreds of sarcophagi elsewhere in Palestine and Syria, but none like these. Two of them are double—that is, each block has two graves excavated in it, side by side, and covered by one lid. There are also two single ones—six in all. They were richly carved and sculptured; and although much worn, we can discover wreaths of leaves and pine cones along the sides of one, ram's heads at the angles of another, and an eagle on another.

To the east of these are the ruins of a temple. The portico has fallen, and its Corinthian columns are almost covered with thorns and thistles. A triple doorway, handsomely ornamented with wreaths of fruit and flowers, remains perfect. On the lintel of one of the side doors is an eagle with expanded wings.

Dr. Robinson supposed that these remains were of Jewish origin; and there seemed some cause for the belief in the fact that a Jewish tradition of the middle ages placed here the sepulchres and monuments of Barak, Deborah, and Jael. When I saw them I thought the style of the architecture and the sculptures on the sarcophagi were Roman or Grecian rather than Jewish. Other travellers have since examined them more thoroughly, and the result shows that my impressions were correct. An altar has been discovered at the large building, with a Greek inscription, almost obliterated, containing a dedication to "the gods."

BARAK'S VICTORY.

Kedesh was the birthplace of Barak, Naphtali's hero and Israel's deliverer. From Kedesh Deborah summoned him to fight the battle of his country, and from hence he marched at the head of ten thousand brave men. At Kedesh was thus enacted the first scene of that historic drama; and beside it the last act also was performed. At that time the tribe of Heber the Kenite was encamped "at the terebinths of Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh." Judges iv. 11. It was the second day after the battle on Esdraelon; but the news had not yet reached these mountains. From the towers of Hazor watchmen looked in vain for a messenger; and the mother of Sisera called from her window, "Why is his chariot so long in coming? why tarry the wheels of his chariots?" v. 28. On the evening of that day a solitary footman is seen approaching the tent of Heber. His step is tottering; his dress rent and covered with mire; in his face is pictured black despair. Jael hastens forth to meet him. It is Sisera. She needs to ask no questions, for she can read the whole story at a glance. And hark! the cries of the pursuers already echo through the mountains. Seul their weapons flash amid the foliage. "Turn in, my Lord, turn in to me—fear not." He turned in to the tent. "Give me a little water—I am thirsty." She gave him milk; he drank, and sank exhausted into sleep. It was his last sleep. Jael took an iron tent-pin in one hand, and a heavy mallet in the other, and by a single blow pierced the temples of the sleeping warrior. So died Sisera.

Beneath the shade of a terebinth by the ruins of Kedesh, I read this tragic tale. Before me, in a forest glade, were the black tents of some Turkmans, modern representatives of the Kenites. I saw the large iron tent-pins; I saw the mallets with which the women drive them into the ground when encamping, for this is their work. I saw the women themselves—strong, active, fierce-looking women; just as fancy would picture a Jael. There was little wanting to complete the scene. That little imagination easily supplied; and there again was realized before me one of the most graphic of Bible stories.

BETH-REHOB.

I rode on north-east for two hours through a richly wooded country, and then came out on the eastern brow of the mountain range. A sharp descent of twenty minutes brought me to the village of Hunin. The great attraction here is the castle, now in ruins, but exhibiting in its massive foundations and shattered towers specimens of the workmanship of every race that held the country from the Phœnicians to the Turks. The site is most commanding—a terrace on the steep mountain side, a thousand feet above the plain of Dan. Facing it, on the opposite range of Hermon, I saw the ruins of Cæsarea Philippi. The sacred writer, in telling the story of the capture of Laish by the Danites, says it was situated "in the valley that lieth by Beth-Rehob." Judges xviii. 28. There was the valley below me, and yonder little rounded hill in the midst of it is the site of Laish. Is not this therefore Beth-Rehob?

I here bade adieu to the mountains of Naphtali, and rode over to the fountains of the Jordan.

THE INVASION OF TIGLATH-PILESER.

During another tour, made at the same season of the year, I traversed Naphtali from north to south. Crossing the Leontes at the Castle of Jhukif, I rode over a low ridge into the beautiful plain of Merj 'Ayun, which lies on the northern frontier of Naphtali. I ascended the isolated tell Dibbin, at the upper end of the plain. It is about a hundred feet high, and on its flat top and round base are heaps of stones and rubbish. The tell takes its name from a neighboring village, but the name of the plain is ancient. It is not difficult to recognize the Hebrew Ijon in the Arabic 'Ayun. On this spot stood Ijon, the first city captured by Benhadad when he invaded Northern Palestine (1 Kings xv. 20), and the first taken by Tiglath-pileser. 2 Kings xv. 29.

I was now prepared to trace the route of the Assyrian conqueror—that route along which he led so many weeping captives in his train.

I rode down through fields of corn and green meadows to the foot of the plain, some five miles from Ijon. Here, on the top of a little conical hill, stands the village of Abel, on the site of Abel-beth-Maachah, the second city captured by Tiglath-pileser. From it the Assyrians ascended the mountains and marched upon Kedesh. I rode southwards along their eastern base to survey the plain of Huleh (or Merom), and search for the site of Hazor.

After a long ride, the incidents of which I must here pass over, I reached an undulating plain lying between the foot of the mountains and the western shore of the waters of Merom. Ascending a projecting ridge, I examined the country minutely, and felt convinced that I had before me the battle-field where Joshua overthrew the northern confederacy: "So Joshua came against them at the waters of Merom suddenly." xi. 7. If so, where was Hazor? It must have been close at hand, for after the pursuit was over, "Joshua turned back and took Hazor."

A New Discovery.

The discovery of an immense river in Alaska, hitherto unknown to geographers, has been made by Lieutenant Storey, who went up on the revenue steamer Thomas Corwin to distribute rewards to the Tohuckohee Indians of Alaska. The river had been vaguely spoken of by Indians to former explorers, and Lieutenant Storey determined to see if it existed. Accompanied by one attendant and an interpreter, he proceeded inland from Hotham Inlet in a south-easterly direction until he struck the mysterious river. He traced it to its mouth, a distance of about fifteen miles, where he saw such huge pieces of floating timber as to satisfy him that the stream must be of immense size. He retraced his steps for a distance of fifty miles, where he encountered natives who told him that they had come down the river a distance of fifteen hundred miles, and that it went up higher than that. Having no time to go further, Lieutenant Storey returned. The Indians stated that the river in some places is twenty miles wide. It lies within the Arctic circle, but in August, when Lieutenant Storey was there, he found flowers and vegetation not hitherto discovered in so high a latitude. A despatch from Lieutenant Schwatka, who is also in Alaska, states that he has been exploring the Yukon, and that he had to travel nearly three thousand miles to reach the head waters of the river, which stream lies entirely within the boundaries of our polar possessions, and that in descending the river on a raft the distance covered was nearly two thousand miles. He describes the river as being one of the largest in the world, discharging fifty per cent. more water than the Mississippi, and being at places seven miles in breadth.

Michigan Conference Report.

The Michigan Quarterly Conference was held according to appointment at the meeting house near Raisin Centre, Lenawee Co., Oct. 12-14, 1883.

The President being absent, L. C. Chase was appointed President pro tem. F. Chase, J. Watkins, and J. A. Wilson were appointed committee of arrangements.

The ministers present were J. F. Wagoner of Denver, Ind., J. S. Hatch of St. Joseph, E. Hoyt of Grand Rapids, J. Watkins of Clayton, and L. C. Chase of Raisin. The attendance of brethren was good, considering that most of our brethren in Michigan live in the western part of the state. The attendance of the friends and neighbors living in the vicinity was excellent except on Saturday when the rain prevented many from attending. The best of attention and order prevailed during the entire meeting. Social meetings were held each day at 10 a. m., many of the brethren and sisters taking part. The discourses preached were as follows:

Friday evening Brother Hatch spoke on "The Resurrection," text Luke xx. 35, 36. Saturday at 11 a. m. a sermon on the Christian hope by Brother Hatch, text Eph. ii. 21, "Fitly framed together." The speaker showed that in order to be fitly framed together we must be framed according to the plan laid down in the Scriptures; must understand the promises of God to his people.

After an intermission Brother Hoyt gave a discourse on the gospel from Mark xvi. 15, 16. Gospel is good message and the gospel of the kingdom is the good message concerning the kingdom of God. In the evening Brother Wagoner spoke, using as a text John iii. 16. Sunday at 11 a. m., Brother Wagoner gave an excellent discourse upon the future home of God's people; text Isa. xiv. 18. After the sermon the Lord's death was commemorated by partaking of the emblems.

After intermission Brother Hatch spoke of God's plan concerning the earth, from Num. xiv. 21. He showed the perfect harmony of the Scriptures in regard to this subject, especially some that seemed to conflict. In the evening Brother Wagoner spoke on the "Coming of Christ," text 2 Peter iii. 3, 4. This closed the conference, but Brother Hatch remained one day and addressed a full house Monday evening upon the subject of the gospel. Perfect harmony and good will pervaded the entire meeting and those present thought that they had been well paid for coming.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

POSTPONEMENT.

Owing to unavoidable causes the Annual State Conference, and Quarterly Conference of the Second District, of Arkansas, has been postponed till Friday before the third Sunday in November. Brethren will please take notice of the change. Again let me say, Come filled with God's love and strength to push the work of the Lord forward, and let this be one of the best meetings ever held in the state. I am getting a few letters from brethren asking about Arkansas. I will say to all who contemplate coming here, if they will write me and enclose a stamp I will try to give all the information they may wish about lands and location of churches.

JOHN W. TEAS, Sec.
Rondo, Ark.

The First Quarterly Conference of the Church of God, for Indiana, will be held at Plymouth, commencing Friday, Nov. 9, 1883, and continuing over Sunday. The annual meeting of the Stockholders of the Christian Publishing Association will be held at this time. Brethren, this conference meeting is yours. Come to it. If you have a word of good news to impart, come and encourage your weak brother, who has come to get sympathy and strength. The friends in Plymouth want to see all their old friends and many new ones.

By order of the Conference,

To the Scattered of Promise throughout the World:

The undersigned proposes to issue from the press, either in Chicago or in New York City, as circumstances may decide, the following works, to-wit:

I. The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. In the first division the nature of the Coming Age is fully discussed, as to its physical and moral character: 1. That the earth itself has a crowning age, in which it shall be perfectly adapted to be the residence of man in his highest type; 2. That man, in that resurrection state, will be under the endless reign of the Personal Messiah; 3. In establishing the proximity of that age, the prophecies of Ezekiel, Isaiah, Daniel, Zechariah, Christ, Paul, Peter, and the Apocalypse, are critically examined, relative to its rapid approach.

II. The second work will be devoted to the investigation of the various phases of the Eastern Question:—1. The Egyptian phase, 2. The British phase, 3. The Russian phase, 4. The Ottoman phase, 5. The Hebrew phase, 6. The American phase, 7. Lesser phases of the Eastern Question, 8. The location of each of the Great Powers in the coming contest, 9. All nations marshal under the banners of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. These powers are traced in history to the present time. All the great national issues are fully investigated.

If all that are interested in these great and most sublime topics will aid, they will be issued immediately. They will be printed and bound in a form that will do credit to the vastness of the subjects, and put to subscribers at prices quite reasonable. The books will contain about 500 large royal 8vo. pages each.

Millfield, O.

PROSPECTUS.

The following work is now in press, and will be ready for delivery to subscribers in October. It will contain between 300 and 350 pages, 12 mo., good paper, substantially bound in cloth. Price $1. We are now receiving orders for the work, to be paid when the book is delivered.

Title Page.—The Law, the Covenants; and the Sabbath. Also an Epitome of the Great Salvation; and an Appendix including various other subjects, in brief. By Dr. L. C. Thomas, of Wyoming, Del."

The perfect unchangable moral law is considered and shown to be the basis and split of the old Sinaitic law, now dead in its entirety. The law of Moses and law of Christ are compared and contrasted, and the relation of both to the old and new covenants is treated at some length. The Sabbath question is carefully and lengthily examined, and presented and discussed in a somewhat new light.

The work also includes the consideration of Sunday, conditional immortality, the gospel, return of the Jews, the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, punishment of the wicked, the state of the dead, the new birth, the one faith, the one hope, the image of God, nature of Christ, the name, religion, morality, Christianity, etc.

RUSSIAN PHASE OF THE EASTERN QUESTION---No. 43.

Siberian or Asiatic Russia—Is ancient Inhabitants, their History, Sacred and Profane—Colonization After the Flood—By which of Noah's Sons was Siberia Settled?—Ethnological and Ethnographical View—Its Relative Bearing on Palestine and the Hebrews—God's Purpose in its Early Settlement.

Siberian or Asiatic Russia. This, the eastern and the most ancient northern division of the Russian field, has been very briefly described relative to its physical aspects. No part of the globe has less natural attractions. It would seem that a very large portion of its more northern territory is totally unfit for the abodes of civilization; yet man, in his restless hunt for objects to gratify his insatiable curiosity, early traced his pathway through this inhospitable region. The wheel of time, in its swift revolutions, cast its human scintillations far beyond the limits of the centripetal force of more genial latitudes. God has, however, designed the entire globe to be peopled, and to that end he has made man a cosmopolitan. His purpose was indicated in the great variety of the human family as to physical organization. This is distinctly seen in the three sons of Noah. These three men were appointed by the Earth's Proprietor to people the earth. To accomplish his purpose, it was necessary to adapt their constitutions severally to the fields they were to occupy. Those fields were Asia, Africa and Europe, and the islands of the sea, including America and Australia. These included three classes of zones, the torrid, the temperate, and the frigid. The names of Noah's three sons point out their intended localities.

Ham (חָם Cham) warm, how black becomes black by heat, from חָמַם Chamam, it was warm; hence חַמָּה cham-mah, the sun, Job xxx. 28, because of its burning heat. Hence, also Egypt or Africa, i. e., the hot, burning country. Ps. cvi. 22." "The Coptic or native name of Egypt is Kem or Chem, supposed to be the same word as Ham, and signifying both black and hot," or black by the sun's heated rays. In hieroglyphics, Egypt is expressed by K. M. On the Rosetta stone the word is found more than ten times, and is read by Champollion Chmo. The name, in its signification, belongs to Ham's posterity, rather than to himself. Why this name given to this son rather than to either of the other two? Simply, that it was suggested to Noah by the same Being that named "John" and "Cyrus," for Ham was not blacker than Shem or Japheth: It is clear that Ham's posterity were intended to be the tenants of a hot, burning field, and in that manner become sunburnt, or black. Are not the names of Shem and Japheth prophetic also?

Shem (שֵׁם Shem) signifies name, renown. How could Noah discern to give this son, when an infant of a day, a name that should express the features of his character in mature age, and that would apply also to his posterity? The solution is evident. It was suggested to Noah by him that fixed, in advance, his field, his character, and his destiny. Shem and his posterity were to inherit the site of Eden, and have renown. "Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be to his brethren." "Blessed (be) the Lord God of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant." Gen. ix. 25, 26. This prediction was given to Noah by the Supreme Ruler of all nationalities and the character of the people is adapted to their field and mission. The Hamitic and Shemitic nations, as to their physical and national traits of character, correspond with these ancient and inspired predictions.

The name Japheth (יֶפֶת Yahpheth) the extender, or fair, has also been given by one who knows the character from the beginning. Japheth's posterity was to be fair, and spread over the world. Two derivations are given to the name. Some of the learned say that it comes from the Hebrew word pathah, to open, to stretch out, and means "widely dispersed." Gesenius says that it comes from yaphah, to be fair or beautiful, pointing out the fair complexions of the Japhetic, Caucasian or European races. His descendants first peopled the north and west of Asia. Then they occupied "the isles of the Gentiles." The prediction of Noah is, "God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant." Gen. ix. 27. And in Gen. x. 5, it is said, ("By these, the descendants of Japheth,) were the isles of the Gentiles divided in their lands; every one after his tongue, after their families, in their nations." Calmet says, "the term comprehends all those countries to which the Hebrews were obliged to go by sea, whether in Europe or in Asia Minor." It may also include all those western islands and divisions occupied by his descendants. America would thus be included.

"God shall enlarge Japheth." Bagster has the following: "Japheth denotes enlargement; and how wonderfully have his boundaries been enlarged! For not only Europe, but Asia Minor, part of America, Iberia, the whole of the vast regions of Asia north of Taurus, and probably America, fell to the share of his posterity. Dwell in the tents of Shem.' These words are ambiguous; for they may mean either that God or that Japheth shall dwell in the tents of Shem. In either sense the prophecy has been literally fulfilled." "In Judah God is known; his name is great in Israel. In Salem also is his tabernacle, and his dwelling place in Zion." Ps. lxxxvi. 1, 2. When the Son of God was made flesh, and dwelt among the Jews, the children of Abraham and of Shem, God did also persuade Japheth to dwell in the tents of Shem, when the Gentiles were admitted, in the Christian, to equal privileges with the Judah church. We prefer, however, the literal construction. It is true that Shem has dwelt in Japheth, and Japheth in the tents of Shem; but Ham has not dwelt in the tents of either. Who but the Supreme Ruler could have written the unformed characters of Shem, Ham and Japheth? God, then, made an allotment to the sons of Noah, according to certain fitness, which he himself originated and brought about in its own proper time.

Who, then, were the first inhabitants of Siberian Russia after the flood? After a careful study of the histories of the Hamitic period, such as the Cushites, the Phœnicians, and the Egyptians, we are safe in excluding the descendants of Ham from the tenantry of Siberian Russia. God had no mission to the extreme north for the dark, sunburnt race of Ham. His work lies principally in the torrid zone, though his nomadic home may lie in the more temperate latitudes. They may at times have been the slaves of the Persian kings and nobles, and therefore have mixed a sprinkle of their blood with that of Shem; and, still later, have, in a similar manner, tainted the blood of Japheth, but not sufficient to leave any national or race lines. The first tenants, therefore, of the Siberian field were, in its eastern division, Shemitic, and in its western part Japhetic. Profane history does not aid us materially in our researches after its most ancient inhabitants. The Bible alone furnishes our information.

In Gen. x. is an inspired statement which it is well to follow, since it contains a list of the generations of Shem and Japheth, and the fields to which they were principally assigned. In the days of Peleg, (division) the earth was divided. Gen. x. 25. The generations of Shem were assigned to southern and middle Asia, the finest regions of the East. So far, then, as the first settlements of the fields of northern Asia are concerned, we can exclude the early generations of Shem also. The nations of Shemitic blood had their fields further south, leaving the frigid north to the generations of Japheth, the oldest son of Noah. Of these it is said: "The sons of Japheth, Gomer, and Magog, and Madai, and Javan, and Tubal, and Meshech, and Tiras. And the sons of Gomer: Ashkenaz, and Riphath, and Togarmah. And the sons of Javan: Elishah, and Tarshish, Kittim, and Dodanim. By these were the isles of the Gentiles divided in their lands; every one after his tongue, after their families, in their nations." Gen. x. 2–5. The list of Japheth's posterity, as here enumerated, is the following: 1, Gomer; 2, Magog; 3, Madai; 4, Javan; 5, Tubal; 6, Meshech; 7, Tiras; 8, Ashkenaz; 9, Riphath; 10, Togarmah; 11, Elishah; 12, Tarshish; 13, Kittim; and 14, Dodanim. These, with their descendants, peopled the great north and west. In this list are found the tribal elements of the present empire of the north, known as the Russian empire.

Let us scrutinize this family record more in detail. Before we enter upon this difficult and perplexing analysis, it will be better to complete the record. Ezekiel has the following additional names of tribal races, or ethnological divisions, which we append as supplementary, viz.: 15, Gog; 16, Sheba; 17, Dedan. Numbers 16 and 17 are southern tribes, and will not be noticed for the present. Number 18 we add from Gen. xlvi. 21—Rosh, son of Benjamin, a northern family of the race of Shem. These last four will be noticed under their appropriate heads.

Gog (גּוֹג) high mountain) was a Reubenite, and grandson of Joel, B. C. 1200. He was a prince of Rosh, Moshech, Tubal, and Tiras, in ancient Scythia or Tartary. Let us now examine the list in Gen. x. 2–5:

Sons of Japheth. 1, Gomer, was the eldest son of Japheth, whose posterity settled the isles of the Gentiles, every one after his tongue, family and nation. Calmet identifies the Gomerites with the Cimmerii originally inhabiting the region north and east of the Black Sea and the Sea of Azof. At an early day, penetrated into Asia Minor, and in the seventh century B. C. overran Lydia. Dr. Wm. Smith, in his Bible Dictionary, says, "His (Gomer's) name is subsequently noticed but once (Ezek. xxxviii. 6) as an ally or subject of the Scythian king Gog. He is generally recognized as the progenitor of the early Cimmerians, of the later Cimbri, and the other branches of the Celtic family, and of the modern Gael and Cimry, the latter preserving, with very slight deviation the original name." Another author says: "Gomer; the Celts or Cimmerians. Under these names may probably be included the descendants of all the barbarous bands in the north of Asia." Cottage Bible: "And thou (Gog) shalt come from thy place out of the north parts, thou and many people with thee, all of them riding upon horses, a great company, and a mighty army. Ezek. xxxviii. 15. Josephus understands the Galatians of northern Phrygia to be intended; and Gimmeri or Gamir, was in the language of the ancient Armenians, a usual designation for their neighbors, the Cappadocians. It is not impossible that an intimate ethnological connection between the Cappadocians of Kephallon and the Cimmerians of Homer may ultimately be established; but meanwhile it is important to observe that the three sons of Gomer, as named in Gen. x. 2, admit of a tolerably definite localization. Ashkenaz, who has sometimes been identified with the Germans, is almost certainly the same as the Ascanians, a very ancient tribe of northern Phrygia. Riphath has nothing to do with the Riphæan mountains, with the Carpathians, or with Niphates, but, as Josephus has pointed out, is to be identified with Paphlagonia; as Bochart has shown, the name probably survives in the designation of a river in Bythnia, and in a district situated on the Thracian Bosphorus. "Although Togarmah is by Josephus interpreted as equivalent to Phrygia, there is a considerable amount of ancient testimony in favor of its identification with Armenia. It is possible that the same root is actually at the basis of the two words; at all events the connection is assumed in the account which the Armenians themselves give of their legendary history." Library of Universal Knowledge.

The results of the census taken in 1880 of the population of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, show that the Jewish inhabitants of the Emperor Francis Joseph's dominions number, in round numbers, 1,640,000. They chiefly abound in Galicia, Hungary, Moravia and in Vienna. The Jewish population of the capital is about 80,000.

THE TERMS conscience, wisdom, reason, privity, mystery, conscious, etc.

For the benefit of my readers who are metaphysicians (and all who understand the Scriptures must be either theoretically or practically such) I purpose in this article to define some of the primary metaphysical terms of the Bible.

And first in order, conscience, consciousness. There is no word for conscience in Scripture, this same word having been rendered indiscriminately consciousness and conscience in the common version according to the translators' peculiar philosophical bias, and it is the writer's mature and well-considered opinion that there is no warrant in the teaching of Scripture for any such distinction metaphysical. Our conscience is our consciousness of right, and this consciousness of right is a result of measurement by some standard of right, and to say that one is conscientious is simply to say that such a one has a concept of right as measured by some standard of right, and whether this conscientiousness be of any value or not depends entirely upon the fact of whether the standard is a true and just standard or not. The consciousness can be educated. Such a thing as conscience is represented to be could not be of course. For it is represented to be an inate conscious something with an inate sense of right that sits in judgment on the person and is in its inateness and primordial purity infallible, which to my mind is all bosh and nonsense. My common sense (or reason) teaches me that it is wrong and foolish to lie, but if I for some reason violate this good judgment in consciousness and keep doing it until lying becomes habitual and easy, I have (educated) brought myself into the state spoken of in the Scriptures, "as having had my consciousness (not conscience) seared with a hot iron." If I persistently call ten inches a foot and educate myself to believe it, common sense may finally abdicate, and insanity take possession of me, and we certainly can blunt our reason or any of our faculties by misuse and perversion.

But to proceed with our definitions. The first step out of self-consciousness is through perception, whether sensual or mental, and this is the meaning of our next term συνεσις, having reference primarily to the perception which comes through the senses so called, but covering the ground also of the mental perceptions. Remember reader, that all these terms ending as they do in sis are verbal nouns denoting a process, not the result of a process. The primitive verb in this instance meaning "to know or become conscious through the senses."

The next term in order is γνωσις meaning conception which is the consciousness in the mind of having perceived—the process of forming a concept. The next term in order is γνωσις, knowing or comprehending, attaching a meaning of some sort to the concept formed in the mind. The next in order is συνεσις, which means understanding or the process of bringing any given concept into a true union with our comprehension. For example I know a certain word when I see it written or printed, but I do not understand its meaning. I learn its meaning and then I have brought my concept of that written or printed word into a true and full relation to my comprehension. This is the word (συνεσις) used all through the Scriptures from the beginning to the end for the true understanding which comes only with spiritual enlightenment from on high and means literally "a sending along with." It is not sufficient to merely know a man for instance. To understand him in all his subtle organism of body and mind is a vastly different process.

The last term in the order here given is επιγνωσις, and means acquaintance, which is an intermediate step between knowing and a full understanding.

To further illustrate the Scriptural use of several of these terms and to impress upon the reader the importance of a correct understanding of this use I will translate the first twelve verses of the 2nd chapter of Solomon's Proverbs (Parables). But remember that the process mental denoted by the term συνεσις is the "union" (the common derived meaning of the word by the way) of the conscious ego, through the meaning which resides in or attaches to the concept thus formed in the mind (γνωσις, individual consciousness, or the sphere in which each individual ego acts) and that "reflection" (συνεσις) is in reality the conscious ego thinking rationally in its own individual sphere according to its capacity or ability, moreover that διανοια "purpose of mind," signifies the direction, or bent of the συνεσις under the impulse of the will, the individual will that resides in the ego. And that the συνεσις is the particular thought in the general γνωσις upon which the conscious ego under the impulse of will has for the time being fixed itself; in general use a reasonable, sane thought in contradistinction to a παραφρων which is an unreasonable, foolish, or insane thought. And now let us consider the passage above referred to.

PARABLES, CHAPTER II.

1. O son, when thou hast received my commandment in the way it is being spoken, shouldst thou hide it by thyself.

2. Thine ear will be open to hear wisdom, and thou wilt impel (παραβαλεις the word for parable) thy heart to be along side of it in understanding (συνεσις "union"), and thou wilt constrain (προσβαλεις again) it to be along side of a way of instruction for thy son.

3. For shouldst thou invoke wisdom, and allow thy voice to seek that way of understanding.

4. And shouldst thou seek it like money, and shouldst thou search after it as for hid treasures,

5. Then wilt thou understand (συνησεις) fear (φοβος) of the Lord and find acquaintance (επιγνωσιν) with God.

6. Because the Lord giveth wisdom, and from his face is knowing (γνωσις) and understanding (συνεσις).

7. And he treasureth up salvation for those who are restoring to upright ness, he holdeth a shield over the journeying of those

8. Whose object it is to watch to guard ways of justificatory rites; and he will effectually watch to guard those who reverence him.

9. Then wilt thou understand συνησεις righteousness and judgment and give right direction to all good rules of action.

10. For should wisdom have come into thy purpose of mind (διανοια), and thy mental perception have seemed to be good,

11. Good counsel will watch to guard thee, and holy reflection (συνεσις) will watch to keep thee,

12. That it may deliver thee from an evil way, and from a man who speaketh nothing reliable."

The reader will observe that the use of most of the terms above commented on is here illustrated in this passage. The gist of the wise man's advice is how to become wise in goodness. Does he say anything about an inate conscience? No, this doctrine of an infallible conscience belongs to the limbo of the immortal soul philosophy and is a vanity of vanities. A man is what his reason enlightened or unenlightened makes him.

SALOONS—THE SINNER OF SIN AND DESTRUCTION.

Says Dr. Richardson: "Whenever strong drink produces a permanent effect upon the human body, there is established in the affected person the habit of falsehood. The word of no dipsomaniac can be relied on. It is as if the very knowledge of truth, the distinction between true and untrue, has become utterly lost or forgotten." And the statement was confirmed by the experience of eighty or ninety physicians at a late meeting of the Medical Temperance Association.

RESULTS OF LICENSE.

License me to sow the seeds of poverty and shame all over the community! License me to coin money out of widows' sighs and orphans' tears, and the blood of souls! License me to weave cords of habit about your strong men and lead them captives—bound to the chariot wheels of the demon rum! License me to make widows and orphans! License me to write the word "disgrace" upon the fair foreheads of innocent children! License me to break the hearts of fond fathers and mothers, whose sons I will bring to poverty and shame, and of whose daughters I will make drunkard's wives! License me to take bread from hungry children and rob them of little shoes for their feet, and comfortable clothes for their shivering forms! License me to befog the mind, paralyze the reason, and benumb the conscience of your legislators, and thus corrupt the very fountains of your political life and prosperity! License me to incite red-handed murder to his work of destruction, and turn loose upon society a whole brood of evils that will fill your jails and penitentiaries, poor-houses and asylums! License me to aid in the work of sending one hundred thousand of our American citizens down to drunkards' graves every year! Throw around me the protection of law, while I poison the bodies, enfeeble the minds, and ruin the souls of my fellow-men.

AN APPALLING STATEMENT.

The presiding judge of one of the Chicago courts recently said to an Inter Ocean reporter:

You may ransack the pigeon-holes all over the city and county, and look over such annual reports as are made up, but they will not tell half the truth. Not only are the saloons in Chicago responsible for the cost of the police force, but the fifteen justice courts, the bridewell, also for the criminal courts, the county jail, a great portion of Joliet (state prison), the long murder-trials, the coroner's office, the morgue, the poorhouse, the reform school, the mad-house. Go anywhere you please, and you will find almost invariably that whisky is at the root of the evil. Of all the boys in the reform school at Pontiac, and the various reformatories about the city, ninety per cent. are the children of parents who died through drink, or became criminals through the same cause. Look at the defalcations; fully ninety per cent. of them come about through drink and dissipation. Go to the divorce courts; fully ninety per cent of the divorces come about through drink, or drink and adultery both. Of the insane or demented cases disposed of in the courts here every Thursday, a moderate estimate is that 90 per cent. are alcoholism and its effects. I saw it estimated the other day that there were ten thousand destitute boys in Chicago who are not confined at all, but running at large. I think that is a small estimate. Men are sent to prison for drunkenness, and what becomes of their families? The county agent and the poor-house provide for some. It is a direct expense to the community. Generally speaking, these families go to destruction. The boys turn out as thieves, and the girls and mothers generally resort to the slums. The sand-baggers, murderers and thugs generally of today who are prosecuted in the police courts are the sons of men who fell victims to drink. The percentage in this case is fully 95 per cent. I have studied this question for years, and have passed upon criminal cases for years, and know whereof I speak.

Palestine is about the size of Massachusetts, 140 miles in length, and 40 in average breadth. On the very frontier of the east, it is hemmed in between the Mediterranean Sea on the one hand, and the enormous trench of the Jordan Valley on the other, by which it is effectually cut off from the mainland of Asia behind it. On the north it is shut in by the high ranges of the Lebanon and anti-Lebanon, and by the Litany which runs at their feet and forms the main drain of their southern slopes. On the south it is no less enclosed by the arid and inhospitable deserts of the upper part of the peninsula of Sinai, whose undulating wastes melt into the southern hills of Jordan. A small slip of country indeed, proportioned to its moral and historical position, as the theatre of the most momentous events in the world's history! And, let me add, destined to be the great central figure on the map and in the history of the future!—Bostonian.

AN ANSWER TO INGERSOLLISM.

The following extract from the St. Louis Christian Advocate is an able answer to Ingersollism and the arguments of his infidel followers:

Has infidelity ever raised a man or woman from the haunts of vice, and made his or her life clean? Has it ever taken a drunkard from the gutter, the gambler from his cards, the fallen from a life of shame? Has it ever found a man coarse and brutal in character and life, and made him a kind husband and faithful father? Has it ever gone out into the heathen lands, and found a people ignorant and barbarous, delighting in rapine and murder, and by the power of its teachings lifted them out of their degradation until they adopted the customs of civilized nations? Is there in all history of infidelity a story of its moral triumphs that will match the regeneration of the Fiji Islands under the labors of the Wesleyan missionaries? Has it added anything to the sum of human happiness? Does it bring one ray of comfort into the chamber of death, filling the soul of the dying with peace, and the hearts of weeping friends with hope? The religion of Jesus Christ has done all these things. The tree is known by its fruits.

CIRCULAR.

To the Students of Prophecy throughout the World:

The undersigned proposes to issue from the press, either in Chicago or in New York City, as circumstances may decide, the following works, to-wit:

I. The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. In the first division the nature of the Coming Age is fully discussed, as to its physical and moral character: 1. That the earth itself has a crowning age, in which it shall be perfectly adapted to be the residence of man in his highest type; 2. That man, in that resurrection state, will be under the endless reign of the Personal Messiah; 3. In establishing the proximity of that age, the prophecies of Ezekiel, Isaiah, Daniel, Zechariah, Christ, Paul, Peter, and the Apocalypse, are critically examined, relative to its rapid approach.

II. The second work will be devoted to the investigation of the various phases of the Eastern Question:—1. The Egyptian phase, 2. The British phase, 3. The Russian phase, 4. The Ottoman phase, 5. The Jewish phase, 6. The American phase, 7. Lesser phases of the Eastern Question, 8. The location of each of the Great Powers in the coming contest, 9. All nations marshal under the banners of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. These powers are traced in history to the present time. All the great national issues are fully investigated.

If all that are interested in these great and most sublime topics will aid, they will be issued immediately. They will be printed and bound in a form that will do credit to the vastness of the subjects, and put to subscribers at prices quite reasonable. The books will contain about 500 large royal 8vo. pages each.

...TITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Nov. 14, 1883.

We will try to give some more deferred articles next week, as we have been giving some this week.

THE Association has committed THE RESTITUTION to our editorial management for one year more. In the past we have looked to God, through the Son of his love, for needed help in all our trials and responsibilities. We shall continue to look to him for his blessing, and earnestly implore his divine assistance for the future. Even if life and health should be continued, we expect the volume for the forthcoming year will be the last one of our beloved paper that will ever go forth under our editorial supervision; and we, therefore, shall spare no pains to make it both instructive and welcome to our readers. Pray for us brethren. Will say something more next week.

OUR Conference passed off very pleasantly. There was a good representation of brethren and sisters from abroad. Brother H. V. Reed's presence was hailed with delight after a comparatively lengthened absence. His discourses were upon well-chosen subjects, and were presented in his lucid and forcible style. Prof. Gardner, from Chicago, gave some interesting readings directly from the Greek New Testament, with very instructive comments. Dr. Fish, from the same city, in our social meeting, briefly exposed some of the fallacious teachings of infidelity, by showing that certain expressions in Oriental symbolisms that have been claimed as historically teaching a mythical Christ, or, otherwise, many Christs, in the past, were really fragmentary prophecies that have come down from Patriarchal times, as predictions that pre-announced a Wonderful Deliverer before History had ever prepared her scrolls to record national achievements—even before nations had an existence. Prophecies, like Enoch's, have been buried up, like jewels in the earth, in hieroglyphs, and true science is disinterring them as the foretellings of oldest antiquity concerning the Coming One—God's Messiah. Dr. Fish delivered a lecture on Sunday, in the Opera House, at 3 p. m., on "Evolution" as taught by infidels, to a very large and appreciative audience, in which he ably set forth the sandy foundation of many of their absurd claims. His short closing peroration on the Christ of Revelation, was in words of thrilling and sublime eloquence, inspired by the grandeur of his subject.

GOLDEN WEDDING.

It seems due that I confess my gratitude to God for his loving kindness and great mercy to me, my dear wife and family.

Our golden wedding day fell on Oct. 21, 1883. Miss Susan L. Huntington and I were married Oct. 21, 1833. With deep heart-moving, with warm and tearful emotion, I thus own God's goodness and special grace to us through these 50 years. Amen.

We both join to magnify the love, the tenderness and forbearance and bounty of our heavenly Father in Christ.

Our daughter has been preserved to us, and to crown all his grace he has opened our hearts to welcome "the coming One" in the glory of his kingdom. Restitution! Re-genesis! Bless the Lord, O my soul! The blissful word of faith and hope "in spirit and life!" Amen. J. B. COOK.

[We congratulate our dear Brother Cook and his estimable companion that they have been spared, in the providence of God, to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of their wedding day. How very few that enter the connubial state, are permitted to walk the journey of life in wedded companionship for half a century. It is with much pleasure that we recall the associations connected with our stay with them while in Brooklyn over one year ago. May the remaining days of life's pilgrimage be passed in the blissful enjoyment of that peace from God that the world neither gives nor takes away.—ED.]

FROM JERUSALEM.

We give the closing part of a letter from Mrs. Davis. Her health has not been good since the accident that befel her a few months ago. We hope she will fully recover in due time, and be able to correspond more frequently. We do not as yet know what will result from the contemplated improvements as respects the canal or railways. Time alone can tell how God's purposes will be accomplished.

JERUSALEM, Oct. 3, 1883.

Now for the news. Yesterday arrived an engineer from the Turkish government to rebuild the road to Jaffa. Also a fine road is commenced to Hebron; carriage road, which is a wonder here. We read in the Egyptian news of this week that English engineers are on the way here to survey the country for the Jordan canal and that they have sold their interest in the Suez Canal for eight million sterling. This news is creating excitement here of course; but the news will reach you long before this letter does. I learned from the prominent Jews today that one hundred and fifty families have applied to the government for permission to land at Jaffa. These families are wealthy. Also that a Jewish agent from Odessa had arrived at Jaffa with means to purchase gardens for colonization. The Jews are more hopeful than ever. They are keeping the feast of the New Year this week; but they say Messiah cannot come until all these wonderful improvements according to prophecy are fulfilled. I am still suffering from fever; the terrible trials that I have passed through have left me feeling more like a machine than anything else. I will try to write as often as there is anything of interest to write about. Please correct all mistakes. I only wonder that I live at all. Hoping that this will find you quite well I remain

Your Sister,
A. E. DAVIS.

Report of Stockholders' Meeting.

As per articles of association, the Stockholders of the "Christian Publishing Association" met in Choral Hall, Plymouth, Ind., Nov. 10, 1883. The meeting was called to order by R. S. Dwiggins, and on motion D. T. Halstead was elected President, and J. H. Willey, Secretary.

Reports of Secretary and Treasurer were then read and referred to a committee of three, consisting of J. L. Wince, J. Benjamin and P. McDonald.

The Stockholders proceeded to the election of a new Board of Directors, which resulted in the re-election of the old Board, viz., R. S. Dwiggins, W. Tuttle, I. G. Roberts, Robert Railsback, and E. K. Barnhill; each receiving 270½ votes, being a majority of paid-up stock.

The committee, on examination of reports find them to be correct, which on motion was received, and the committee discharged.

A proposition was submitted by Brother Reed to take stock in the Association, which should be used as a hymn book fund. The proposition met with general favor, and fifteen shares of $10 each were subscribed.

Pledges for copies of the new hymn book were then taken, over 100 being subscribed for at once.

No further business appearing, the meeting adjourned.

Conference Report.

In accordance with the announcement made, the First Quarterly Conference of the Church of God in Indiana, met at Plymouth. Conference was called to order by R. S. Dwiggins, chairman. Brother Dwiggins then read a portion of the constitution of the society recently organized in the East, showing the object of that Association to be the promotion of the cause of Christ, after which the following resolution was adopted:

We learn with pleasure that brethren representing a number of churches, in conference assembled, at Winchester, Va., organized an Association for the promotion of Christian Knowledge. Believing that much good may be accomplished in the manner suggested by the promoters of this association, therefore this Conference urgently recommends the brethren and all friends of the truth, to assist said association in this good undertaking, by contributing liberally to aid in the promulgation of the glad tidings.

The subject of a new hymn book to be issued by the Christian Publishing Association was discussed and the secretary ordered to correspond with the officers of the different conferences and organizations throughout the country and endeavor to interest them in the work, all realizing the fact that as a people we have no book that can be called our own.

The attendance throughout the meeting was large, the hall being crowded all the time. We had with us Brother H. V. Reed, Prof. Gardner, Dr. Fish, and Sister Booker, of Chicago, Ill.; Sister Woodward of Michigan, besides many brethren and sisters from different parts of Indiana.

The speaking was excellent, being of a practical character. All was harmony, and "a good meeting" was the verdict of all who attended. The time and place of the next quarterly meeting was not settled, but will be ascertained and duly announced.

A. B. UNDERWOOD, Sec.

IMMORTALITY.

"You are radically mistaken, Brother Mc., when you say that we are not by nature immortal."

This is what an eminent Methodist clergyman said to me a few days ago. I had just told him that I could see no evidence of it in the inspired volume, consequently could not accept it as sacred truth. It is strange that my church (Methodist) cannot agree on a question of such intense importance as the one here referred to. It is not to be expected that in minor questions all men shall see precisely alike. The early teachers did not expect this. One man believes he may eat meat every day if he can afford it—I do—and another man, equally conscientious, thinks he may abstain on certain days. I think both may practice their views without offending. But surely now that Christianity is in its nineteenth hundred, its teachers ought to be agreed on the great question, namely, Do I already possess the germ of eternal life, or must I, as God's word teaches, accept it as a gift from the Son of God when he shall redeem my soul from the grave at the resurrection? I claim that my church ought to be as one in their understanding of this leading question, but they are not.

At a "revival service" a few evenings ago, in one of the leading churches here in Baltimore, the preacher used the following language: "Come up here, poor sinner, and kneel at this altar and pray fervently to Almighty God for his blessing, and he will send you to your home with immortality within you."

This is, you see, an admission that the poor sinner by nature is only a mortal, Why can't these two "divines" agree? It is so hard for poor sinners to know which is right. Is it any wonder that thinking and reasonable men turn away in despair from such enigmatical teaching as this?

The wail, "Who will show us any good?" is just as much called for today as it was in the day when it was first uttered. This same preacher, in a recent sermon, commenting on the young man who only lacked one thing, said: "And he went away, away and down, down to the lake of fire, to keep company with the man who is still pleading with Abraham to send Lazarus with one drop of water to cool his parched tongue." Is it strange that a missionary with a message like this should find it difficult to persuade the heathen to swap their innocent gods of stone for a God whose cruelty knows no bounds? In my heart of hearts I rejoice to know that this is not the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. No, no, no! My God says, "Turn ye, turn ye; why will ye die?"

I am as yet unable to find one instance where God resorted to torture in the punishment of his enemies. Only tyrants do this. The God of the Bible never! Oh, hear him pleading and reasoning with Jonah about sparing Nineveh!

Is it not strange that more of our preachers do not follow the example of Paul, and preach Jesus and the resurrection? Nowhere in all the letters and speeches accredited to Paul do I see any allusion to the great bonfire prepared for all men who do not distribute what few goods they have among the poor. True, he speaks of the wrath to come, in Thess. i. But this cannot mean the orthodox hell, so tenaciously believed in, for that is not to come—it is here!

I shall never cease to love THE RESTITUTION for the great help it has rendered me in coming to a better knowledge of truth as taught by our Lord the Christ and the few men he appointed as his successors.

I would say that last Sunday I united for the first time with a few friends—believers in the doctrine of life only in the Christ—in the commemoration of the Lord's death. I think some of them were surprised at my action; but I trust they will remember that if I eat and drink unworthily, it will not work their condemnation. I alone am responsible for my behavior. Over 30 years ago I was baptised in one of the New England lakes by a Methodist minister, a man filled with the mind and spirit of his Master. I have never had any doubt about the validity of my immersion.

I would regard a second baptism—in my case—a pious absurdity, unauthorized in God's word, and just as ridiculous as going to the "front bench" to "get religion"—a method my church it would seem is not yet ready to give up. God being my helper, I purpose using my lips and my pen toward bringing my church away from the rubbish of mundane ways and means to an unwavering dependence in God's pure and soul comforting truth—the Bible. God speaks here. This is the book which tells us who are to obtain immortality, when and where. I find myself sometimes ready to stand up in my seat and ask the preacher to prove by the word that we obtain immortality anywhere this side of resurrection from the dead. Enclosed find $2.00; one for Doctor Sutherland and one on my own account.

ISAAC MCCURRY.

P. S. I would be glad if you would send me a few leaflets or anything you deem appropriate to distribute among Bible readers. I belong to a Bible class in my church and I am treated with great respect by my class-mates. I think any of them would read with pleasure anything I handed them. Should you conclude to use my article—immortality—send me a few of the papers and I will put them where they will do the most good, or try. State price of tracts and I will remit by return mail or in a day or two. J. F. G. and myself are stirring things up in Baltimore. Pray for us. I. McC.

BAPTISM—THE FORMULA OF THE ORDINANCE.

—Is the form of words given in the commission, our authority and example, or shall we assume the right to alter, "add to and take from it?"

1. The commission is dispensational. It extends to "the end of the world"—the consummation of the age. Our Lord says, "Go ye into all the world, Mark xvi. 15, make disciples, baptizing them into the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost." Matt. xxviii. 19.

2. The seven-fold unities, Eph. iv. 13 embraces baptism, and apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers, till we all come into the unity of the faith, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of the Christ! Here we have the same range as in the great commission!

3. But in the very brief record of apostolic ministry, Acts viii. 16; xix. 5, we read, "They were baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus."

4. From this some assume to use "this form of words" (in the name of Jesus) and discard that in Christ's commission! As if they were "of Paul, Apollos (or some) Cephas," and "Christ (indeed) divided!" 1 Cor. i. 13. Is not this practice in the line of all departures from "God in Christ?" As if there could be "another gospel, which yet would not be another." Gal. iv. 6, 7.

Observe. The Lord gives us a form of prayer for the gospel age, and yet the apostles do not quote it verbally, however much they urge prayer in general harmony! So of Father, Son, and Spirit. 2 Cor. xiii. 14.

Again, the Jews recognized "the Lord God of his spirit." Isa. xlviii. 16. But the Gentiles were without God or the spirit and the apostles needed to impart this to them in association with baptism as it is embodied in their apostolic benediction. 2 Cor. xiii. 14.

Hence, believers "were not without law to God; because under law to Christ." 1 Cor ix. 21. They came to God by faith in Christ, for he is "the only way" to God. John xiv. 5–7.

Once more. While we read twice, "they were baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus," Acts viii. 16; xix. 5, we read once "they were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea." 1 Cor. x. 2.

What spirit could leave God out in either case, but that which "beguiled Eve," 2 Cor. xi. 3.

This is no apology for the apostles, or Moses, but taking the general subject as given to us, it is accepting and "confessing the Lord, with reverence and godly fear."

Do reflect on the want of reverence or faith in assuming that "baptism into the name of Jesus" (in an abridged record) should outweigh or supercede Christ's commission! Matt. xxviii. 20. That came from him! That is yet in force and covers all "apostles, pastors, and teachers," till the "one body" is built, and the "new man" complete! Eph. iv. 11–13.

St. Paul notes the fact that Christ "was made of woman," Gal. iv. 4, but he does confirm and not deny the record of his birth, Luke i. 31–35; so apostolic practice in baptism cannot contravene Christ's command, Matt. xxviii. 20. No, no.

In faith and hope,
J. B. COOK.

MYSTERY OF GODLINESS.

There are two mysteries brought to view in the Bible, viz., the mystery of Godliness and the mystery of Iniquity. These seem to be principles in one sense, and in another they [illegible] to be systems. In fact the two systems are embodiments of the respective principles.

The object of the present writing is not to discuss the two systems nor yet to show just what they are, but the subject has been impressed on the mind of the writer by noticing the words in the margin of the Revised Version at 1 Tim. iii. 16.

In King James' Version the passage reads thus: "And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness. God manifest in the flesh quickened in spirit; was seen of angels, preached to the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory."

There has been a good deal of controversy as to whether the word should be "God" or "who was." The margin of the R. V. says, "Many ancient manuscripts read 'which was' instead of 'God.' In that way it reads smoothly thus, "Great is the mystery of godliness which was magnified in the flesh," etc. It can also be understood in the order named, for it is not true that Christ was either preached to the Gentiles or believed on in the world before he was received up at the ascension.

But we see it to be the principle of godliness, which permeates the true church of God and which will soon be embodied in a system.

The mystery of godliness was manifested in Jesus in the flesh, it was justified in the spirit which was manifested, even being highly spoken of by the enemies of the Nazarene; it was seen and recognized by messengers sent to preach it to the Gentiles; it has been believed on, and will be more and more in the world, and when it comes to be recognized in the world as the greatest power on earth, then it can be truly said to be received up into glory, or exalted to a glorious position.

Let it be observed that godliness is godlikeness, and it will be seen that the "mystery of godlikeness" can be and is manifested in the flesh now. And though men may sneer at the one who heaps coals of fire on the head of his enemy in the shape of love, yet they have to confess that it is the great power for breaking down enmity.

Editor Restitution:

I dearly love the truth that the paper advocates, and think it so strange that I was once so blinded. But now I have great reasons to thank God for showing me the blessed truth, and expect soon to realize what it is to be with the Lord, for the signs surely show that his coming is nigh at hand. And I feel encouraged to put forth every effort to publish the truth until he comes. However there are more calls than I can fill. If there are any brethren in this vicinity I would be happy to hear from them.

C. E. LATIMER.

Exegetical.

The aid which the Hebrew Scriptures afford to interpretation cannot be overestimated. I purpose illustrating my statement by giving one or two examples. As an illustration, then, of tracing the wherefore, we may state that the conjunctive and is in Hebrew expressed by merely prefixing the letter ו (vave)—which is the sixth letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Now it may naturally be asked why just this letter should be chosen out of the twenty-two letters for this office? Until comparatively recently this question seems not to have occurred to any person. Hebraists were satisfied that the letter denoted and, and did not trouble themselves to look for the reason. Not so with philologists of more recent years; they sought for the reason, and certainly had no difficulty in finding it. The names of the Hebrew letters are all proper Hebrew words, and signify what they originally represented in their hieroglyphic form. Now the letter ו (vav) denotes a hook—the reader will perceive the letter bears still some resemblance to it. What more natural than that this letter should have been chosen to hook or connect words together?

But modern critics did not content themselves with a mere critical study of the Hebrew; every other study that had the least bearing upon the elucidation of the Scriptures received their fullest attention. The history of the Jews and of the nations with which they came in contact; the geography of the Holy Land, its scenery and natural history; the habits and customs of the Asiatic nations in general, and of the ancient Hebrews in particular; and lastly, though by no means least, the peculiar modes of expression prevailing among the chosen people and among other nations of the Semitic family—all these received the closest investigation, and were constantly pressed into service. The reader of the English Version cannot have failed to notice how frequently words are printed in italics, indicating that such words do not occur in the original. Very frequently, however, it happens that the words supplied are neither in accordance with the ancient mode of expression, nor do they convey the proper sense. Let us take for example Psa. cxxxvii. 5, rendered in the English Version, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning." An ancient Hebrew would not have supplied "her cunning," but would have read the passage:

"If I forget thee, O Jerusalem,
Let my right hand forget me."

That is, let my right hand no longer render me its accustomed services.—Prof. J. M. Hirschfelder.

Baptism.

The Greek is remarkably perspicuous in construction, and definite in significance.

These are terms expressing the application of liquids in almost every conceivable manner,—

Cheo, I pour. Rainо, I sprinkle; Louo, I wash, bathe; Nipto, I wash my hands or a part of my person; Bathizo, I immerse or plunge, swell deep from Bathos the bottom; Rantizo, from Rainо I sprinkle, shed forth; Bapto, I dip, I dye; Baptizo, I dip or immerse.

Now of all the words indicating the application of liquids our Savior commanded the action contained in the last, Baptizo, as expressing his will and no other.

If the word used by him does not mean immerse simply, then the Greek language possessed no word that did.

That this was the original institution is beyond doubt, and continued the only form of the ordinance for more than 1300 years, except in cases of inability on account of sickness, or in present danger of death. In such cases it was thought that effusion would answer for baptism.—John Steeens, in Bible Banner.

One of the papers asks the suggestive question: "Who ever heard of Gibbon's hospital, of Voltaire's infirmary, of Hume's insane asylum, of Paine's institution for the deaf and dumb?"

Sometime, when all life's lessons have been learned,
And suns and stars forevermore have set;
The things which our weak judgment here has spurned,
The things o'er which we grieve with lashes wet,
Will flash before us out of life's dark night,
As stars shine most in deepest hues of blue;
And we shall see how all God's plans are right,
And how what seemed reproof was love most true.

THE STRUGGLE IN SERVIA.

The revolt in Servia is regarded as a possible forerunner of a general conflict in the Balkan Peninsula, in which Russia will struggle desperately for the mastery. The policy of Austria and Germany in raising Roumania and Servia to the dignity of kingdoms, in securing a uniform gauge of railways to the Russian frontier, and in maintaining the friendship of the Sultan, has greatly aggravated the Czar, and nothing but the formidable combination established by Prince Bismark to hold him in check prevents his declaration of war against Germany and Austria. The rumor that the Grand Duke Alexis will soon marry the Princess Amelie, eldest daughter of the Count of Paris, indicates that Russia covets an alliance with France, and desires the immediate restoration of the French throne as an aid to its establishment. Perhaps this fact affords the best explanation of Bismark's hostility to the ambition of the Count of Paris. The troops may temporarily suppress the revolt, but it is evident that a conflict which would shake Europe is repressed only by the powerful combination Bismark has formed to make the Czar impotent abroad.

JEWEL CASKET.

CHRIST FORMED WITHIN.

"Christ liveth in me." Gal. ii. 20.

The indwelling Jesus is a Christ of today. We weaken our hearts when we think of Jesus having lived a long time ago. He is a living Christ. Renan and Tyndall speak beautifully of Christ, who lived in Palestine; but they put him in the grave and keep him there, a dead Christ. Such a Christ would be of no use to us. We bless God that Jesus lives. We may have the larger blessing of Christ living in us. Because Jesus lives his Church will not die. It is Jesus Christ who liveth and loveth us, and, therefore, his kingdom will come. In this is the joy of our life now, and the crown of our life hereafter.

THE CONFLICT.

"Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life." Rev. ii. 10.
Hold the hand that is hapless, and whisper,
"They only the victory win
Who have fought the good fight and have vanquished the demon that tempts us within;
Who have held to their faith undeduced by the prize that the world holds on high;
Who have dared for a high cause to suffer, resist, fight,—if need be, to die."

—W. H. Gray.

BLESSEDNESS.

Carlyle wrote once: "There is in man a higher than love of happiness. He can do without happiness, and instead thereof find blessedness. Was it not to preach forth this same higher, that sages and martyrs, the poet and the priest, in all times have spoken and suffered, bearing testimony through life and through death, to the god-like that is in man, and how in the god-like only has he strength and freedom?" But it is precisely this quality of "blessedness" that I claim for our life-work. This is the key-note of the Psalms, "Blessed" is the man whose delight is in the law of the Lord; and who meditates in that law day and night. Equally is it the key-note of the gospel. We catch it in the hymn which the herald angels sing; in the first words of the Sermon on the Mount; and in the last bright picture of the disciples bidding farewell to their ascended Lord, and returning to Jerusalem with great joy, where they were "continually in the temple, praising and blessing God.

RESIGNATION.

Hast thou a hope from which thy heart
Would almost feel it death to part?
Resign thy God that hope to crown,
Or give less strength to lay it down.
Whate'er the care that breaks thy rest,
Take to thy God that wish, that care,
And change anxiety to prayer!

JUDGE NOT.

There is but One who knows what is in man, and to whom the secrets of human nature lie naked and bare. He has commanded us to judge as we would be judged; to forgive as we would be forgiven. It will be easier for us to do this, if we remember our own ignorance and our own partiality of judgment. We have but to extend to the faults of others the same charity which we easily extend to our own, to raise our opinion of the morality ordinarily to be found among men. There will be less tendency to despair regarding our own future or the future of others, when we recognize for ourselves that he who knows all the evil and all the good in us and in them, sends his blessings of sun and rain upon us all; that he offers salvation to all out of whatsoever depths they call to him; and that his word is pledged to save those who believe in him from themselves, and to place them forever on higher heights than mortal eye has seen or mortal mind has dreamed of. If he who knows man is also he with whom is plenteous redemption for man, it ought not to be difficult for us to believe the best, rather than the worst, of others, when we are ignorant of their good and evil, and to lean to mercy rather than to judgment when we know, and must condemn. In so doing we shall be the better able to lay our own slight and worthless achievements, and our own burden of sins, trustingly and penitently at the feet of him who is at once All-knowing and All-merciful.

BERLIN, Nov. 10.—The festival in celebration of the 400th anniversary of the birthday of Martin Luther was opened this morning by the gathering of 80,000 school children, who, in fifty-three divisions, and accompanied by bands of music, marched to the various churches and attended the religious services in honor of the great Reformer, whose bust was placed before the altar in each edifice. The emperor and crown prince, and the officials of the Imperial University, and all the city officials and clergy, proceeded from the Town Hall to St. Nicholas' church in a great procession. The streets were packed with people.

STRENGTH ENOUGH.

The morning mists that lie
About the day that comes so softly in,
Hide all its secrets from the searching eye,
And none may tell what want, or pain, or sin
Shall break new-risen, from the enfolding shroud,
Nor what is in the cloud.

Before the busy feet,
In the hot noontide 'neath the blazing sun,
Shall with their rapid step-pounds fill the street,
Before the willing hands their work have done,
There may have burst some great and new surprise
Before our shrinking eyes.

It may be ours to stand,
Forsaken, single-handed in a fight
With a determined and a hostile band,
For the dear cause we honor as the Right,
And either be o'ercome or win a crown
Before the sun goes down.

Or may be called to take
Some noble work that needs the wise and strong,
And do it faithfully for Jesus' sake,
Though no great talents may to us belong;
It may be ours to seem to stand alone
Before the Master's throne.

Or we may have today
To lay all work aside, and in the gloom
That suddenly creeps up around the way
Take the short journey that shall find the tomb,
And see the earth-home fly in before our face
In some strange place.

But however it be,
We dare go forth to meet the dim future,
Tranquil and patient, God is near, and he
Will be our helper as he yet has been;
And let the day for us be fair or rough,
We shall have strength enough.

SITE OF HAZOR DISCOVERED.

The incidental notices of the sacred writers place Hazor south of Kedesh; (Josh. xix. 36; 2 Kings xv. 29); and Josephus states that it was situated over the lake of Merom, and so close to it that the plain round the lake was called by its name.

Beside where I sat was the mouth of the ravine of Hendaj. Mounting my horse, I followed a broad path, like an old highway, up its southern bank, and soon came upon the ruins of an ancient city. Not a building—not even a foundation was perfect. Large cisterns, heaps of stone, mounds of rubbish, prostrate columns, the remains of a temple, and an altar with a Greek inscription—such were the ruins strewn over this site. I thought at the time that these might be the ruins of Hazor, and I have since become more and more confirmed in the belief.

From this interesting spot I rode over the mountains to Safed, and thence I took a straight course down a rugged hill side, and across an undulating table-land overgrown with thickets of gigantic thistles, to the mouth of the Jordan, where it enters the Sea of Galilee. It was a toilsome but most interesting ride, affording a clear view at once of the wonderful richness of the soil, and no less wonderful desolation of the country.

Having thus traversed Naphtali, which constitutes the eastern division of Northern Palestine, I now turn to Phœnicia the western.

PHŒNICIA.

Along the whole sea-board of Palestine extends a low plain, twenty miles wide at the southern end, but at the northern a mere strip. In Bible times it was divided into three provinces—Philistia, Sharon, and Phœnicia. The ridge of Carmel separated the two latter. At its northern base is the plain of Acre, reaching inland till it joins Esdraelon. But the mountains of Naphtali first, and then the loftier and bolder chain of Lebanon, shoot out their western roots, and the coast-plain, from Achzib to the entrance of Hamath, does not average more than a mile in breadth, and is often intersected by rocky promontories. On this narrow tract, under the shadow of Lebanon, stood the world-renowned cities of Tyre and Sidon.

The founders of Phœnicia were Sidon, Arvad, and Arki (Gen. x. 15–18), sons of Canaan, and consequently in the Bible as well as on their own coins and monuments, the people are always called "Canaanites." Judges i. 31, 32. The name Phœnicia is of Greek origin, and probably derived from the "palms" (phœnikes) that once waved on the sunny plain. Phœnicia was the great mother of commerce—the England, in fact, of the Old World. The proudest cities along the shores of the Mediterranean were her daughters; Carthage, Syracuse, Cadiz, Marseilles, and many others. The plain of Phœnicia was included in the Land of Promise (Josh. xiii. 4–6), but the Israelites were unable and probably unwilling, to expel the wealthy and powerful traders. Judges i. 31, 32. David and Solomon even sought their aid as seamen, and took advantage of their skill as architects. Sam. v. 11; 1 Kings v.; ix. 27.

Thus, while the sacred interest that clusters round every spot in Palestine can scarce be said to find a place in Phœnicia, there is a historic interest in its ware-washed ruins that makes them dear to the scholar; and there is an occasional connexion between them and Bible story, which awakens the attention of the Christian. Elijah's miracle at Zarephath, a city of Sidon (1 Kings xvii. 9; Luke iv. 26), our Lord's interview with the Syro-Phœnician woman (Matt. xv. 21; Mark vii. 26), and the Apostle Paul's visits to Tyre (Acts xxi. 3), Sidon, (xxvii. 3), and Ptolemais (xxi. 7), can never be forgotten. Phœnicia, too, is full of prophetic interest. The infallible truth of Scripture is written upon her desolate shores.

THE SEA COAST.

My first ride through Phœnicia was a continuation of one of my earliest tours in the Holy Land. Many years have passed since then, but the scenes are still fresh before the eye of memory. From Nazareth I journeyed westward through the wooded hills of Galilee and across the rich plain to Acre. Accho, or Ptolemais, has little Biblical interest, so I pass it and ride northward to Achzib, one of those cities which Asher thought it best to leave, with Accho and Zidon, in the hands of the Phœnicians. (Judges i. 31. The hills were now close upon my right, clothed with olive groves, which brought to my mind Moses' blessing upon Asher—"Let him dip his foot in oil." Deut. xxxiii. 24. I scaled the Tyrian Ladder, a bold headland which shoots far into the sea, and in two hours more I clambered up the dizzy staircase to the top of the White Cape—a perpendicular cliff of limestone rising hundreds of feet from the bosom of the deep; along its brow the ancient and only road is carried, hewn in the living rock. Thence I pushed onward and encamped at the fountains of Tyre.

Nearly the whole shore from the Tyrian Ladder northwards was strewn with ruins. Heaps of hewn stones and quantities of marble tesseræ lay in my path; while broken shafts and mounds of rubbish were seen to the right and left,—here crowning a cliff, there washed by the waves. One thing I specially noted: from the time I left Achzib till I reached the fountains I did not see a human being—a mournful silence reigns along Phœnicia's coast.

TYRE.

I spent two days at Tyre, and they were not the least interesting of my pilgrimage. I first examined the fountains, called Ras-el-'Ain. They are natural springs, four in number, encircled by massive walls, which raise the water high enough to supply the city, to which it was taken on arched aqueducts more than three miles in length. Next I minutely surveyed the desolate site of "Old Tyre," Palæ-tyrus; and then crossing Alexander's mole, I explored the whole remains of "New Tyre." The results of that and other examinations I have detailed elsewhere (Hand-book), and need not repeat here.

Tyre was a double city, or rather there were two cities of the same name, an old and a new. The former stood on the main-land, the latter on an island opposite, half a mile from the shore. Of Old Tyre not a vestige remains. I searched the plain on which it stood without discovering a single fragment of a wall, or a trace of a foundation, or even a heap of rubbish. History accounts for this remarkable fact. Three centuries before Christ the city was taken by Alexander the Great, who immediately proceeded to besiege New Tyre on the island. Not being able to reach its walls with his engines, he collected the remains of the old city—stones, timber, rubbish—threw them into the narrow channel, and thus formed a causeway.

Here we have one of the most striking fulfillments of prophecy on record. Three centuries before Alexander the Great was born Ezekiel wrote—"Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I am against thee, O Tyrus, and will cause many nations to come up against thee, as the sea causeth his waves to come up. And they shall destroy the walls of Tyrus, and break down her towers; I will also scrape her dust from her, and make her like the top of a rock. . . . They shall lay thy stones, and thy timber, and thy dust in the midst of the water. . . . I will make thee a terror, and thou shalt be no more; though thou be sought for, yet shalt thou never be found again, saith the Lord God." xxvi. 3, 4, 12, 21.

Would it not seem as if the prophet had drawn aside the veil which shrouds futurity, and looking down through five-and-twenty centuries, had seen that bare, unmarked, deserted plain as I saw it? One might even imagine that his prophetic eye had been able to distinguish a solitary traveller from a far distant land wandering up and down, searching, but searching in vain, for the city of which he said, "Though thou be sought for, yet shalt thou never be found again."

Now Tyre is now represented by a poor village. The ancient "mistress of the seas" can only boast of a few fishing-boats. The modern houses of a better class have had their walls so shattered by earthquakes that the inhabitants have deserted them; and the modern ramparts are so ruinous that I went in and out over them in several places. The most imposing ruin is that of the cathedral, built in the fourth century, for which Eusebius, the ecclesiastical historian, wrote a consecration sermon, in which William, the historian of the Crusades, presided as archbishop.

But one thing especially struck me in wandering over the site of Tyre. Along the shores of the peninsula lie huge sea-beaten fragments of the old wall, and piles of granite and marble columns. They are bare as the top of a rock; and here and there I saw the fishermen spreading out their nets upon them, to dry in the bright sunshine. I sat down on one of the highest fragments, and read with mingled feelings of wonder and awe, the words of Ezekiel—"I will make thee like the top of a rock; thou shalt be a place to spread nets upon." xxvi. 14.

SIDON.

From Tyre to Sidon I rode in six hours, stopping in the interval to examine the desolate site of the city of Sarepta, and to read the story of Elijah's visit and miracle. 1 Kings xvii. 8–24. The aspect of Tyre is bleak and bare, but that of Sidon rich and blooming. In fact, it is one of the most picturesque towns in Syria. It stands on a low hill which juts out into the Mediterranean, and is defended by old but picturesque walls and towers. On a rocky islet, connected with the city by a broken bridge, is a ruined castle, once the defence of the harbor. The ancient architectural remains about Sidon are few—some marble and granite columns, some pieces of mosaic pavement, and some fragments of sculptured cornice. But the tombs are interesting. They dot the plain and the mountain-side beyond, and have already yielded a rich harvest to the antiquary—Phœnician sarcophagi, Greek coins, funeral ornaments, and crystal vases. They would still repay a fuller inspection.

The gardens and orchards of Sidon are charming. Oranges, lemons, citrons, bananas, and palms, grow luxuriantly, and give the environs of the old city a look of eternal spring. Sidon is one of the few spots in Syria where nature's luxuriance has triumphed over neglect and ruin, and where a few relics of ancient prosperity still remain in street, and mart, and harbor. It is instructive to compare Tyre and Sidon. The former far outstripped the latter in grandeur, wealth and power, but its history has been briefer and more momentous. Once and again the tide of war swept over Tyre, first leaving the old city desolate, and then the new in ruins. Sidon has been more fortunate, or perhaps I should say less unfortunate. The tide of war swept over it, too, but the wave was not so destructive.

How are we to account for this marked difference in the history of two cities, founded by the same race, standing upon the same shore, almost within sight of each other, inhabited by the same people, and exposed to the same dangers? Human foresight, had it been asked, would have pronounced Tyre the more secure, because its position rendered it almost impregnable. The Spirit of prophecy judged otherwise. And in answering this question, the thoughtful reader of the Bible and the thoughtful student of history will not overlook the fact that while Sidon's name is lightly passed over by the Hebrew prophets, the curses pronounced upon Tyre are among the most sweeping and terrible in the whole scope of prophecy.—J. L. Porter.

The Priesthood of Melchisedec...Its Millennial Character.

"Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec." Heb. vii. 21.

The grey dawn of patriarchal history reveals to us no more majestic and significant figure than that of Melchisedec, "king of Salem" and "priest of the most high God," who met Abraham returning from the slaughter of Chedorlaomer, the king of Elam, and his three confederate kings, in "the valley of Shaveh, or the king's dale," a locality which has generally been identified with the valley of the upper Kedron, where Absalom, long afterward, reared a pillar (2 Samuel xviii. 18), and which, we are told by Josephus, was only two furlongs from Jerusalem.

It is in the fourteenth chapter of Genesis that Melchisedec is historically presented to us in the following words: "And Melchisedec, king of Salem, brought forth bread and wine; and he was the priest of the most high God. And he blessed him, and said, Blessed be Abram of the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth; and blessed be the most high God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand. And he gave him tithes of all." Vs. 18–20. This incident and its record, although so brief, and standing in such singular isolation from the thread of the history which it interrupts, is not only in itself most striking and interesting, but also profoundly instructive in its typical teaching.

How suddenly and altogether unexpectedly does Melchisedec here appear before us—a most kingly and majestic form, yet clad in priestly robes, and with the mystic emblems of eucharistic offering—bread and wine—in his hands. We see those priestly hands raised in blessing; we observe the great patriarch, Abraham—the father of the faithful and the friend of God—bowing before the mysterious priest-king, and presenting to him the tithes of all his spoil; and then, as abruptly as it appeared, the vision passes away, and for nearly a thousand years the voice of inspiration utters not again the name of Melchisedec.

Then, however, in an ecstatic Psalm of a most distinctly Messianic character, and descriptive of our Lord's exaltation in the day of his power, we meet with it once more, in the solemn declaration: "The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent. Thou art a priest forever, after the order of Melchisedec." Ps. cx. 4. Again, something like a thousand years pass away, and then, once more, the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews takes up the subject of this mysterious personage, who "without father, without mother, without genealogy, having neither beginning of days nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God; abideth a priest continually" (Heb. vii. 3); and on the two brief references to him above given, which are all that the Scriptures elsewhere contain, founds an argument to show the superiority of Christ's Priesthood, as being "after the order of Melchisedec," to that of Aaron, or Levi, which it had superseded.

Much labor has been wasted in attempts to answer the question, "Who was Melchisedec?" Later Jewish tradition identifies him with Shem; and it is certain that that patriarch was not only alive in the days of Abraham, but even continued to live till Jacob was fifty years old. Compare Gen. xi. 11, with vs. 12–26; xxi. 5; xxv. 7–26. According to others, he belonged to the family of Ham or of Japheth; and it has been said that this is necessarily implied by the language of the apostle, when, drawing a parallel between Melchisedec and Christ, he says that our Lord belonged to "a tribe of which no man gave attendance at the altar." Some, again, have suggested that he was an incarnate angel, or other superhuman creature, who lived for a time among men. Others have held that he was an early manifestation of the Son of God; and a sect, called the Melchisedecians, asserted that he was "an incarnation of the Holy Ghost."

But in all these conjectures the fact has been strangely overlooked that the reticence of the Scriptures on the point is typical and significant, for, could it be determined who Melchisedec really was, it could no longer be said that he was "without father, without mother, without genealogy;" which statement is to be understood, not as implying that he was not a natural descendant of Adam, but that he designedly appears and disappears in the sacred narrative, without mention either of his parentage or death.

There can, however, be no question that, whoever Melchisedec may have been, he was an eminent type of Christ. This is placed beyond doubt, not only by the language of the 110th Psalm—the Messianic character of which has ever been recognised by Jews and Christians alike—but especially by the argument of the apostle in the seventh chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews, in the course of which there occurs the explicit declaration that he was—in the various respects mentioned—"made like unto the Son of God."

But another question, hardly less important, though very little attention has been directed to it by the commentators, remains to be answered—namely, under what aspect does our Lord's priesthood more particularly correspond to the priesthood of Melchisedec? Or, in other words, Was Christ made a priest "after the order (i. e. 'the similitude') of Melchisedec" at his first advent, when he appeared to offer the one great sacrifice for sin, forever; or, will he be so constituted at his second advent, when, during his millennial reign, the regal office, heretofore as it were in abeyance, shall be exercised in conjunction with the priestly?

In one sense, it must, I think, be admitted that this Melchisedec priesthood of Christ dates from his ascension, and is now possessed by him in the heavens, at least de jure; still, it will not, I apprehend be exercised by him de facto till after he appears the second time, "without a [illegible]" like the Jewish high priest when he came forth from the most holy place, having presented the blood before the throne, to bless the people. The grounds upon which this conclusion is based are the following:

1. In the first place it seems to be indicated, not obscurely in the very language alike of the apostle and the psalmist, when literally translated. "Thou art a priest for the age (eis ton aiona) after the order of Melchisedec." Heb. vii. 21. So I would render a sentence so important and full of meaning that the apostle quotes it no less than five times, making it the basis of his lengthy argument. And the language of the 110th Psalm exactly corresponds in the Hebrew, for the learned Bennett thus renders the fourth verse: "The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, thou art a priest for the future age (alolhibharti), according to my appointment, O King of Righteousness" (Olam Hemelchamoth). So the Jewish Targum on this verse runs: "Thou hast been appointed prince of the age to come, and that for thy merits' sake, because thou art a righteous king."

But in the first three verses of this Psalm we have a description of the assumption of Christ's future kingly rule, and the question therefore is naturally suggested, Will not Christ, when he thus assumes the kingly, lay aside his present priestly office? No; the psalmist seems to say, for "the Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, thou art a priest (also) for the future age," i. e., the millennial age, of the introduction of which this whole Psalm treats. But of what character is his priesthood? "After the order of Melchisedec;" in other words, as we shall immediately see, a priesthood in conjunction with kingship. I conclude, therefore, that the Melchisedec priesthood of Christ is his millennial priesthood in contradistinction to that which he is at present exercising, which is rather the antitype of the priesthood of Aaron. A careful study of the seventh and two following chapters of the Epistle to the Hebrews, will greatly strengthen this supposition.—William Rande, in Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.

The Man, Christ Jesus.

Amid whatever changes of arts, letters, institutions, empires, one figure continues supreme in history. It is that of the man whom John baptised; whom Pilate crucified; who built no capital, led no army, wrote no volume; who seemed to the principal personages of his time to have fitly closed a restless yet obscure life in an ignoble death; but who named himself, and who is now named in all the written languages of mankind, the Son of God.

More than sixty generations of men vexed with thought, burdened with cares, and each accomplishing, wearily, or victoriously, its office in the world, have passed away since the young child lay on his mother's breast at Bethlehem. Yet they are today more numerous in the world and more influential than ever before, who turn with profoundly attentive minds, because with profoundly adoring hearts, to consider what he was, and to ponder the things which he said and which he did.

This supreme man was born to no rank and trained to no school, held himself aloof from none, and did not shrink from the touch of the sinful, sought no fame, and seemed content to strew his words on the vanishing winds. But he perfectly expressed in his crystalline character whatever all people concede most precious and today governs governments; his words are the light, his temper the model, and his life the inspiration of all that is noblest in the modern as in ancient character and thought; and from his inconspicuous advent the new ages of liberty, of progress, and of discovery, date their birth.

Only in general do we know where he tarried or wrought. Only the significant facts of his life are left on record for our instruction. For these make impressions on the soul, not the senses; and by reason of their wonderfulness they are as near and as glorious to those who look up to them from the banks of Indian or American rivers as if these had followed the winding Jordan from its sweet fountains to its salt grave, or had climbed to the crest of Tabor or of Hermon. Not so much by what they are, as by what they evidently contain and declare, do facts which confront us in the life of the Lord engage and reward the thoughts of disciples. The secret of their preciousness, the hiding of their power is in this: That through these facts are declared to us in the sharpness and fulness of personal revelation, the life, the might, the character, of the Most High; that he, whom men, as Paul declared to Athenians, they unknowingly had worshiped, is here set forth as a perfect discovery of his grace and his glory, to draw men in penitent love to himself.—Fr. R. S. Storrs.

Brevities.

A wholesale exodus of negroes to the island of Cyprus in the Mediterranean, under the Government of the British empire and populated with Turks, Greeks, Jews, and some negroes from Northern Africa, is talked of by colored people who don't like the Supreme Court's decision on the Civil Rights bill. The island is 140 miles in length, and about 30 in breadth. Two-thirds of the island is covered with a fertile soil, and it is capable of sustaining several times its present population. It lies in a semi-tropical climate, and offers many advantages to the industrious immigrant. The instigator of the Kansas exodus, known as "Old Pap," whose real name is Benjamin Singleton, has now settled in Cyprus as the next land of promise. He has made appeals to philanthroplats for assistance in his scheme.—Missouri Republican.

War preparations all along the Prussian frontier are incessant. The Germans are working on the lines of defense day and night. A number of iron-clad turret ships are being constructed. Gunboat stations on the Vistula have been increased. General Gourko began this week a fresh military inspection of the Russian lines for the defense of the Vistula. In the interviews which recently took place between Prince Bismarck and Ghasa Mukhtar Pasha at Fredericksruhe it was reported that he persuaded Mukhtar to advise the Porte that the Sultan should enter the German alliance.

A Jewish young man, 19 years old, named Solomon Schlagal, at St. Petersburg, says the Jewish Chronicle, has invented a watch which goes by electricity, and with scarcely any movement; it is cheap, and, above all, keeps correct time. Herr Chwolson, Professor of Physics at St. Petersburg, has written an article in which he says: "In its remarkable simplicity this invention can only be compared with the Jablochkoff system of electric lighting. The watch is without any springs, and consists solely of two wheels. Besides being true, they have the advantage of the second-hand moving in single momentary leaps, as is usually the case only in very costly watches, and which is of the utmost utility for astronomical observations. These watches can also set in motion a certain number of watches of the same construction, so that they all keep exact time. The invention has convinced me that watches can be used for the purpose of telegraphy." After naming several other advantages, Prof. Chwolson describes the invention as a wonder which will cause an entire revolution in the manufacture of watches. Herr Schlagal is the son of a Jewish watchmaker in Berditschow.

The Waldensian congregation in Rome, after being driven from one hired room to another, have at length erected a church of their own. The very granite from the Alpine valleys was brought to Rome for the foundations of the building; stones often pressed perhaps in the times of persecution by the bleeding, weary feet of exiled mothers and children, of trembling old men, or equally unfortunate brave and strong ones. "These gray stones," writes a correspondent, "will cry out in the chief street of Rome against the cruelty and perfidy of the popes to the Waldenses, and the history of that ancient people will be recounted with sympathy in the fortress of their persecutors."—The Presbyterian.

The Sabbath question is carefully and lengthily examined, and presented and discussed in a somewhat new light.

The work also includes the consideration of Sunday, conditional immortality, the gospel, return of the Jews, the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, punishment of the wicked, the state of the dead, the new birth, the one faith, the one hope, the image of God, nature of Christ, the name, religion, morality, Christianity, etc.

We will try to put LUTHER.

The fourth centennial of the birth of Martin Luther, on November 10, 1883, is celebrated by the British poet in the following lines:—

Martin Luther, deathless name,
Noblest on the scroll of fame!
Solitary monk that shook
All the world by God's own book;
Anti-Christ's Davidian foe,
Strong to slay Goliath low;
Thee, in thy four hundredth year,
Gladly we remember here!

How, without thy forceful mind,
Now had fared all human kind?
Curs'd and scorch'd, and clein'd by flame,
In each heart of hearth and home—
Not for thee and thy grand hour,
German light and British power,
Sweden's faith, Columbia's hope,
All were crushed beneath the Pope.

God be thank'd for this bright morn,
When Eisleben's babe was born!
For the plow miner's son
Liberty's great fight hath won,
When at Wittenberg he stood
All alone for God and good,
And his Bible flew unfurl'd
Flag of freedom to the world!

The Four Great Dispensations; or, a Prophetico-Historical View of the Work of Redemption.

"Remember the former things of old: for I am God, and there is none else; I am God, and there is none like me, declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done." Isa. xlvi. 9, 10.

In history we see the fulfillment of prophecy, and in the fulfilled and fulfilling prophecies we see a perpetual and ever lengthening chain of thrilling miracles that prove the inspiration of the Bible, and illustrate the wisdom, power and truthfulness of God. The study of prophecy, therefore, incites us to admire his wisdom, trust his promises, and dread his threats.

Looking backward to "the beginning," and forward to "the end," we call the intervening space "time." And although the history of that space may fill a vast volume, it will be but a short paragraph compared with the endless annals of eternity; a paragraph, however, of profound import, and ever to be remembered by the redeemed in their immortal and glorified state, for it will be the history of the work of redemption.

Sin and grace are the key-words of "time," so that, when past, its history may be summed up in the saying that, "where sin abounded grace did much more abound." Rom. v. 20. Along the coast of time one generation after another disappears like wrecks upon the shore, but the Almighty Father who is "from everlasting to everlasting" is able to call them into life again, saying, "Return ye children of men." Psa. xc. 2, 3. The period that I have designated as "time" is divided into four great dispensations—the patriarchal, the Mosaic, the gospel, and the millennial. Two of these are past, the third is present, and the fourth is yet to come. Perhaps it is sufficiently accurate to measure the patriarchal dispensation as extending from Eden to Sinai, the Mosaic from Sinai to Calvary, the gospel from Calvary to the second advent, and the millennial from the second advent to the eternal state.

Each dispensation is ushered in with great and special miracles; the patriarchal with the miracles of creation and of Eden; the Mosaic with the plagues on Egypt, the overthrow in the Red Sea, the deliverance of Israel and their settlement in Canaan; the gospel in the miracles of Christ and his apostles, and the overthrow of the Jewish commonwealth; the millennial in the Advent, the resurrection of the just, the destruction of human governments, and the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth. And on the great principle that "if that which was done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious" (2 Cor. iii. 11), each dispensation is succeeded by a better until the last, after which comes the perfect and eternal state.

The Greek word rendered "dispensation" is oikonomia (whence the English word economy), and signifies the management of a household or family, administration, government, method of operation. All the dispensations are of God, all tend to the same great end, and each is adapted to its particular stage of the work of redemption.

With these introductory and general remarks, let us proceed to particularly consider

THE PATRIARCHAL DISPENSATION.

Some, perhaps, might inquire, "Why was the first coming of our Savior deferred, and four thousand years allowed to pass away as a blank before he came into the world?" But those four thousand years were not a blank, for the door of mercy continually stood ajar, and the way of salvation was diligently [illegible] Jerusalem, Or period was also used Now for the pons. Yesterday ing for the river an engineer from the Turkish [illegible] governmen[illegible] Jaffa. ...ration was carried on in the following ways:

1. By promises and prophecies relating to him, the principal of which lessons were—

1. The great protevangelium or first gospel as proclaimed in Eden, when the sacrificial sufferings of Christ were prophetically described as the bruising of the serpent's head Gen. iii. 15. This promise has been called the grand charter of redemption. In a few words it comprehended the leading themes that were enlarged upon by subsequent prophecy—the sufferings and glories of Christ. 1 Pet. i. 11. And on these two great pillars of gospel truth were built the first hopes of salvation. While the sunlight of the lost Paradise was fading into night and gloom behind the black and angry clouds of a broken law, this promise, like silvery borns of light shouting up in the eastern sky, heralded the dawn of brighter scenes than those of Eden, and far happier days. This first promise of a Redeemer—a synopsis the Coming One—afforded room in the human heart for the germs of those three great essentials of religion—"faith hope, and love." Thus only did the principle of justification by faith begin to be revealed.

2. Enoch's prophesy further prepared men's minds for the coming Redeemer by briefly describing that part of his work which relates to the punishment of the wicked. "Behold the Lord came with ten thousand of his holy ones, to execute judgment upon all, and to convict all the ungodly of all their works of ungodliness which they have ungodly wrought, and of all the hard things which ungodly sinners have spoken against him." Jude 14, 15, R. V. "To him give all the prophets witness," for they "showed before the coming of the Just One." Acts. x. 43; vii. 52.

3. With still increasing light the promises to Abraham foretold that the Redeemer would be "the Son of Abraham," destined to inherit the land of Canaan, take possession of the world, and bless all nations. This was indicated in what the Lord said to Abraham, "All the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy Seed forever. . . . And thy Seed shall possess the gate of his enemies; and in thy seed shall all the nations be blessed." Gen. xiii. 15; xxii. 17, 18. We have perfect proof that Christ is the "Seed" spoken of here, for the Scripture says, "He saith not, And to seeds, as of many, but as of one, And to thy Seed, which is Christ." Gal. iii. 16. Trusting in these promises, Abraham, by the eye of faith, "saw the day of Christ and was glad," John viii. 56.

4. Jacob also aided in heralding the coming Savior, saying, "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be." Gen. xlix. 10. The promises to Abraham had shown that the Savior was to be born of the nation of Israel; and this prophecy showed more definitely still that he was to be born of the tribe of Judah, the royal tribe of that nation. "It is evident that our Lord sprang out of Juda." Heb. vii. 14.

5. Job's prophecy was another valuable patriarchal lesson of preparation. Out of the depths of affliction, with exemplary faith and patience, he exclaims, "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God." Job xix. 25, 26. This beautiful gleam of patriarchal faith, shining out from the earliest ages, points as with a finger of light to "Jesus and the resurrection." Acts xvii. 18.

II. By means of bleeding sacrifices also, which were types of the atonement on Calvary, preparation was made for the Messiah's coming.

Thus the "coat of skins" with which the Lord clothed Adam and Eve, appears to have been obtained from animals offered in sacrifice, for we read not of permission to eat flesh till after the flood. Up to that time the restriction was, "Thou shalt eat the herb of the field," but after the flood the Lord said to Noah, "Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things." Gen. ii. 28; ix. 3; Heb. ix. 22.

When "by faith" Abel offered a bleeding sacrifice, it was accepted, but Cain's offering "of the fruit of the ground" was rejected. Thus teaching the necessity of faith in the atonement, and that Abel's offering was a truer expression of that faith than Cain's.

And in the offering which Noah made of bleeding sacrifices, "the Lord smelled a sweet savor," and mercifully condescended to enter into covenant with Noah concerning the earth. How vividly did this foreshadow the peace-making sacrifice of Christ which filled heaven with its fragrance, and "by means of" which the Lord receives us into covenant mercies concerning "the eternal inheritance." Heb. ix. 5.

Abraham also, in the greatness of his faith, offered sacrifices typifying "the sufferings of Christ." Especially were those sufferings foreshadowed when Abraham "offered up his only begotten son," Isaac, who was bound for sacrifice on the wood he had borne, but rescued after being three days under sentence of death, and a ram slain in his place. Gen. xxii.; Heb. xi. 17. Surely this must remind us of what occurred near the same spot, about eighteen centuries afterward, when the Heavenly Father's only begotten and dearly beloved Son was nailed to the cross he had borne, but, without any substitute to suffer in his place, was actually slain and after three days literally raised from a literal death.

But perhaps the most vivid of all the bleeding types that pointed to the great atonement was the lamb slain at the passover that was instituted in Egypt. The Lord expressly enjoined that sacrifice, and particularly specified that not a bone thereof should be broken. It seems plainly to be in allusion to this type that Christ is called "our Passover," and "the Lamb of God," and that John quotes the words, "A bone of him shall not be broken." John i. 36; xix. 36; 1 Cor. v. 7.

Thus by a patriarchal priesthood in the first dispensation were altars built and many typical sacrifices offered as prophecies of the "one sacrifice" that Christ himself was to make. They also served to inculcate that great principle in the plan of redemption that "without shedding of blood is no remission." Heb. ix. 22.

III. By furnishing various patriarchal examples of justification by faith, preparation was made for the Savior's coming and ministry.

"By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous," Heb. xi. 4.

"By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death. For before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God." Heb. xi. 5.

"By faith Noah being warned of God of things not seen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house; by the which he condemned the world, and became heir of the righteousness which is by faith." Heb. xi. 7.

"Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness. . . . Now it was not written for his sake alone, that it was imputed to him; but for us also, to whom it shall be imputed, if we believe on him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead; who was delivered for our offenses, and raised again for our justification." Rom. iv. 3, 23–25.

IV. Also by terrible rebukes of sin, showing the guiltiness and detestableness thereof, and the need of a Savior, preparation was made for the coming of the Messiah, and for the atonement he was to make. The following are some of the more notable rebukes of this kind:

1. Adam and Eve were expelled from Paradise, and its entrance guarded by a flaming sword.

2. Cain was driven into exile, and said "My punishment is greater than I can bear."

3. In regard to Sarah the unsuspecting king Abimelech was rebuked, the Lord saying to him, "Behold thou art but a dead man." Gen. xx. 3.

4. The Antediluvians were destroyed because "through them the earth was filled with violence." Gen. vi. 13. Think of it! The mother and the babe, the young and the gay, the aged and the infirm swept away together!

5. Sodom and Gomorrah were "turned to ashes" on account of "pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness," and the resulting vices. Ezek. xvi. 49.

6. The idolatries and abominations of Egypt were rebuked by drowning its host of warriors in the Red Sea, after scourging with fearful plagues the entire land. Think of the blood, the frogs, the lice, the flies, the boils, the hail, the fire, the locusts, the darkness, the slain and mourning in every house!

And so by the approval of believers and the disapproval of evil doers it was shown that faith and holiness of life must go together, in other words, that, even "the faith"—that definite and particular faith which the Scriptures teach "is dead," unless accompanied by "the works" which the Scriptures have also specified. Therefore let us always keep one eye on "believe," and the other on "do,"—"Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ," and "whatsoever he saith unto you, do it." Acts xvi. 31; Jno. ii. 5.

V. And not only by artificial types, but also by illustrious personal types preparation was made for the coming Savior.

These were Adam and Melchisedec, the [illegible] type of [illegible] headship over the new creation, and the latter of his royal and priestly offices combined in one, as King of Salem, reigning on earth in the millennial form of the kingdom. Thus it is written that Adam "is the figure (Greek, tupon, type) of him that was to come" (Rom. v. 14), and that Christ is "made an High Priest forever after the order of Melchisedec." Heb. vi. 20.

VI. Preparation was also made for the Messiah's coming by allotting to all other nations "the boundaries of their habitations" with a reference to the land from which the gospel was to irradiate.

After mankind had been divided into nations they settled round about Palestine, leaving that land, as it were in the midst of the great encampment, to be occupied by the chosen nation that was to be instrumental in illuminating the rest. The tenth chapter of Genesis is a valuable ethnological chart of their settlements in three grand divisions corresponding to the three sons of Noah—Shem, Ham, and Japheth. The following appears to be the correct classification of the nations, based on the light that history sheds upon that chart.

Sons of Shem: Elam, whence Elamites or Persians. Asshur, whence Assyrians. Arphaxad, whence Arphaxadeans or Chaldeans. Lud, whence Lydians. Aram, whence Syrians, Armenians. Principal countries peopled by them, Assyria, Syria, Persia, Northern Arabia, Mesopotamia. Out of the latter came Abraham.

Sons of Ham: Cush, whence Ethiopians or Abyssinians. Mizraim, whence Egyptians. Phut, whence Lybians. Canaan, whence Canaanites. Principal countries peopled by them, Arabia, Egypt, north coast of Africa.

Sons of Japheth: Gomer, whence Russians, Germans, Gauls, Britons. Magog, whence Scythians. Madai, whence Medes. Javan, whence Ionians and Athenians. Tubal, whence Iberians and Albanians. Meshech, whence Muscovites. Tiras, whence Thracians, or the people of the Hellespont, now called Dardanelles. Principal countries peopled by them, Asia Minor, Armenia, Caucasus, Europe. In the expression, "By these were the isles of the Gentiles divided" (Gen. x. 5), the word translated "isles," "is rather means countries, especially those washed by the sea. In the singular it is rendered "country" in Jer. xlvii. 4.

The various migrations of mankind were not accidental, for, "the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance," and "hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitations; that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him, and find him, though he be not far from every one of us." Deut. xxxii. 8; Acts xvii. 26. And so were they, on a wonderfully grand scale, held in readiness for the time when that "gospel of the kingdom" which the Lord commanded to be preached in all the world (Matt. xxiv. 14,) should be carried to every nation "in its own language;" for he that sent the confusion of tongues at Babel, sent also the gift of tongues at Jerusalem.

VII. Preparation was also made for the Redeemer's coming by the wonderful preservation of the promises, prophecies, and sacrificial types till the appearing of him to whom they pointed, and of whom they testified. Thus, Adam lived contemporary with Methuselah 243 years, Methuselah with Shem 98 years, and Shem with Abraham 150 years. Thenceforth Abraham's family became the conservators of the faith, "To them were committed the oracles of God." Rom. iii. 2. "Thy testimonies have I taken as an heritage forever: for they are the rejoicing of my heart," Psa. cxix. 111; but if that portion of those testimonies which was given during the patriarchal age had not been preserved for us by the special providence of God, what a large fund of that heritage would be missing, and what precious links would have been lost from the chain of evidence which identifies Jesus as the Messiah, and the God of creation as the God of redemption. To the mercy, wisdom, and power of God those testimonies have been carefully guarded and transmitted to us.

Thus we perceive that during the patriarchal dispensation the first coming of Christ was being prepared for in the following seven ways, 1. By promises and prophecies; 2. By bleeding sacrifices; 3. By justification through faith; 4. By rebukes of sin; 5. By personal types; 6. By allotting the settlements of the nations; and 7. By the preservation of the Scriptures.

How many people there are at the present day in the situation of the old preacher, who stopped short in his sermon to say: "Perhaps you would like to know what my politics are?" "Well," said he, "I'm on the fence, and the mud is very deep on both sides."

Something for the Wee Ones.

ALMY MARY.

What is the matter with Lulu?
The children are saying "good night,"
The children are kneeling and praying,
All robed in their nightiest so white.
Lulu is kneeling by mamma,
Never a prayer can she say,
She knows she has spoken a falsehood,
A bad wicked falsehood today.

Now it is dark in her chamber,
Ah! she is sorely afraid;
Something she said to her sister,
When in the morning they played;
Something that was not the real,
Something that was not the true,
Now if 'twas me that had said it,
I'll tell you what I would do.

I'd get my mamma to help me
To ask the dear Lord to forgive,
Then I would not tell another
As long as on earth I should live.
No! no! I would not tell another,
No matter what happened to me,
For it says in the Bible, no liar
In God's holy city can be.

A Child's Faith.

In a town of Holland there once lived a very poor widow. One night her children asked her in vain to give them bread, for she had none. The poor woman loved the Lord and knew that he was good; so, with her little ones around her, she earnestly prayed to him for food. On rising from their knees, her eldest child, a boy about eight years of age, said softly, "Dear mother, we are told in the Holy Book that God supplied his prophet with food brought by the ravens."

"Yes, my son," the mother answered, "but that was a very long time ago."

"But, mother, what God has done once may he not do again? I will go and unclose the door to let the birds fly in." Then dear little Dirk, in simple faith, threw the door wide open, so that the light of their lamp fell on the path outside.

Soon after the burgomaster passed by, and noticing the light, paused, and thinking it very strange, he entered the cottage, and inquired why they left the door open at night.

The widow replied, smiling, "my little Dirk did it sir, that ravens might fly in to bring bread to my hungry children."

"Indeed," cried the burgomaster, "then here's a raven, my boy. Come to my home, and you shall see where bread may soon be had." So he quickly led the boy along the street to his own house, and then sent him back with food that filled his humble home with joy.

After supper little Dirk went to the open door, and looking up, he said, "Many thanks, good Lord," then shut it fast again; for though no birds had come, he knew that God had heard his mother's prayer, and sent this timely help.—Old and Young.

The Rechabites.

Where are the Rechabites now? Many hundred years have passed away since the promise was made. The people of Judah have been driven from their own land and scattered all over the earth. Where can we now find the Rechabites? How can we know that God still remembers and preserves them?

A missionary who was traveling in the East, a few years ago, has told us something about the descendents of these obedient Rechabites. This missionary was Dr. Wolff. He was himself a Jew; but he had learned to believe that the Lord Jesus Christ was the true Messiah, the Savior of the world, and he was traveling about to try and bring his Jewish brethren to believe in Jesus too.

In Mesopotamia, Dr. Wolff met with a wild-looking man, like an Arab, who was on horseback riding through the deserts. Dr. Wolff was told that this man was a Jew, so he spoke to him and asked him if he could read. He could read both Hebrew and Arabic well, and was glad to see a Bible in Hebrew, which Dr. Wolff showed him. Then the missionary asked him about his country and his people. The man took the Bible, and turning to Jeremiah 35th chapter, he pointed in a very significant manner to the story of the Rechabites. Then he told Dr. Wolff that his people lived in the deserts near Mecca in Arabia. He said, "We are descended from Jonadab, the son of Rechab. We drink no wine, and plant no vineyards; we live in tents as Jonadab commanded us. Come and see us; and you will find 60,000 still living, and you will see that this prophecy is fulfilled."

Falsehood.

"The mouth of them that speak lies shall be stopped." Psa. lxiii. 11.

I heard a boy tell a lie the other day. How I pitied him! I knew what he said was not true, and he knew that I knew it. He thought to deceive his father, but he would shortly find out the truth, and then how the poor boy's mouth would be stopped with shame and remorse! Children are often tempted to tell what is not true, perhaps oftener to do that than to do any other sin; often in order to cover up some other sin. One sin leads on to another, you know.

God abominates falsehood, and will not tolerate any form of deceit. The text is a terrible threat to all liars, and his threatenings as well as his promises are sure of being fulfilled.

I'm going to tell you a true story about how little John, who was only six years old, told a falsehood and how his mouth was stopped by it. One Sunday his father was very sick, and a council of physicians had attended him. After they had left, he called Johnnie to him, and said: "I wish you to take that paper on the stand, and run to the drug store and get the medicine written on that paper." Johnnie took the paper and went to the store, half a mile away, but, being Sunday, he found it closed. The apothecary lived a quarter of a mile further on. Instead of going on to find him at his home, Johnnie turned back, but felt guilty. On going into his father's room he saw that he was very pale and weak, with great drops of sweat on his forehead because of the pain. Oh, how sorry Johnnie was that he had not obtained the medicine. The father said: "My son has got the medicine, I hope, for I am in great pain." The boy hung his head and muttered: "No, sir; Mr. C says that he has got none." The father cast a keen glance at the trembling boy, and said: "Has got none? Is this possible? My little boy will see his father suffer great pain for want of that medicine." Johnnie went off by himself, and how bitterly he cried!

He was soon called back. The other children were standing by the bed, and he was committing the poor mother to their care, and was giving his farewell counsel. It was a sad, tearful, mourning scene. After he had spoken very tenderly to each of the six older children in turn, he called up Johnnie, the youngest. How conscience-stricken the little fellow was! How he shook with emotion, as his dying father took him by the hand, and affectionately said: "John, my dear, come and see your poor papa once more who is going to die; in a few days you will see them bury him in the ground, and you will not have your papa any more. Never forget that you have a better Father in heaven. Ask him to take care of you, love him, obey him, and always do right and speak the truth, because the eye of God is always upon you. Give your papa one more kiss, John, and now, farewell." Then he prayed for the boy soon to be "a fatherless orphan." Johnnie did not dare to look at him, he felt so guilty. He rushed sobbing as if his heart would break, and wished he could die himself. Soon they said that the father could not speak. Oh, how Johnnie wanted to go in and tell him that he had told a lie, and ask his forgiveness, but it was too late! He did creep into the room, but found the pastor there praying for the dying man. Oh, how his heart ached with anguish!

He snatched his hat, and ran to the apothecary's and got the medicine. He ran home with all his might, and ran to his father's bedside to confess the falsehood, and cried out, "Oh, here, father!" but his mouth was stopped from saying anything further. His father heard not, he was dead. All in the room were weeping. The dear, good father was dead, and the last thing the little boy said to him was a falsehood!

No wonder that this sad, sad incident made a lasting impression upon Johnnie, and made him ever after cling valiantly to the truth; and who do you suppose, children that little boy was? Doubtless you have all heard his name, for he grew up to be a great and good minister of the gospel, and wrote very much for children. He afterward declared that this one lie to his father was the turning point of his life. He was Dr. John Todd, of Pittsfield, Mass.

Children, be careful about the truth. Never yield to temptation to tell an untruth. You will often be tempted. Beware, for verily, if you speak lies your mouth will be stopped, and you covered with shame and remorse.—H. Martin Kellogg, of Greenwich, Conn., in N. Y. Observer.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

RUSSIAN PHASE OF THE EASTERN QUESTION---No. 14.

Siberian or Asiatic Russia continued. Descendants of Japheth—List further analyzed—Gomer and his family—Wisdom and purpose of Jehovah in their territorial allotments. Magog traced.

Our object in tracing these modern empires to their very distant origin in their Eastern home is to enable the reader to discern the finger of God pointing them to their origin, progress, and their work. The descendents of Gomer have been fully described since that family furnishes a key to the colonization schemes of the north. To comprehend the national localities of the Gomerites is to solve some of the most difficult problems in both sacred and profane history. Are the Germans Gomeritic in their origin? Such seem to be the views of many learned expositors. Still that ethnographical position involves many serious difficulties. 1. The Cimbri belong to the first of the three great emigrations from the East as their location in the extreme west and northwest of Europe clearly demonstrates; the Germans, Goths or Scythians are of the second emigration, they being settled in middle Europe east of the Cimmerians. That the Germans now occupy some of the countries once held by the Cimbri, is no difficulty, since they drove the first emigrants before them, occupying their lands. The Gomeritos are Japhetic, the Germans are Shemotic. Their name (German) is not ancient; these of the second emigration were great warriors rushing down upon the Roman empire from the north, hence the name given them by the Romans: Northman, Garman, German, War-man.

The position of the Germans, relative to the Russian empire would be an insuperable barrier against their forming an integral part of the Russian empire in the near future. The Germans are not in sympathy with the Russians, either in social, political or religious life. Germany belongs to the west, not to the east, nor to the north. The Gomerites are Asiatic and belong to the eastern or Siberian division of the northern empire.

Should it be admitted that the Cimmerians (Keltoi or Kimmerians) were a colony of Gomerites from Asia Minor, it does not follow, 1. That the parent stock was removed from Asia; 2. Or that the Gomeritic nations did not spread their colonies over northern Asia; or 3. That the Germans are Gomeritic; they might be called Kimmerians when occupying the country which they had wrested from the the Kimbri, or Kimmorians, as persons of all nationalities, when removing to America are called Americans since it becomes their adopted country. If the Kelts (Kimmerians) are Gomerites, they are not German. As well might we call Irish and Welch, German. Here is a vital point in the principles of ethnography or anthropology. The population of Europe is composed of the families of three distinct emigrations from different regions of Asia, speaking three distinct languages.

Let us hear the great English historian, Sharon Turner, "From the languages already remarked to have prevailed in Europe, we have clear indications of the three distinct and successive streams of population, to which we had alluded, because we find two separate families of languages to have pervaded the northern and western regions; with a third, on its eastern frontier, each family being peculiar to certain states. These three languages may be classed under the general names of the Keltic, the Gothic, and the Slavonic; and from the localities they may also be called the Kimmerian, the Scythian and the Sarmatian. Of these, the Welsh, the Gaelic, the Irish, the Cornish, the Armoric, the Manks, and the ancient Gaulish tongue, are the related languages which have proceeded from the Kimmerian or Keltic source. The Anglo-Saxon, the Francotheotise, the Mœso-gothic, and the Islandic of former times; and the present German, Suabian, Swiss, Dutch, Swedish, Danish, Norwegian, Orkneyan, English and lowland Scotch, are ramifications of the great Gothic or Scythian stock. The third genus of European languages, the ancient Sarmatian, or modern Slavonic appears in the present Polish and Russian, and in their adjacent dialects. .... The Keltic or Kimmerian is in the farthest part of the west, in the British islands and on the western shores of France. The Scythian or Gothic languages occupy the great body of the European continent, from the ocean to the Vistula, and have spread into England. In the eastern parts of Europe, most contiguous to Asia, the Sarmatian or Slavonic tongues are diffused. So that we perceive at once, that the Kimbrian or Keltic nations, to have reached the westerly position, must have first inhabited Europe; that the Scythian or Gothic tribes must have followed next, and have principally peopled it; and that the Sarmatian, or Slavonic people were the latest colonists. Other nations have entered it at more recent periods as the Huns and the Romans; and some others have established partial settlements, as the Lydians in Tuscany, the Greeks at Marseilles and in Italy, the Phenicians and Carthaginians in Spain. But the three stocks already noticed are clearly the main sources of the ancient population of the European continent in its northern and western portions."

Herodotus, the father of Grecian history, says that he learned from the Scythians themselves that the Kimmerians had occupied those countries which the Scythians occupied in his days. In the time of Herodotus, the Scythians were spread over Central Europe from the Danube towards the Baltic and the north. The Kimmerians were in Europe in the days of Homer, who was cotemporary with Solomon B. C. 1000. More than seven hundred years before Christ the Kimmerians were attacked by the Scythians. Some of the Kelts fled into Asia Minor, others went farther west and north to the German ocean. Here they lived in a dark, woody country where the sun is seldom seen, from their many lofty and spreading trees which reach into the interior as far as the Heroynian forest. The Kimmerians were a predatory and wandering nation.

It is very evident therefore that the Kimmerians and Germans were two distinct divisions of the human family, and belonged to distinct emigrations. The Kimmerians were Japhetic, the Germans belong to the family of Shem. They were anciently called Scythians (wanderers), the Goths, God's people; still later they were named German, north men, war men. The German empire has never been, neither will it ever be a part of the Russian empire. It is the clay of the metallic image, an element of the fourth monarchy, the Romano-German empire, and is the western division of the triple empire that makes war against the Son of God in the future conflict. Let us now take leave of Gomer and his sons till they rush down from the north in the army of Gog.

Some other names in the list of Japhetic worthies will now come up for examination, in order to ascertain the anthropological elements of Asiatic Russia, and obtain a more definite knowledge of the tribal mixture of Russian character. Magog is the name of another son of Japheth. The country to which his name is given will decide the location of his posterity so far as the original stock is concerned. This name also seems partly prophetic. It appears to be a compound term, formed of Ma which designates a country, and Gog the title of a class or family of monarchs, such as the Pharaohs of Egypt and the Cæsars of Rome. It is located in ancient Scythia, in the northern part of Siberia. Michaelis says that "Magog denotes those vast tracts of country to the north of India and China which the Greeks call Scythia and we Tartary." "Scythopolis (Scythian city) and Hieropolis which the Scythians took when they overcame Syria, were ever after by the Scythians called Magog." "The Arabs call the Chinese wall, Sud Yagoy et Magoy."—Newcome.

Scyth means wanderer. The Greeks therefore called all those nomadic tribes of northern Asia, Scythians, Wanderers, or as we would say, tramps. Their nomadic life gave character to the people; with their flocks and herds they moved from place to place for fresh pastures. A mountain range divided Scythia into two parts called "Scythia within Imaus (towards the southwest) and Scythia beyond Imaus, sometimes denominated Serica.

Those northern tribes often sent out colonies to the south and west and gave their names to new countries. They settled east of the Caspian Sea and along the Chinese wall, which countries are now called Independent Tartary towards the west and Chinese Tartary next to China. They sent immense colonies to the far west, who entered Europe, driving the Kimmerians before them.

Madai was the third son of Japheth. The descendents of Madai gave their name to a country called Media; hence the origin of the Medes and Persians, the second monarchy of the metallic image of Dan. ii. Madai's posterity dwell in central and northern Asia, giving variety to Russian character and a further Japhetic mixture of Russian blood.

Javan was the fourth son of Japheth. He is supposed to be the father of Greeks. Some have suggested England as the country of Javan named in Isa. lxvi. 19, "I will send those that escape of them unto the nations, (to) Tarshish, Pul, and Lud, that draw the bow, (to) Tubal, and Javan, (to) the isles afar off, that have not heard my fame, neither have seen my glory; and they shall declare my glory among the Gentiles." Again, Javan is noticed in Ezek. xxvii. 13, "Javan, Tubal and Meshech, they (were) thy (Tyre) merchants: they traded the persons of men and vessels of brass in thy markets. They of the house of Togarmah traded in thy fairs with horses and horsemen and mules." From a comparison of these passages we conclude that Javan settled somewhere between the countries occupied by Meshech and Tubal, but their colonies went farther south and west, into Greece more particularly. Javan's posterity, therefore, forms another element in Russian character, and helps to make up the sum of those anthropological mixtures so apparent in the Russian of the 19th century.

Tubal is the fifth son of Japheth. It is thought that Tobolsk in Siboria has its name from Tubal. If this be correct there is no difficulty in designating his location. His original location was probably between the Black and the Caspian Seas, not far from the country of modern Georgia. He is associated with Javan and Meshech and was in one of the original divisions of the land after the flood. His descendants form another element in Russian character.

Meshech is the sixth son of Japheth as named in the table. They are among the remotest and ruffest nations of the world. "Both the name and the associations are in favor of the identification of Meshech with the Moschi; the form of the name adopted by the LXX. and the Vul. approaches most nearly to the classical designation. The position of the Moschi in the age of Ezekiel was probably the same as is described by Herodotus, iii. 94, viz., on the borders of Cholchis, and Armenia, where a mountain chain connecting Anti-Taurus and Caucasus was named after them Moschici Montes and where was also a district named by Strabo (xi. 497–190) Moschice. In the Assyrian inscriptions the name appears in the Form of Muskai."—Dr. Wm. Smith's Dictionary of the Bible. Meshech is, consequently, a sixth element in Russian character.

Rosh. Dr. Wm. Smith says that Rosh is a Scythian tribe. Gesenius locates the tribe on the north of Taurus, and are so-called from the neighborhood to the Rho or Volga, and that in this name and tribe we have the first trace of the Russ or Russian nation." These are some of the original tribes that peopled Scythia or Asiatic Russia.

FOR LOVE'S SAKE, IN HOPE AND QUEST OF TRUTH.

I notice in THE RESTITUTION some earnestly uttered objections to the doctrine of post mortem probation—or of possible salvation to those who, having once lived, and failed of gospel faith, have joined the congregation of the dead. No one can for a moment deny the seeming antagonism of certain texts to the view of resurrectional hope and blessing to those who have died in unbelief; and especially that unbelief which transgresses against knowledge and misimproves opportunity. Yet is it not quite as consistent with lawful liberty of research, in this as in other spheres of religious inquiry, to consider how upon a closer study and exacter understanding of these Scriptures, current doctrines and beliefs may be modified? Is it not true in relation to the unconsciousness of the dead, modified interpretations of seemingly opposite Scriptures were made incumbent? And so in regard to the question of natural immortality, such passages as were supposed to imply at least that idea, were seen on closer scrutiny to be barren of evidence so imputed. We therefore, with a calmness superior to temptations to excitement, and a candor that deprecates, as it also recognizes, the disqualifying influence of prejudice, may well conclude the duty of re-examination as obligatory, as it sometimes may seem at first difficult and its necessity regrettable. Still, a God-fearing and earnest research, while happy to experience its reward of illumination, and not less gladly willing to reveal it, will be at the same time the more scrupulously anxious not to mistake as illumination that which is but illusion.

There is this great question in the beginning, whether and to what extent the penalties of unbelief are final and hopeless in their character, whether they be dispensational or changeless and endless—whether they are or not in their final intention and result reconstructive and disciplinary. There is this, that awakens gratitude, and renews in the intelligent pitying mind a new life of hope, amid all the mystery of creation, that an irreversible purpose of kindness is the motive power of God's authorship and administration of things.

To believe in love as in the supreme ascendant is a great unheartening sentiment. It sheds glory and blessing on all things. It is a kind of mental and moral resurrection. To believe that love of God as persistent, tenacious, and unconquerable, that it is linked with a will as immutable as his being, begets a gladness that naught else can produce where this faith is absent. It is the antidote for much distress, the solution of much mystery, and when rightly entertained and used a fountain of more encouragement than any faith possible to the human mind from which this conviction is dissociated.

Can it be denied that such a faith, after all, is founded on reason, and that it is in accord with the noblest instinct of being, within the sphere of our observation on the one hand, or of the grandest conception on the other? Is not God indeed in all his attributes and actions good—is he not good in his name, his operations, his character, his instinct, thought, purpose and determination? Is it not true, and do we not rejoice that it is true? Is it not a joy to vindicate his goodness? Is it not a mission worthy of the noblest powers and the highest ambition? What enterprise of man can react with benigner influence on the actor himself? What labor of life can produce a higher joy, and engender a feeling of more delightful liberty? What service can prove a sweeter remedy for discontent—or a more potent antidote to a thousand ills? And here indeed is a field of almost boundless vastness of extent. A field inviting not only in its very essential nature, but all the more because it has been so neglected, or at least so wrongly cultivated. Here is essentially and emphatically something to do for those who are fitted for so great a work. Good fortune and gladness it is for such to apprehend their duty and their opportunity.

To redeem the name and character of God from those imputations of tremendous severity, and especially from any great controlling characteristic of unexplainable action that could be called cruelty in any just sense—a character to which such imputations have been so long and so even zealously attached—this is the work before us. We understand perfectly that much, if not nearly all of this injustice, has arisen from a mistaken interpretation of Scriptures, and accordingly we recognize the need of a re-examination with the greatest fidelity and impartiality of teachableness, those declarations of penalty and judgment. Shall education or tradition, or pride of opinion, or any other impediment, forbid or prevent this work? Never can utter impartiality cease safely to be a law and habit of the mind. Never can it lay aside the spirit of honesty or detach from itself the quality of candor. Never am I to suppose that I have either inherited or wasted all truth. Never can I deny the possibility of progress in knowledge, for thereunto are we all called. And this, too, with a wholesome watchfulness against error, and a resolute objection to that variableness of mind, or aberration of life, which, however harmful, has nothing in common with a rightful growth in understanding and knowledge.

In relation to such Scriptures as are held to teach endless judgment of ruin to man (from which we choose to exclude, however, the doctrine of eternal life in misery, as too dire to be credible), we may ask attention to several suggestions. We suggest, first, that even under a garb of roughness and severity the divine heart is always the home and habitation of inconceivable pity and affection. Second, that God, with displeasure at sin, is ever yet holding and intending kindness to the sinner. Third, that God, the maker of man, knows and understands perfectly the malady as well as the demerit of sin, and that his dispensation and providence direct measures for the correction of disorders by such means as he sees fit. Fourth, that many characters may evince that apathy and depravity as to require the aspect of unusual sternness and the attitude of startling antagonism for a present purpose of restraint or correction. Fifth, that the language of menace, and especially as commonly interpreted, was especially adapted to external correction, and could not do a work of inward, moral change—that the reformation wrought by threats must be imperfect, and too often tending to professions marked by hypocrisy, and unreality—and that too painfully linked with it is a servility of fear, and a superficialness developing in transient religious courses and in indifference and formality. Sixth, that in earlier ages of the world the passionate and untutored nations—the Jews being ever chiefly and almost solely addressed—needed a certain severity suited to their traits and times. Seventh, that most especially the whole system of divine administration is built on a scheme and succession of ages, and that the penalties and menaces of penalty are at most but age-long, and limited in duration. Eighth, it is a subject for inquiry, whether we must understand a penalty as co-continuous with the age, or partaking of it and pertinent to it; as ingredient in it rather than coeval with it in its whole duration. Ninth, that penalty, without intention or power of correction, without any lots of discipline, or idea of benefit to the subject, is not to be supposed without extraordinary assurance of its certainty. Tenth, that it is impossible to believe the resources of Omnipotence exhausted, and that it is but a poor and inferior idea of divine potencies and possibilities, which sees every resource at an end in the administration of this gospel epoch.

These are but a part of the many considerations more or less immediately attached to the subject of Scripture penalties. Our refuge and rest, our triumph and glory, are not only in the greatness, but also in the greatness of the goodness of the author of our race and the controller of our destinies. Our glory and joy are in the rescue and redemption of that race, not in a mere fraction and almost minute minority, but in all its length and extent, its breadth and numerical vastness. Such a redemption is like the grace and greatness of God.

C. COLEBROOK.

HOW TO INTERPRET THE SCRIPTURES.

Does the Bible itself furnish the rules or the key to unlock its mysteries? or must we be inspired by a spirit which many of our good, pious friends think exists outside of and independent of the Word?

We would by no means misjudge in this matter, but when we hear their invocations for the Spirit's aid—for a pentecostal season which is no where in the Bible promised to be repeated; this was instituted for a specific purpose, viz., to work miracles for the confirmation of the Word. Miracles ceased with the apostles, because we have no further need of them; but we are shut up to the exclusive teaching of the Word itself.

The word and Spirit are identical. Said Christ: "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life;" "the words that I speak unto you shall judge you in the last day." The question, then, is pertinent, How and by what means can we get the Spirit's teaching on any given question or doctrine?

Many of our friends would very readily answer: By earnest prayer—by invoking the Spirit's aid. This is good, and correct as far as it goes, but does not go far enough; it lacks a very essential ingredient, viz., the study of the Word.

We read that "without faith it is impossible to please God;" but this alone is inefficient for salvation—it must be accompanied by works corresponding.

The Word and Spirit are also inseparable. The knowledge of the Word is acquired only by the study of the same. The Apostle Paul said to his son Timothy, "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing (classifying) the word of truth." 2 Tim. xi. 16.

No loose, disjointed interpretation is admissible—nothing but what will bear the closest scrutiny, and the closest test to which it is subjected, the crucible—the Word. Comparing spiritual things with spiritual, or, which is the same thing, comparing Scripture with Scripture, is one rule. See 1 Cor. xi. 13. Paul's testimony, 2 Tim. iii, 16, 17: "All Scripture given by inspiration of God is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness (right doing)." For what purpose, Paul? "That the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."

Words are the signs of ideas. It must be an insult to the Spirit to undertake to divine the meaning of the Word, (the Spirit's record), by any other test than what the etymology (which embodies the ideas) will warrant. If the words conveying certain ideas on any given subject or doctrine are wanting, the ideas are also wanting, and vice versa. Words having various significations (and there are but few, if any, which have not) and also different shades of meaning, must be determined by the context. This rule is applicable alike to the Bible and all other books. No magic power inheres in the Bible to electrify, mesmerize or permeate the human system, while it lies on the shelf unread, but to be of any avail for our salvation it must be read, studied by comparing Scripture with Scripture, for the purpose of ascertaining the mind of the Spirit, which was the province of the Bible writers to impart and unfold by the only channel by which it could be done, and last, though not least, the teaching thus learned should be implicitly obeyed.

I repeat and emphasize the ideas already enunciated, that the Bible is the only channel or medium through which the Spirit (the mind of God) is communicated, or by which we can have access to God. I know that it is often said that salvation is secured in answer to prayer. I as firmly believe that an undevout Christian would be an anomaly or a contradiction in terms, but prayer has, so to speak, its own orbit, or its own appropriate sphere of action, like all other duties which are made imperative, and which we cannot absolve ourselves from with impunity, yet it cannot supersede any other duty enjoined upon us. We might pray until doomsday, but if we should neglect to "search the Scriptures according to Christ's injunction, for (because) in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me," it follows conclusively then, on this hypothesis, that we should fail of "the eternal life" promised to those who search the Word as for hid treasures. As much as we can say as to the efficacy and the duty of prayer, and I believe all the Bible says in regard to it, yet it can impart no instruction, it is devoid of this element. We would respectfully ask our friend, Could Christ's commission be obeyed, to go into all the world (habitable) and preach the gospel (good tidings of the future kingdom) if he or they should spend all the time in prayer? If on the other hand it should be asked, Could one spend his whole time in preaching the gospel, and find any time for prayer? we answer on the authority of the Word, yes; and for proof we would cite the words of the apostle, "Pray without ceasing, and in everything give thanks." This is an ellipsis, a compound sentence—we of course are authorized to supply the ellipsis, and then it would read, "in everything give thanks without ceasing," the meaning of which is, no cessation, no intermission, continuous. No other alternative is left to us but to accept the terms of the apostle, or we must say that something is enjoined which we are unable to perform.

M. I. LEWIS.

REPROVE, REBUKE, EXHORT.

These solemn words were in the charge of Paul to Timothy. What do they mean? and are they still to be obeyed?

Timothy, was to reprove with the doctrine, rebuke with the doctrine, exhort with the doctrine. It was the truth of God's word that was to be used in convincing the world of sin. In season and out of season, it must be presented to the wrong doers, and this must be done with all long-suffering, because a time would come when sound doctrine would not be endured, when ears would be turned away from the truth and fables would be the order of the day.

Now God's charge is still the same today as it was in the time of Paul. To you, teachers, he is still saying, "Be urgent in proclaiming the word, whether it may seem to be in season or not. I am about to judge the living and the dead, and the blood of those whom you through fear or carelessness have failed to warn, will I require at your hands. Confute the fables, rebuke the sins, exhort to repentance, suffering the bad treatment that will most assuredly come upon you. Ears may be turned away, and doors may be shut against you, yet your service must be fully accomplished."

So does he speak, let us take heed that we hear and obey. It is an evil time. The "doom" that men so dread, and of which they hate to hear, is about to fall. "Oh, lost, lost world!" The daylight must soon dawn for the saved, and then no time nor place of repentance will be found for such as have learned the word of life.

We want no soft words nor falsehoods now, sin must be rebuked—no awakening will come to the church where smooth things only are proffered.

We want honest words, true words, no matter how roughly they may fall on the ear of sin. Men can only be awakened from their lethargy by a trumpet-like cry. "Repent! The kingdom of heaven is at hand!" must still be sounded in their ears as in the days of John the Baptist.

"Flee! flee from the wrath to-come!" Oh, sinner, repent! I look upon you with burdened heart and tearful eye, so many, so many of you, in "the broad road of folly!" Soon it will be too late for you, your cry will be in vain. Your cup of pleasure will be naught.

"What shall it profit to you to gain the whole, What will those give in exchange for thy soul."

Be faithful, dear teachers, watch and strengthen and make perfect your work.

Reprove, rebuke and exhort, and God will take care of the rest.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHARLTON, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Nov. 21, 1883.

WILL try to give Brother Kimsey's article, and some others that have been deferred, next week.

WHILE we are nearing the close of a year of disaster, the darker events of coming time are throwing their dismal shadows before.

IN last week's issue we intimated that we would say something more this week regarding the paper and the work in which we are engaged. In doing this, permit us to say, that the trustful relation we sustain to the truth, and the solemn obligation to disseminate it to the world, never appeared in a more striking light than at the present time. To proclaim the gospel of the kingdom of God and the required obedience of faith; to herald to the church and world that Jesus Christ will come again in person, to this earth, and that his coming is now very near; to assure mortal man that eternal life is only attainable through the Son of God, and that, at his coming, he will raise up the holy dead; and change those of his people that may be "left over" to that event as his living witnesses; to pronounce the millennial blessedness of the coming age when Israel and Judah shall be gathered back to the loved "Fatherland," when nations shall live in blissful peace and prosperity; and when all shall "know the Lord from the least to the greatest; and to publish the final regenesis when God shall make all things new; when there shall be no more death, and when evil shall finally be eliminated from God's universe, are the grand themes which we are called upon to make known in this closing era of the gospel dispensation. In no generation of the past has the church of the living God ever had a grander mission to the world than falls to the lot of God's people in this existing passing generation. For setting forth present truth, and for adequately impressing upon the minds of our hearers and readers the grandeur of the age in which we live, and the stupendous sublimity of events now immediately impending, it seems we might almost rightfully covet more exalted powers and faculties both of body and mind. It is no time now to forget the interests of a cause dear to God and to our precious Redeemer, and about which celestial intelligencies have been engrossed in investigating its wonderful symbolizations and marvellous consummations, that we may follow our selfish interests and gratifications. We are called upon to throw ourselves into this last work of the church with all the powers of our being. We are summoned to divorce ourselves from the pursuit of ease, pleasure, and worldly plans, and to sound forth the holy proclamation of truth, both in season and out of season, at the expense of personal labor and financial aid, till the final message of the Lord of hosts, in this dispensation, shall have been fully delivered to an apostate church, and a scoffing world, as well as to the household of faith.

During the past year our brethren and sisters have been doing a noble missionary work. Our paper has gone to numbers still holding their place in the leading denominations. Letters from some of these have assured us that a change has taken place in their views respecting human destiny, and the inheritance of the saints. Many, with intense abhorrance, have turned away from the Roman dogma of eternal hell-torture, as an awful stigma to impute to the character of that God whose very nature is infinite and inexpressible love. We are rejoiced to learn that many have been brought to know that eternal life is the gift of God and that this life is in his Son, instead of being inherent in man's fallen nature and that immortality is not, and never will be, the possession of any being wanting in a character of divine excellency, and that, therefore, holiness and deathlessness are inseparable, and, so far as our race is concerned, both belong to the redemptive economy. Through our free-will offering our paper has not only gone to many in our own country—among whom are many of God's worthy poor, rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom—but it has also gone, as a messenger of the glad tidings to some on other continents, and in other zones.

Appreciative responsives of thanks have come from some of these recipients, and we have been made glad to hear that gospel light is at length penetrating the darkness of the heathen world. Papers have been sent to us in mystic characters which we could not understand, but which, as we have been assured, were messengers of good news to many sitting in the very shadow of death. We have joined with our dear brethren and sisters in sending our paper to one abroad, to a friend, and to one of the poor. We still expect to employ a share of our means in making THE RESTITUTION our missionary for the coming year. And beyond doing this we expect to labor and sacrifice for its welfare. We would gladly write more but time and space forbid. Let us all awake to our solemn responsibilities. If all will not hear the words of life—if many will choose death in the error of their ways—let us strive to save some. We have no time to lose. The ages of glory are nearing, and the last opportunities of winning a crown of glory are speedily passing away. We wrap our girdle round our loins, over our gathered-up robe, for the labors of one more year, should it please God to spare our life. Hitherto the Lord has helped us. The age in which we live is wonderful. Mighty changes are just before us. The skirmishing lines of the Armageddon conflict are watching the movements of antagonizing forces. From the eminencies of prophecy we look down upon the marshalling battalions, knowing that the shock that overturns the thrones of all earthly dominion, prepares the way for enthroning the Lord of glory.

Brethren pray for us as we herald the soon-coming kingdom.

Editor Restitution:

By faith being assured of the leading of the spirit of God in the part of the day already passed, I asked the same spiritual guidance for the afternoon and arose from the mercy seat with the sweet assurance of its continuance. I took up THE RESTITUTION of Nov. 7, and my eye rested on "Nagercoil, South India." Immediately was drawn from my room to the family circle to read it to them. We were greatly entertained. Husband exclaimed "God be praised for such men!"

After reading and talking of this letter and of India, read Brother N. J. Morgan's account of his meeting. This brought the scenes of long ago to my mind when our own hearts burned in just such receptions and greetings as he there so life-like describes.

Brethren and sisters, is there anything equal to it? Our house was once the center of such entertainments. Twenty-five sisters sleeping in one room, and others scattered over the house, and thirty or more brethren going to the barn to sleep upon the new made hay. One hundred brethren and sisters taking supper on Saturday evening, and on Sunday we fed the multitude, and our house for years a meeting-house.

Enjoy these scenes, brethren and sisters, while you can, they are never to be forgotten—a foretaste of the joys to come—when

"From Afric's sunny fountains,
And from India's coral strand,"

We shall meet and greet to part no more in the presence of him who loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood, to whom be glory forever and ever. Amen.

Yours in the blessed hope.

FROM JERUSALEM.

JERUSALEM, Oct. 10, 1883.

I promised your readers a chapter on Jerusalem cooking. One object is to show them how to cook economically and at the same time enjoy a most appetising dish. The art of cooking rice is little known in America; here no article of food is so extensively used, and it is really surprising to see the various modes of preparing it. I will give a few recipes, all of which I have learned from the Arabs and natives.

Rice plain boiled.—Wash the rice free from any dust, and have ready a stew pan with boiling water. Do not wash your rice until the water is boiling. Then pour the rice into the boiling water and boil until a grain will easily mash between the thumb and finger. Then take the rice up in a cullender and drain till dry. Have some sweet butter or fresh suet ready in a pan with a little onion, salt, pepper and allspice if liked, put the rice into the boiling butter and let it remain until well saturated. This to be eaten with meat gravy in which tomato has been prepared. You will find it a most nutritious vegetable.

Another way.—Boil the rice with tomato that has been previously cooked and strained. Cook in just water enough to keep from burning and leave a nice gravy with the addition of sweet butter. The secret of cooking rice is to have each grain whole after it is done, and this can be done after a few trials.

Another way is to put the rice in a muslin bag over a kettle of boiling water, not letting the cloth touch the water, or leave the cloth open and fasten with a cover fitting tight. All kinds of meat gravies are delicious with this rice.

Cabbage marshe.—Place the leaves in hot water to make them pliable. Have ready some chopped meat, either beef or mutton. The meat must be tender and rather fat, chopped raw. Add a little rice—as the rice will swell—pepper, salt and spice. Roll the meat and rice up in the leaves, a little in each, as much as you will require, place in a stew pan with just water enough to boil tender, and you have a splendid dinner.

Stuffed cucumbers are treated in the same way after being scooped out at one end. All the inside is taken out, taking care not to injure the skin. The cucumber should be about five inches in length and straight.

More next time. I learn from the people here that a company has really started through Egypt to survey the country south of the Dead Sea for the proposed canal. The Sultan seems in favor of it. I shall send my dear friend, Mrs. Green of Ada, Mich., a sketch of Rachel's tomb which I have made upon the spot. I hope it will please her. The Democrat was received. As ever,

I regret to say that I shall be unable to attend your Conference at this time. To me this is a sad disappointment, as I have been anticipating a pleasant meeting with several brethren whom I have known in former years, as well as with many whom I have never met.

Please give my regards to Brother Reed, Brother Halstead, Brother Barnhill, Brother Dwiggins, and a share for yourself.

May the Lord bless you all, and grant you a precious meeting. I expect to come north about December 1, and I shall be happy to visit such churches as may wish my labors.

Your Brother,

THE REBELLION IN SOUDAN.

LONDON, Nov. 19.—Later account from Jeddah state that the Egyptian soldiers who were sent to Toka against the rebels fled before the enemy despite the efforts of their officers to rally them. The soldiers saw the English commander Moncrieff surrounded by insurgents defending himself with a revolver. The Egyptians lost eighty men and two officers.

THE GREAT STORM AND THE SUN-SPOTS.

When we announced last Friday morning the advent of one of the largest sun-spots of the season, something was expected in the line of violent meteorology, but not quite so much as actually came. On Friday afternoon this region was visited by something like a hurricane, which was heralded by lightning. This electric meteor was but the prelude, however. The storm on the sun was raging with tremendous fury. The changes in the form of the great spot, and those about it were rapid, and affected a vast area of the solar surface. On Sunday another electric storm swept over the great lakes accompanied with thunder, lightning, and hail in some localities. It was one of the most widely extended of all the storms that can be traced home to the sun.

Like all the electric storms, it came unheralded by the signal office. As we are informed from Chicago the shipping of Lake Michigan was wholly unprepared for it, sailing away from port with no intimation of danger from the signal stations. It is probable that the signal office could not foretell it, as it formed with startling rapidity and swept the lake. It arrived in Rochester Sunday evening. Its coming was heralded from afar by sharp flashes of lightning, while over the city the moon was shining and the sky seemed to be clearing. With a sudden puff the meteor struck the city. A little higher velocity of the wind would have leveled many buildings. At Toronto the onset was more terrific and buildings were blown to pieces. At Montreal there was the same fury. Near Watertown, Jefferson Co., a great many buildings were unroofed. The meteor roared down the Mohawk valley with the force of a tornado. The reaction from heat to cold was as quick as the coming of the storm itself. It created the cold, as do all electric storms. On the lakes the damage was very great, because there was no warning. It may be interesting to state that the great sun spot or storm centre was seen on Monday with the unassisted eye, screened by a bit of smoked glass. It will be visible a day or two longer, unless the black chasm suddenly closes.

A PORTENTOUS PROSPECT FOR EUROPE.

Disaster, both social and financial, hangs over Europe. The useless expenditure of enormous sums of money on armies and navies; the consequent impoverishment of the laboring classes, and their infection with socialistic and communistic views; and, finally, the withdrawal of the flower of the youth of Europe from industry and the demoralization wrought among them by army life, are strains upon the present social structure that must eventually crush it. Only a study of the facts which M. Neymarck, a French economist, presents in the Journal des Economistes can enable us to realize properly the extent of this danger. He points out that the nations of Europe spend annually upon their armies and navies $900,000,000; that they keep nearly 3,200,000 men under arms, and that their navies number 1,800 ships, most of them very costly. There are other burdens growing out of war that are not much less numerous. We refer to the interest on the public debts contracted during international struggles. For instance, while the annual expenses of England on her army and navy is about $142,000,000, the interest on her public debt is $150,000,000 Italy spends $52,000,000 on her army and navy and $71,000,000 on her debt. Russia spends $178,000,000 on her army and navy and $160,000,000 on her debt. Austria spends $63,000,000 on her army and navy and $113,000,000 on her debt. France spends $160,000,000 on her army and navy and $150,000,000 on her debt. During the past fifteen years the public debts of European countries have increased from $13,200,000,000 to $21,000,000,000. "The cost of Government," says the Evening Post, to which we are indebted for these figures of M. Neymarck, "has risen in ten years 50 per cent. At the present rate of progress, in fifty years, or even in twenty-five, there must be a great social or financial catastrophe of some kind, for the simple reason that the tillers of the soil, on whom these prodigious burdens rest, will not be able to stand them."

Saloons—Their Sodomitish Character Illustrated.

A TRAGEDY.

An inquest was held in Philadelphia last week upon the body of Edward Leonard. He was a man of genius and wealth, the inventor of a patent fire-extinguisher and various other machines which gave him a large income. He had lived in fine style, maintaining several servants. He went to Philadelphia from Vermont seven or eight years ago. A despatch says: "A visit to the home of the dead man, 244 South Eleventh St., revealed a strange scene of mingled misery, wretchedness and squalor. Stretched across two old chairs in the room in which he died lay the coffin containing the body of the former man of fortune. In the library adjoining his gray-haired wife was just recovering from the stupor of prolonged debauch. The house was in wretched disorder. Strewn about the floor and over the bed-clothes where the dying engineer had suffered his last delirium, were the confused relics of the five thousand-dollar library, many of the octavos torn and soiled. On the mantel stood a beautiful crystal wine-service in a cabinet expensively inlaid. It was Leonard's gift to his wife on his return from Europe two years ago." While the mother was sleeping off her debauch the undertaker's assistant had charge of the three children of the family. Leonard had become so intemperate that no servant would live in the house for any wages. The wall-paper was torn off, leaving bare patches upon the walls. Dirty crockery and glassware were scattered about. Noisome odors pervaded the place from the dirt and refuse in the cellar and rooms. What but rum could do such dreadful work? It seems almost more than a coincidence that "red rum" spelt backward gives "murder."—Christian Advocate.

DIABOLICAL.

The following editorial from the New York Herald, October 18, shows only one case of the results of drinking liquor. The state licenses men to make just such drunkards. And it makes no difference how high the fee for license is, the liquor is the same erasing agent. Every interest which is dear to God and the home demands such a traffic should cease; and surely it has been fitly described as the "gigantic crime of crimes of the nineteenth century." Here is the Herald's description of one of the many thousands of instances that fill the land:

"Stories of the degradation and brutality of men who drink a great deal of liquor are so numerous that the tenderest heart becomes more or less callous to them. Occasionally, however, there is heard or read a narrative that gives point to all that reformers have ever said about the curse of rum. Such a story we publish this morning. A man of respectable birth, a husband and father, is said not to have had a sober day in six years; his family has frequently been on the verge of starvation whenever his wife was unable to earn food, and he has, to obtain money with which to buy rum, beaten the woman whom he had sworn to love, cherish, and protect. Finally, while his wife was in the severest physical stress to which woman is subject, the drunkard, with a cruel taunt, threw himself on the bed and body of the sufferer. Within a moment or two a little stranger came into the world and died. The brutal husband has since been committed to prison for six months, but his punishment will not undo any of the harm he has inflicted on his wife and children. Compared with such a brute a murderer seems a petty offender. Sudden death would be a delightful substitute for the prolonged agony that drunkard's families endure."

JEWEL CASKET.

CHRISTIAN FRIENDSHIP.

There is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother.

We shall see the flower fade; much that we have loved shall pass away; we shall fall asleep and drop from our nerveless hands treasures most fondly held. But we shall awake, satisfied, in the presence of our Beloved to find that his love has clasped upon our hearts this brightest of earthly gems, purified and glorified with a beauty that shall grow in radiance as the ages of eternity make it more completely our own.

"Years may not chill, nor change invade, nor poverty impair
The love that grew and flourished at the the holy time of prayer."

BEAUTIES OF THE BIBLE.

Thy word was unto me the joy and rejoicing of my heart.

How often to the simple searcher after truth the blessed inner meaning breaks upon the soul with marvellous fullness! These periods of illumination are usually most frequent when some unexpected trial has befallen us, or when we are most deeply impressed with the emptiness of mere earthly things. God, in great mercy, seems to reserve rich treasures for special emergencies, thereby causing us to rejoice in the fact of his unfailing providence over us. These fresh revelations to the individual mind are sometimes like audible voices from the most holy place, the very sanctuary of God.

THE BRIGHT SIDE OF THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY.

The death of those whom we have led to Christ, and trained under our ministry to higher and nobler lives, is not a loss to us. The lawyer's work ceases when he has read his client's will; the physician's, when he has closed his patient's eyes. But we shall yet meet every impulse for good which we have started, every fruitful thought which we have suggested, every single life which we have made "more pure and fair." There are no old sermons, if sermons be what they should be. There are no forgotten prayers, that have been prayers indeed. There are no buried ministries. We shall awake, by and by, in the high festival of the ingathering,

When like the roses those Angel faces smile
Which we have loved long since, and lost awhile.

CHILDREN OF LIGHT.

He was a bright and shining light. Jno. v. 35.

"Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven," Matt. v. 13. They will see the light, and glorify not you, but your Father. Emphasis was laid upon the liberty of the light. "Let" it shine! not make it shine! There it is, shining all round us. Allow it to shine through you into the hearts of others. That is all God asks. God will do the work. But, whatever you do, don't hinder it. Don't keep it back. Don't extinguish it. Don't keep it from shining, or you endanger the steps of others, you injure your own soul. No man ought to go about with an extinguisher over his head. If we are not Christians we ought at once to admit the light. If we are Christians we ought to let the light shine.

The New Song.

"O sing unto the Lord a new song: for he hath done marvellous things." Psa. xcviii. 1.

There must be new songs on new occasions of triumph. It would have been absurd for Miriam with her timbrel to conduct the music of the daughters of Israel to some old sonnet they had learned in Egypt. Nay, an old song could not have spoken out the feelings of that generation, much less could it have served to utter a voice, the jubilant notes of which distant posterity should echo. They must have a new song while they cry the one unto the other, "Sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea."

The like had never been known before, but henceforth father to son must show forth its fame. In after times when Deborah and Barak had routed the hosts of Sisera, they did not borrow Miriam's song; but they had a new psalm for the new event. They said: "Awake, awake, Deborah; awake, awake, utter a song; arise, Barak, and lead thy captivity captive, thou son of Abinoam." In after years, at the building of the temple, or on the solemn feast days, it was ever the wont of the inspired poets of the age to cry, "O come, let us sing unto the Lord a new song." Thus the grateful notes of praise have gathered volume and augmented their compass as the ages have rolled onwards; and these as it were only the rehearsals for a grand oratorio.

What then shall be the marvellous novelty and the matchless glory of that song which shall be sung at the last upon Mount Zion, when ten thousand times ten thousand warriors of God shall surround Jesus the Conqueror, when we shall hear a voice from heaven as the voice of many waters, and like great thunders, when shall be heard the voice of harpers, harping with their harps; what shall be, I say, the strange novelty of that new song which they shall sing before the throne when the four and twenty elders and the four living creatures shall fall before God upon their faces, and worship him for ever and ever? Would that our ears could anticipate that tremendous burst of "Hallelujah! hallelujah! hallelujah! the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth!"—C. H. Spurgeon.

Sententious.

The failing streams should send us to the flowing fountain.

Care not though you may be in trouble if your rest may be in glory.

The Bible without faith is a sundial by moonlight.—Bishop Taylor.

What we ought not to do, we should never think of doing.

The bravest trophy ever man attained
Is that which o'er himself, himself hath gained.

In all unbelief there are these two things: A good opinion of one's self, and a bad opinion of God.—Dr. H. Bonar.

God's blessing follows those who learn to obey, and wrapped up in this blessing are happiness, safety, and success.

Leaves are light, and useless, and idle, and wavering, and changeable; they even dance; yet God in his wisdom has made them part of the oak. In so doing he has given us a lesson not to deny the stout-heartedness within, because we see the lightsomeness without.—Hare.

An eminent English poet, one starry night, swept the heavens by the aid of a powerful telescope. In silence he contemplated the sublime spectacle, and at length quitted, with the simple observation, "I don't think much of our county families."

Better to them with heart and hand
The rustling tide of life, than He
Unmindful on its flowery strand
Of God's occasions drifting by!
Better with naked nerve to bear
The needles of this goading air,
Than in the lap of sensual ease forego
The godlike power to do, the godlike aim to know.

Let not any one say that he cannot govern his passions, nor hinder them from breaking out and carrying him to action; for what he can do before a prince or a great man, he can do alone, or in the presence of God if he will.—Locke.

"Nothing does so establish the mind amid the railings and turbulence of present things, as both a look above them and a look beyond them—above them to the steady good hand by which they are ruled; beyond them to the sweet and beautiful end to which by that hand they will be brought.—Jeremy Taylor.

NONE TRUE.

Can he be fair that withers as a blast
Or he be strong that airy breath can cast?
Can he be wise that knows not how to live?
Or he be rich that nothing hath to give?
Can he be young that's feeble, weak, and wan?
So fair, strong, wise, so rich, so young is man,
So fair is man, that death—a parting blast—
Blasts his fair flower, and makes him earth at last!
So strong is man, that with a gasping breath
He lectures, and bequeaths his strength to death;
So wise is man, that if with death he strive,
His wisdom cannot teach him how to live!
So rich is man, that—all his debts being paid—
His wealth's the winding sheet wherein he's laid!
So young is man, that, broke with care and sorrow,
He's old enough to-day to die to-morrow.
Why beggar'st thou then, thou worm of Ate feet long!
Thou'rt neither fair, nor strong, nor wise, nor rich, nor young.

The statistics for the Universal Postal Union for the year 1881, collected and published by the International Bureau at Berne, show the relative rank of the principal Postal Union countries in respect to their internal and international postal services to have been as follows: In number of postoffices the United States ranks first, with 44,512 offices; Great Britain next, with 14,918 offices. Germany has 11,088, and France 6,158. Japan is far in advance of Russia, British India, Austria, Italy, and Spain in the number of her postoffices, having 5,094.

There are 5,207 postal money order offices in the United States, and the number of domestic orders issued in the year ending June 30 last was 8,807,856, of the value of $117,329,406. The ratio of improper payments to the total number of orders was as one is to 272,471—a good showing for careful management of a vast business.

Under the title, "The Hebrew New Testament of the British and Foreign Bible Society: a Contribution to Philology," Professor Franz Delitzsch, of Leipzig, has just published a small pamphlet, written in English, in which he gives the reader a most interesting insight into the inner history of his remarkably successful translation of the New Testament into Hebrew, which he made for the British and Foreign Bible Society. In the period of a few years five different editions of this work were called for; and it has been the means of rescuing many of the lost sheep of the house of Israel. The little pamphlet contains also, in brief form, a number of valuable exegetical and linguistic notes.

That the Lord Mayor of Dublin was threatened by the Orangemen of Londonderry when he was announced to lecture to the Irish Catholics, and that he was protected from violence by the queen's troops, are very significant incidents. It is only the hand of England that keeps a moment's peace between the Irish Catholics and the Orangemen. If the Union were dissolved, if Ireland were free from the authority of Great Britain, the first thing would be a war to the knife between these two irreconcilable factions. And the war would have but one ending. The Orangemen, though a minority, have the intelligence, the disciplined bravery, the wealth, the endurance. It is in the interest of peace that the Union should continue.

The way in which the multitudes made their filial offerings to the memory of Luther in dear old Wittenberg was very beautiful. Two thousand Protestant ministers, gathered from every land, were there. The very houses were covered with reverent visitors, who spoke many tongues. The streets and alleys and market places were crowded with guests. The aged Emperor William deputed his son, the Crown Prince "Fritz," to represent the imperial family, and so that son took with him from Berlin an immense laurel wreath and proceeding to the church in whose floor lies Luther's dust, laid the wreath upon the slab. The organ pealed out the great warrior's battle-hymn, "A strong tower is our God." The vast audience took it up, the multitude in the streets caught the notes, and the singing echoed far out beyond the walls into the surrounding country. It was a fitting tribute of the royalty of birth to the higher royalty of goodness and worth.—Pulpit Treasury.

THE CRATER OF MOUNT TACOMA.

Mount Rainier, otherwise known as Mount Tacoma, in Washington Territory, has been ascended but twice—the first time six years ago by Hazard Stevens and J. Van Trump, and the second time early last week, by Messrs. Longmire, Van Trump, Bayley and Ewing. They camped over night in the crater, amid fleecy clouds of smoke and steam. The rocks in the crater were so hot that they could not be touched without burning their hands. Of all the peaks in the Northwest, Mount Tacoma is considered the most difficult of ascent. A Washington Territory correspondent, in a recent letter to the San Francisco Chronicle, speaking on this point, says: Two persons claim to have scaled the mountain to the very summit. Notwithstanding their assertions the story is very generally discredited. It is thought no human foot has ever pressed those lofty regions of everlasting arctic rigor. The ascent is considered beyond the power of human achievement. Indians who have lived a great many years near the peak, and who ought to be personally conversant with the difficulties and perils of the ascent, affirm that it is impossible for any one to reach the top. The distance is so long, the obstacles so great, and the cold so intense, that no person, however inured to toil, hardship and exposure, could accomplish the trip and return in one day.—*Virginia City (Nev.) ## "TALITHA CUMI."

"Talitha Cumi" is a common term of endearment in the Hebrew, used by loving mothers to wake their children. The old, familiar words were what Jesus used. They seem to tell that to the glad waking which will come after the sleep of death has stolen over us these will be nothing startling." It will all feel just as natural as waking now. The old, familiar love which has blessed us here will greet us there.

I.

"Talitha Cumi!" the mother said,
As she bent o'er her darling's tiny bed;
And the baby opened her dreamy eyes,
And gazed on her mother with glad surprise.

"Talitha Cumi!" The words so dear,
And words that the little one loved to hear,
So gently the spell of her slumber broke,
And the baby smiled as the mother spoke.

II.

"Talitha Cumi!" The well known word
Of tenderest greeting the maiden heard,
As Jesus bent over the little bed,
And laid his hand on the sleeper's head.

"Talitha Cumi!" "My little lamb!"
At the gentle summons the spirit came;
And the power of death in the dust was laid
When the Savior spoke to the little maid.

III.

"Talitha Cumi!" The words of love
Will come to the sleepers from Christ above;
And the perfect love which can know no fear
Will answer with rapture the words so dear,

"Talitha Cumi!" "Arise, my child!
The way has been rough and the night been wild;
But the morning has dawned of endless day.
Rise up, my fair one, and come away!"

"Talitha Cumi!" We shall not fear,
When the death-sleep ends with the words we hear,
And the light of eternity breaks at last,
When the Savior speaks us to days gone past.

THE NEW OLD TESTAMENT.

The new revision of the Old Testament has been completed, and will soon be before the public. It is safe to predict that it will be received with far less favor than the New Testament revision, and that it will be a long time before it will come into general use. The reason for this is, that it is hardly recognizable as the same book. It is not that chapters and verses give place to orderly arrangement and proper paragraphing; not that the poems are printed as verse instead of prose. The words and meaning are so changed that one may hunt in vain for either the letter or the spirit of the old quotations, and a new vocabulary must be learned of moral and religious phrases from the patriarchs of old.

While the work of the New Testament was essentially a new revision, the work on the Old Testament is a new translation. The labor on the former was to agree upon a Greek text; to decide which of the 150,000 readings made by the many ancient manuscripts discovered of late years belonged to the original. There were comparatively few words in the Greek which were mistranslated by the Jacobite scholars. Their material, not their learning, was at fault where fault was found. The change in the New Testament is therefore less verbal than textual. If a phrase is retained, its sense remains unchanged; if the words are changed, it is merely to convey the old meaning more clearly and accurately. The revision was of the Greek first, and of the English only to conform to the changes, speaking generally.

Nothing of this is shown in the revised Old Testament. The Hebrew text used by the revisers is essentially the same that was used by the translators. There are no ancient codices known by which its errors can be corrected. The 10,000 readings of the few modern manuscripts are of little or no importance; the Septuagint has no received text for collation. Why then is it that a new translation was made? In brief, because the translation of the Hebrew Scriptures now in use was made by men unacquainted with the subtleties of the language, who blundered at every stage and step, and who were often compelled to guess at the meaning of words. From one-half to two-thirds of every commentary on the "authorized version" of the Old Testament is occupied in explaining the real meaning of passages that are mistranslated, or extracting sense from jargon.

However well the translators of King James may have been acquainted with the Greek, they knew little of Hebrew, as compared with modern scholarship. They knew all that was known, perhaps, but of the Hebrew grammar they knew nothing. Construction was by the light of nature, for the first Hebrew grammar was printed while their work was finishing. The wonder is that their work was so well done as it was; that they so often caught the spirit of the prophet or psalmist where they missed his words. But their blunders were enormous. In grammatical construction scarcely a verse was accurately rendered, while words and phrases were so often misunderstood that revision was impossible and a new translation was a necessity.

The translators had the fixed Jewish text, the Masoretic, and a few translations of it into other languages. The most notable was the (Greek) Septuagint, of which they had two copies; but neither was old, and both were imperfect and corrupt. They had the (Latin) Vulgate, which was very corrupt. And they also had the Targums. One small Hebrew lexicon and grammar, published while their work was in progress, was all the assistance they could have from philologists. They had no critical exegesis by Hebrew scholars, nothing, in fact, which a modern student considers indispensable.

The revisers have had a hundred thousand helps. Of the Septuagint, they have had two fourth-century manuscripts, the Alexandrinus and the Sinaiticus; they have had Jerome's own translation of the Old Testament; the early Syriac translations; Arabic, Ethiopic, Persian translations; contributions from all ages and lands. But a thousand times more important than all these, they have a sound critical knowledge of Hebrew; its subtleties of construction; its philology; its etymology. For two centuries thousands of scholars have been at work on it. At least one life's work has been put upon every verse of the Old Testament. The commentaries are numbered by thousands, translations by hundreds.

Many of the changes that have been made are familiar to Bible readers. Many are taught in church and Sunday school, many are now and will grate harshly on the ear. The child will miss "Joseph's coat of many colors," and will not be comforted with the "tunic with long sleeves." (The exact significance of the gift might be better yet expressed in the vernacular of today by a "long tailed coat." He will hunt in vain for the first reference to "mules," and for many a tribe and person and place. The familiar Belial has vanished utterly and his sons are not. The Gammadims, who hung their shields upon the walls, have neither a local habitation nor a name left to them. Metheg-Ammah has been blotted from the map, and Huzzah from the list of queens of Nineveh. The "artillery" (1 Sam. xx. 20) has been surrendered; the "fats" no longer overflow; the book of Jasher is not only out of print but closed forever to speculation; the vanity and self-importance are taken from the hippopotamus; the pride and supercilliousness from David; the apparently impossible is shown to be quite in accordance with the ordinary laws of nature.

A uniform spelling has been adopted for proper names—both personal and geographical—which will materially assist the reader and clear up the meaning of many passages. It will be no longer necessary to explain that Gaza and Azza, Sidon and Zidon, are the same places; that the Abia of one chapter and the Abijah of another; the Uria of one and the Urijah of another; Enos and Enosh, Jonathan and Jehonathan, Joram and Jehoram, Cainan and Kenan, Hanoch and Henoch, are the same individuals; that the Phuvah of Genesis, the Puah of Chronicles, and the Riah of Numbers, were not three persons, but only one. The Ishmeelite of the old Genesis and Chronicles is the same as the Ishmaelite spoken of everywhere else, and the Zebulonite of Judges no longer differs from the Zebulunite of Numbers.

Some proper names are marked down, and some common nouns are marked up. Rab-saris and Rab-mag (Jer. xxxix. 3) were not men but offices. The "Gammadims" were not a tribe, but only "warriors." Huzzab was not a queen, but a declaration that the fate of Nineveh "is decided;" that "the temple should melt away." Sheth (Num. xxiv. 17) is not a man, but a "tumult." He did not go up to Bajith to weep (Isa. xv. 2), but up to the "house." The wheat of Minnith and Pannag" was not the wheat of the countries. Pannag was candy, and it was in wheat, confections, honey, oil and balsam that the traffic was carried on.

On the contrary, "that was in jaw" (Judges xv. 19) becomes "that was in Lehi." "Populous" becomes Ammon (Nahum iii. 8). "The south," a tract of country. The Palestina of Isaiah xiv. and the Palestina of Joel iii. becomes Philistia, the land of the Philistines. Mount Ephraim (Joshua xxiv. 33) is the "hill country of Ephraim;" and Samuel's father was an Ephraimite, not an Ephrathite, from Ephrata. "All that work for hire are sad at heart," said Isaiah (lx. 10); but this world-wide summary of the life of the poor, which might well be taken as the key-note in the study of all local problems, is rendered by the twenty-five Jacobites, "all that make sluices and ponds for fish." The woe denounced by the same prophet upon "the nation scattered and peeled whose land the rivers have spoiled," reads now upon "the nation tall and shaven whose land the rivers divide." The men cast into the fiery furnace were bound in "their trowsers, their tunics, [a comma] and their mantles"—not in "their coats, their hosen [no comma] and their hats." One of the most noticeable of the changes is in Job's description (xl. 19–24) of the hippopotamus: "His Maker gives him his horn [sword]," says the writer, but the old version puts it, "He that made him can make his sword to approach unto him." "Behold he drinketh up a river and hasteth not; he trusteth that he can draw up Jordan" is nonsense, if not drivel. What Job said was this:

"Though a river swell he is not afraid;
Fearless though Jordan washes to his mouth."

He could swim. Isaiah has suffered more than any other by translation, and the changes that are made, particularly in the twenty-eighth chapter, transmute nonsense into sense, and darkness into light. The reader of the English text can see that two writers were engaged on this poem.

The mistakes in the meaning of single words have been the occasion of errors that would be amusing elsewhere than in sacred text. God did not command the Israelites to "borrow" from the Egyptians, but to "ask for" gifts. Huldah did not dwell in the "college" (2 Kings xxii. 14), but in the "second ward." Ruth carried her barley in a "mantle," not in a "veil." The psalmist does not "sing with the harp"—"I will play with the harp," he says. Job does not call the serpent "crooked," nor does Isaiah call it "piercing," but both "consider it fleet." Habakkuk did not denounce those who loaded themselves with "thick clay" the (masons), but those who loaded themselves with the "pledges" of the poor (the pawnbrokers), and the "shameful spewing" threatened upon the glory of Israel was "ignominy." Deborah did not praise the Lord for the "avengers" of Israel, but for the "leaders" of Israel. Abram went to the "oak," not "plain" of Moreh. Samson went to the "cleft" not "top" of the rock. "Chariots with flaming torches" are less easy to recognize than "chariots with flashing steel," and "cypress lances" are better weapons than "fir-trees." Nahum ii. 3. "Untempered mortar" is too stately a term for "whitewash," and so is "wild beasts of the island" for the ordinary "wolf." Isaiah's "satyrs" were nothing but "goats," and his "dragons" but "jackals."

Sometimes the translators caught something of the spirit though not the words. "Cushions for the knuckles" (boxing gloves), and "pillows" to all aeroholos," both imply a pad, but we know what is meant by the one, while the other needs translation. "Hunt souls to make them fly," and "hunt souls as birds," are not so very far apart in words merely. "Flagons of wine" (Hos. iii.), certainly comes from "cakes of pressed grapes," and "the brook of Egypt," (an insignificant stream bounding it on the northeast) sounds something like "the river of Egypt," the Nile.

But it is in the grammatical construction that the new version is seen to the best advantage. The old version reads (Psa. x. 4): "God is not in all his thoughts"—that is, he never thinks of God. The new version is, "All his thoughts are, There is no God"—absolutely the reverse. The omission of "to wit" in Joshua xvii. 1, also reverses the meaning. The translators rendered Psa. lv. 19: "God shall hear and afflict them, Because they have no changes, therefore they fear not God." But this is not what he said, and not what he meant. "God shall hear and answer them who have no changes, and fear not him"—to wrath, not in mercy (v. 17). David did not address the Lord as "God of my righteousness" but as "my righteous God." The goodness was God's, not David's. This misunderstanding of the possessive gave many blunders for correction: "God of my mercy," for "my merciful God;" "the throne of his holiness" for "his holy throne;" "them that rejoice in my highness" for "my proud exulters;" "ye my flock are men," for "ye men are my flock."

The verb was constantly mistranslated, the present or perfect tense being taken for the future. This changed the language often from that of loving faith and hope to dogmatic assertion. "I will cry; he will hear; the Lord will sustain me," is the language of the believer at all times. "I cried; he heard; the Lord sustained me," is a bald recital of fact without significance. Reversing the illustration, by the change from the past to the future (xxxvii. 40), the translators spoiled the whole article of faith. Since "He helped them and delivered them, he will deliver them from the wicked and save them."

In the work on the Old Testament, as well as in the New, the finest scholarship has been shown on this side of the water. For strength, the American revisers have far outweighed their British brethren. They have shown that in Bible scholarship the New World can successfully compete with the Old. From the beginning to the end of the work the American committee has been radical, brave, iconoclastic; the British committee conservative, cautious and careful. Nothing could be done to change the old reading without the consent of both committees, and the result has proven that the combination was an excellent one. Yet the spirit of the American committee is conservatism itself when compared with the wishes of many pious and trusted scholars. Many changes that they have urged have not been proposed; and the result is a work that the most timid mind may receive without fear that any change has been for the worse.

To illustrate clearly the difference between the spirit of the two committees, there is a notable example in the New Testament, a long interpolation in the fourth gospel being printed in brackets, with the marginal note that it is found in the ancient manuscripts. This the Americans wished cut out. The interpolation was palpable. But the cautious Britons would not have it. It might not belong there, but it might belong somewhere, and there was no place to put it. Its omission from the Sinaitious and Vaticanus might have been by accident. It was dear to many hearts. The proof was not positive.

Both committees agreed that the necessity for every change must be clearly and definitely proven; both agreed that every doubt must be given to the received text; both agreed that no change should be made that could be avoided; but with one the English text was absolutely human work. They used human judgment upon it. It was nothing to them, in making up their opinion, whether the writer was Isaiah or Homer. The proof of an interpolation or mistranslation of either poet was precisely the same to them, and to be determined by the same means. The British committee never entirely divested itself of the idea that the English text was a sacred one; that proof of an error was not to be shown in the same way and by the same methods employed in revising the text of Homer. Proof sufficient to change the text of any secular writer was not enough. They almost wanted a sign before they would approve.

This has kept a few trifling errors—errors that will soon be admitted by every one—still in the work. But, after all, they are not of importance, and they are marked in the American edition.—Rochester (N. Y.,) Post-Express.

Youths' Column.

A SHIPWRECK.

As a gallant ship was sinking,
On the ocean wild and wide,
At the prow, a fair young maiden
Looking to heaven, for mercy cried.

The huge ship sank slowly down,
Like some mighty beast to rest;
And the wreathing waves swept round her,
As she sank on their billowy breast.

Oh, the sweet white face of the maiden,
With its look of wild despair,
As the angry waves closed o'er her,
And covered the golden hair.

Yet again the white face gleamed
And the sweet voice faintly called,
"Jesus! Oh, help me, and save."

And then the waters covered
The face to fair and white,
And the angry waves dashed wilder,
As she sank from human sight.

Far down in the fathomless ocean,
Her form drifts to and fro,
At the will of the mighty currents,
O'er sands like drifted snow.

The sea plants are waving and reaching,
Through the waters dark and deep,
As if to clasp her in their arms,
For an everlasting sleep.

No! not forever must she rest,
In this cruel, lonely bed,
The glorious "day" will come;
The sea shall give up its dead.

[The above little poem was written by a young maiden of fifteen years.]

Elephantine Sagacity.

Every one knows that the species of brute creation to which Jumbo belongs is exceptionally intelligent, and were further proof of the fact required, it is furnished by the exploits of a couple of young elephants recently provided with a home at the St. Petersburg Zoological Gardens. The public admired and made prime favorites of them; they were fed with cakes and good things to such an extent by visitors to the gardens that their health greatly suffered, and it became necessary for their keepers to interfere. The public were requested to be less generous in their offerings, and, the request not being very generally attended to, a notice to the same effect was painted on a metal plate and affixed above the entrance of their house.

This failing to attain the object in view, and persons continuing to feed the elephants with pastry, an official was told off to call attention to the notice. The intelligent animals, observing that whenever the latter raised his hand to point to the metal plate, buns and cakes about to be given were withheld, drew their own conclusions and acted in their own interests. They set to work to demolish the notice that proved an obstacle to their enjoyment, and when their keeper looked in upon them one morning, he found it on the ground so knocked about and damaged that a new plate had to be procured, which to save it from destruction has been placed out of reach.—Family Herald.

The Jew Boy Mortara.

Now that the world is rejoicing in the liberty wrought by the Protestant reformation, it is well to recollect the despotism of Rome even down to our own times. In Harper's Magazine, for November, a paper on Sir Moses Montefiore revives the story of the Jew boy. This is it in brief:

In 1858 the celebrated Mortara case startled Christendom with a new and sombre illustration of papal potentiality.

In the family of the Jew Mortara, living at Bologne (1852) a Roman Catholic girl fourteen years old was serving as nurse. The little year-old Edgar Mortara was very sick, and the nurse, who was fond of him, thinking that if he died he would be eternally lost, confided her concern to a grocer of her acquaintance, and between them they had the little fellow secretly baptized. The boy got well, and not till six years later, in 1858, did the real tragedy begin, when the nurse, having unwisely confessed what she had done to a companion, who instantly betrayed her to a priest, was examined before the Inquisition, and the little boy was stolen by the bishop's guards and hidden in a convent at Rome. This arbitrary act and the agonized protest of the parents drew the attention of all Europe.

Twenty-one Sardinian synagogues addressed a joint request to the London Jewish Board of Deputies soliciting its interference in behalf of the family.

Sir Moses, then in his seventy-fifth year, hurried to Rome, the bearer of an earnest and strenuous memorial to the pontiff. His first efforts being blocked with the cold assertion that the Mortara case was "a closed question," he was advised to make a written appeal to the pope for a personal interview. This proved fruitless, but he obtained a long interview with Cardinal Antonelli, to whom he gave the memorial he had brought. It concluded in these words: "Your Holiness in acceding to our solicitations will be upholding the sanctity of parental rights, maintaining the claims of justice, restoring peace to an afflicted family, and securing the approbation of the good and the wise of every creed."

Cardinal Antonelli promised to lay the testimonial before the pope, but informed Sir Moses that it had been quite determined that Edgar Mortara should be educated in the Romish faith, but that when he had attained his sixteenth or seventeenth year he would be "set free to follow his own judgment."

Thus in spite of the dignity and eloquence of his personal appeal, the prestige of his successes in other humane efforts, and of the support of the French and English governments, he failed, except that public opinion, aroused and concentrated by his undertaking, pressed and protested, and the pope was made to realize that the Mortara abduction had alienated from him very much that he greatly prized.

Brevities.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Hurd, of Sandgate, Vt., recently celebrated the seventieth anniversary of their marriage. Mr. Hurd is ninety-three years old, his wife ninety, and both are in good health.

A colporteur has made a trip to Khartoum, which is far up the Nile, and found there ready purchasers for his entire stock of nearly five hundred Bibles. It was, however, a rather perilous journey, as the False Prophet's forces were committing havoc in Soudan.

Judge Hatch, of Santa Barbara, Cal., has received a swarm of bees from Jerusalem. They differ from the common honey-gatherers by being provided with a longer tongue, with which they are able to extract the sweets from many flowers and shrubs that other bees cannot reach. They are also able to fly swifter, and can remain longer on the wing, thus ranging over a wider honey district.

A vein of amber has been found near Berlin by some workmen in digging a drain. It is eight metres long, and contains pieces of amber of the size of a nut, and smaller pieces, which are covered in sand or carbonized wood. The exterior of the wood seems polished by the action of the sea waves. Some of these pieces of wood have been collected for the purpose of placing them in the Brandenburg Museum.

With the aid of a powerful steam-siren Mons. E. Pénohon has shown that the highest notes audible to the human ear have 72,000 vibrations per minute. After the limit of hearing is passed the vibrations still agitate the sensitive flame of a gas-jet. To obtain notes far above the upper limit of human hearing Mr. Francis Galton has devised a whistle blown by hydrogen gas, and he has made such an instrument 0.14 inch long and 0.04 in diameter which gives a sound of 312,000 vibrations per second.

The Interior says: The particulars which have arrived by mail of the late volcanic convulsion in the straits of Sunda show that the loss of life in that calamity has, if anything, been rather under than overestimated. Tjeringen—which, with its population of ten thousand, was engulphed in the waves, not a soul escaping—is only one of several coast towns which have totally disappeared. Where Anjer once stood there is now only a wide expanse of mud. The same is the case with Tanara, where the day after the calamity 704 corpses were found. The populations of Karang, Antoo, Kramat and Mauk were completely destroyed. The market place of the first of these places was found choked with dead bodies. At all these spots the people were drowned by the huge tidal wave, in some cases as they were running from their houses to gain the higher ground, while in other cases inmates and dwellings were swept away together. The coast of southern Sumatra could not be approached, owing to the dense masses of floating pumice stone and the danger from the new banks formed by the ashes deposited during the eruption. News reached Batavia that Telok Beton was almost entirely destroyed, and that for many miles along the beach nothing had escaped destruction. While Karatao has been swallowed up by the waves, another island near has been split into five parts, and sixteen new volcanoes have sprung up in the middle of the sea. Dead bodies were met with in all directions. The distress of those left alive was shocking, and many have since the eruption died of starvation, but help was being sent as fast as possible from Batavia. The total loss of life will never be known.

A REFORMATION HYMN.

The following hymn, by Horatius Bonar, has been set to music by Dr. E. W. Hollinger, and is issued by the Luther Commemoration Committee of London:

For the dayspring of the nations,
Of the kingdoms wide and fair!
For the rising over Europe
Of the bright and morning star!
For the blaze of heavenly sunshine,
For the hues of glorious day,
Coming up behind the shadows
Of the ages long and gray!
Blessed be God, our God, alone,
Our God, the Everlasting One,
Who spoke the word and it was done!

For the broken chains of Europe,
For the prison-doors unbarred,
For the freedom of her peoples,
By the freedom-giving Word!
For the battle bravely fought in
With the powers of hellish night,
For the scattering of the darkness,
For the victory of light!
Blessed be God, our God, alone,
Our God, the Everlasting One,
Who spoke the word and it was done!

For the sealed sleep of Europe,
For the rousing of her soul,
For the shivering of her idols,
For the ruin of their throne!
For the shouts of joyous wonder
As she looks around and sees
The fair flag of living freedom
Floating far upon the breeze!
Blessed be God, our God, alone,
Our God, the Everlasting One,
Who spoke the word and it was done!

For the rainbow-beaming promise
Of our Europe's better birth,
For the thunder song of gladness
O'er a liberated earth!
For the Book of Peace unfolded,
Lifted up, and set on high!
For the torch of truth re-lighted,
Nevermore to dim or die!
Blessed be God, our God, alone,
Our God, the Everlasting One,
Who spoke the word and it was done!

For the franchise of the conscience,
For the inner man unchained!
For the intellect ennobled,
And the soul's high birthright gained!
For the keys of heaven restored!
From the robber-hands of Rome,
For the kingdom's open gateway,
And the sinner's welcome home!
Blessed be God, our God, alone,
Our God, the everlasting One,
Who spoke the word and it was done!

For the flight of ancient spectres,
That had shaded with their gloom,
Both the castle and the cottage,
Both the cradle and the tomb;
For the hope of holy triumphs,
In the era yet to be;
For the pledge to captive millions,
Of release and jubilee!
Blessed be God, our God, alone,
Our God, the everlasting One,
Who spoke the word and it was done!

For the watchword of the prophets,
That "the just shall live by faith,"
For the church's ancient symbol,
Of the life that comes through death;
For the standard of apostles,
Raised aloft and fall unfurled,
Glad deliverance proclaiming,
To a crushed and trampled world:
Blessed be God, our God, alone,
Our God, the Everlasting One,
Who spoke the word and it was done!

For the martyr's song of triumph,
On the wheel, or scorching pyre,
For his strength of mark endurance,
On the rack, or torturing fire;
For the noble witness-bearing
To the Christ the Lamb of God,
To the one unchanging priesthood,
To the one atoning blood!
Blessed be God, our God, alone,
Our God, the Everlasting One,
Who spoke the word and it was done!

For the brave protest of Europe,
'Gainst the iron rod of Rome,
'Gainst the old Italian spoiler,
'Gainst the wolf of Christ's fold come!
For our Europe's bold confession,
Of the one true faith and Lord,
For the church's bondage broken,
And her ancient rights restored!
Blessed be God, our God, alone,
Our God, the Everlasting One,
Who spoke the word and it was done!

For the everlasting gospel,
Which in splendor has gone forth,
Like a torch upon the mountains,
Of a re-illumined earth;
For the temple flung wide open,
At whose gates the goodly train
Of the nations had been knocking,
But in vain, so long, in vain!
Blessed be God, our God, alone,
Our God, the Everlasting One,
Who spoke the word and it was done!

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—Second Series. Number 24.

LEBANON.

"His countenance is as Lebanon, excellent as the cedars." Cant. v. 15.

Lebanon was the paradise of the Hebrew poets; and it is not strange that it should have been so. For grandeur of scenery, richness of products, and beauty of climate, it is not surpassed in the world. After Egypt's marshy plains, and Sinai's naked cliffs, and the parched desert of dreary Arabia, need we wonder that when Moses looked on Lebanon—its snow-crowned peaks towering to heaven, its sides all waving with foliage—he should have thus breathed forth to God the desire of his heart: "I pray thee let me go over and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, that goodly mountain, and Lebanon"? Deut. iii. 25.

Those only can realize the luxury of shade and verdure who have traversed under an eastern sun an eastern wilderness. Solomon, in the matchless imagery of his Song, catches with all a poet's skill and with all a poet's enthusiasm the leading beauties of Lebanon. To the inhabitant of Jerusalem, parched with heat on a sultry summer's day, the heaven above his head brass, the white walls, and white rocks, and white hills around him glowing like a furnace—no fountain, river, or lake, no green meadow, no cool shade in view—what could convey to his mind a more enchanting vision than the words suggested by the scenery of these mountains—"A garden enclosed is my sister, a fountain of gardens, a well of living waters, and streams from Lebanon"? iv. 12, 15. His eye also upon the freshness of Lebanon's primeval forests, its forests of cedar, and pine, and evergreen oak, and upon the grandeur of its outline, the poet-king delineates the glory of the spouse by a single touch: "His countenance is as Lebanon." v. 15. And then again, revelling in vivid imagination in those green glades and vine-clad slopes, where the air is laden with perfume, he says of the bride, "The smell of thy garments is like the smell of Lebanon."

How often have I myself luxuriated on banks of sweet thyme, and in deep dells where the myrtle and honeysuckle give forth their odors, and in gardens where the damask rose and orange blossoms fill the air with perfumes, amid the heights of Lebanon! How often, too, after days of toil and travel over trackless wastes, without the shadow even of a great rock, my lips parched with thirst, my eye-balls burning in their sockets, when at length I climbed those mountains, and felt those soft breezes fanning my fevered brow, when I quaffed their ice-cold waters, and looked on their snowy peaks glittering under a blazing sun—how often then have I realized in their full force and meaning the prophet's words, "Will a man leave the snow of Lebanon? or shall the cold-flowing waters be forsaken?" Jer. xviii. 14.

Lebanon was ever before the eyes of the ancient Israelite. From every hill-top in Central Palestine, from the depths of the Jordan valley, from the lofty table-land of Moab and Bashan, he saw, away on the northern horizon, those beautiful pale blue peaks with their glittering crowns. And when he traversed Galilee, or went down to the shores of its lake, then Lebanon and Hermon rose in all their majesty, appearing to him as visions of Paradise. Can we wonder that prophets spake and poets sung of the "glory of Lebanon"? Isa. xxxv. 2; ix. 13.

The name Lebanon signifies "whiteness;" and it is appropriate, whether we look at the whiteness of its limestone cliffs, or the snow upon its summit. It is a singular fact that the names of the highest mountains in most countries have the same meaning. Himalaya, Alps, Mont Blanc, Ben Nevis, Snowdon, Sierra Nevada, are all "white mountains." The name Lebanon in Scripture is applied to two distinct mountain chains which run in parallel lines on opposite sides of the valley of Cœle-Syria. The western range is Lebanon proper, and in Scripture is called by no other name; the eastern is distinguished as "Lebanon towards the sun rising" (Josh. xiii. 5), and its southern peaks are known by many names—Hermon, Sirion, Amanus, etc. Among the people of the country most of the old Bible names are still used; but more commonly "Lebanon towards the sun rising," the Anti-Libanus of classic authors, is called Jebel esh-Shurky, the "Eastern mountain," while Lebanon proper is styled Jebel el-Ghurby, the "Western mountain." To Hermon is given the noble title Jebel esh-Sheikh, "Prince mountain," and it deserves it.

To the grand scenery, waving fruit, and holy and historical associations of Lebanon proper, I shall now endeavor to introduce my reader.

PHYSICAL FEATURES OF LEBANON.

The range of Lebanon is about a hundred miles long. It follows the shore of the Mediterranean, here sending out rugged roots far into the sea, and here leaving a strip of plain bordered by a pebbly strand. This plain has a famous name and a proud history of its own. It is Phœnicia, the Kingland of antiquity; and on it stood the great cities of Sidon and Tyre, the cradles of the world's commerce. Lebanon looked proudly down on those her fair daughters.

From the green meadows of Esdraelon rise, in graceful undulations, the wooded hills of Galilee. The hills of Galilee swell up into the picturesque mountains of Naphtali; and these again stretch across the sublime ravine of the Leontes, and tower into the majestic ridge of Lebanon. Commencing at an elevation of six thousand feet, this ridge increases gradually to nearly eleven thousand feet, and then terminates abruptly in the valley called by Moses the "entrance of Hamath." Num. xxxiv. 8.

The eastern declivities of Lebanon are steep and rugged; but the western are long and gradual, furrowed from top to bottom by wild ravines, and broken everywhere by white cliffs and rugged banks, and tens of thousands of terraces, which rise like stairs from the sea to the snow-wreaths. These western declivities are the "roots of Lebanon," massive, broad, and far-reaching. One can see as he wanders over them how graphic and expressive was the language of Hosea: "I will be as the dew unto Israel; he shall grow as the lily, and strike forth his roots as Lebanon." xiv. 5.

BEYROUT.

The classic Berytus, famous for its school of philosophy, and the modern Beyrout, has no place in the Bible. Yet it is now the capital of Lebanon, and the only real seaport of Syria. Western enterprise has given it an air of prosperity, while grim desolation is elsewhere brooding over the land.

The site of Beyrout is among the finest in the world. From the base of Lebanon a triangular plain juts into the sea, and round a little bay on its northern shore nestles the nucleus of the city, engirt by old walls and towers. Behind the city the ground rises with a gentle slope, and is thickly studded with villas of every graceful form which Eastern fancy, grafted on Western taste, can devise; and all embosomed in the foliage of the orange, mulberry, and palm. In spring time and summer Beyrout is beautiful. The glory of Lebanon behind, a mantle of verdure wrapped closely round it, fringed by a pearly strand; in front the boundless sea, bright and blue as the heavens that over-arch it. Such is Beyrout.—J. L. Porter.

AN APPEAL FROM ITALY.

The case of Rev. Mr. Dening, English missionary in Japan, from whom the Church Missionary Society have withdrawn their support, for his adherence to the Bible doctrine of immortality only in Christ, is known to the friends of the cause in this country. A committee has been formed in England who have assumed his support; and he still continues at his post.

Also the case of Rev. Charles Byse, of Brussels, who has recently been tried for the same "heresy," and excluded from the Evangelical synod, and whose house of worship has been taken from him and the great majority of his church and congregation, who adhere to him, has been published and commented on in several of our papers. He has rented another hall, and still continues his faithful labors with encouraging prospects. But for the present he is obliged to depend in part upon pecuniary help from abroad. Dr. Petavel, of Geneva, and Rev. Mr. White, of London, who are also interested in supporting Rev. Mr. Dening, are trying to do what they can to aid Mr. Byse in his work in Brussels.

Now comes an earnest appeal of the same sort from Italy. We ought to be thankful for the evidence we have that the truth for which we are laboring is extending and gaining adherents all over the world. But it lays upon us additional burdens and responsibilities, and gives us an opportunity of proving our faith by our works. The friends of this cause in this country are very generally pecuniarily weak, and very much scattered. No doubt we all feel that we have all, and more than we can well do, to meet the pressing demands of this cause in our own several localities in our own country. But still, we may do something out of our poverty in behalf of our common faith in other parts of the world. The formation of the committee proposed does not seem to me practical in our scattered and divided condition. But I should be very happy to be made the medium of sending such contributions as our Christian friends in different parts of this country find it in their hearts and in their power to give to our brother in Italy. It seems to me, in view of the responsibilities already assumed by our friends in England, and especially in view of the fact that this brother has hitherto been supported by an American society, that this appeal comes to us with peculiar force. The letter below, which I have translated for publication, speaks for itself, and needs no explanation. Let it be carefully read. Let us all, at least, pray for him, as he requests, and if the Lord shall dispose and enable any to send me contributions of money for him, whether large or small, I shall gladly acknowledge them and faithfully transmit as he has designated.

J. H. PETTINGELL,
710 Corinthian Avenue, Phil'a, Pa.

TORRE PELLICE, Italy, Oct. 22.

Rev. Mr. Pettingell:

In the latter part of last April I received a letter from Dr. Petavel, informing me that he had written to you concerning my position and work. But as my position was not decided and my work in the cause of conditional immortality had not been commenced, and as I was waiting to be free, I preferred to postpone writing to you.

I am a Baptist evangelist in the service of the Southern Baptist Convention of Richmond, of which society Dr. G. B. Taylor, of Rome, is the agent in Italy. After considerable correspondence with him on the subject of my new views, he asked me if I would promise to keep absolute silence in public and in my private conversation on this subject. I replied that I could not. Then he informed me of his grief and his fear that it would be an obstacle to the continuance of my relations, adding that he could not take upon himself the responsibility of either dismissing or retaining me.

Then I requested him to send all our correspondence to the committee. This he did. I asked of the committee entire liberty in my preaching. They replied that this could not be granted, in view of their position as dispensers of the funds of the Baptist Union, which would not permit them to employ their funds in support of preaching which set forth doctrines contrary to those of their church.

Thereupon I offered my resignation. Fifteen days after this my place in the Baptist chapel here was filled by another minister. Dr. Taylor came to install him. Everything passed off pleasantly, Dr. Taylor simply informed the congregation of the facts in the case, without any direct allusion to the doctrine in question. I thanked the committee and its representative. Dr. Taylor closed by saying, "I have suffered much, and still suffer on account of this rupture; but if anything could console me, it is the fact that everything has been done in the most perfect charity, and without the loss of mutual esteem and friendship."

Notwithstanding this, I remain a Baptist, and a member of this church. I frequent their meetings, and often take part in them. Meanwhile I have entered on my special work. I have rented a hall in a neighboring locality, at St. Jean Pellice, where I was a minister of an independent church from 1865–9, and where I have many friends. I opened this place of worship yesterday, Oct. 21, with a special discourse to an audience of forty persons. I hope soon to open another also at Torre Pellice, which is the chief place in the Waldoise Valleys. I am intending, also, to give lectures in the principal towns of Italy, and to lay the question before the Italian public generally.

Now I write you, dear sir, to solicit your interest in my work. My English friends will provide for the wants of myself and family through the year upon which I have entered. Dr. Petavel and other friends are assisting me in the payment of the rent of our places of meeting. But it is absolutely necessary to publish some popular tracts to make known our views among all classes of the people, both in this locality and throughout Italy. I am just now about issuing a strong brochure in reply to the accusation of "Materialism" (in the sense of infidelity). For this work Mr. White has given me 250 francs, but it will cost twice this sum. Could you, dear sir, institute a committee for the publication of French and Italian tracts, either original or translated from the English?

I speak these three languages, and could translate from the English into both of the others. You might send me tracts which you judge worthy of translation, and if they are adapted to our country I would cheerfully translate them. Our friends in England will also send me some. It is only on this condition that one can hope to do anything. Will you kindly interest yourself in this project, to form a committee, and if the effort succeeds, send your contributions to Rev. Edward White, or to Dr. Petavel, who are in correspondence with me, and who, being nearer here, could oversee the work. Hoping that we may be able to have a pleasant exchange of letters, I salute you, in Jesus Christ.

OSCAR CODORDA.

P. S.—Could you send me your work on "Immortality"? Pray for me. O. C.

The Priesthood of Melchisedec.—Its Millennial Character.—Concluded.

2. Again, the millennial character of the priesthood of Melchisedec is, it seems to me, indicated by the fact that it was after the slaughter of the Canaanitish kings that Abraham was met and blessed by Melchisedec. Now this slaughter of the four kings (four being the world number) is evidently typical of the last great conflict, in the vicinity of Jerusalem, of which Zechariah speaks. Zech. xiv. 2–5.

Thus, also, in the 110th Psalm, after the mention of the Melchisedec priesthood of the King Messiah, the Psalmist goes on to say, addressing Jehovah: "The Lord at thy right hand shall strike through kings in the day of his wrath. He shall judge among the nations: he shall fill the place with the dead bodies: he shall wound the head (the Hebrew singular), over divers countries;" "evidently referring," says Dr. De Burgh, "to the same defeat of Antichrist and his confederate but lost kings predicted in Psalm ii.—so strikingly parallel to this—and more fully in Rev. xix. 11 to the end, in connection with the second advent of Christ, in which event the type shall have a further fulfilment; for, as it is recorded that it was on the return of Abraham from the slaughter of the kings that Melchisedec, the king-priest, 'met and blessed him,' Heb. viii. 1; with Gen. xiv. 18–20, so is the true Melchisedec revealed to bless his people on the occasion of their triumph over the powers of the world, by whom, at that time, they will be oppressed and held captive."

3. But most especially and unmistakably is the millennial character of the Melchisedec priesthood proved by the fact that it is a regal priesthood. It is written, as we have seen, concerning Melchisedec, not only that he was "first (by interpretation of his name) King of Righteousness, and after that King of Salem, which is King of Peace;" but also, that he was at the same time "the priest of the most high God." Now all this is luminously descriptive of the King Messiah. For these three titles—"King of Righteousness," by interpretation of the name Melchisedec: "King of Salem," after word Jerusalem, Psa. lxxvi. 2; Gen. xiv. 18; and "King of Peace," are not titles appertaining to Christ's kingdom in the heavens, but to the future kingdom of Messiah on earth, as foretold by the prophets.

Christ will be "King of Righteousness" in those yet future days of which the Lord speaks by Jeremiah: "Behold the day is come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous branch, and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely; and this is his name whereby he shall be called, the Lord our righteousness." Jer. xxxiii. 5, 6. He will be "King of Salem," when, as the same prophet says, "They shall call Jerusalem the throne of the Lord; and all the nations shall be gathered unto it, to the name of the Lord, to Jerusalem; neither shall they walk any more after the imagination of their evil heart." iii. 17; and when, as predicted in Isa. ix., "Jehovah shall send the rod of his strength out of Zion;" and, lastly, "King of Peace," when, as the antitype of Solomon, whose name also, being interpreted, is "Peace," he shall sit upon "the throne of his father David;" and the glowing language of Isaiah shall be fulfilled: "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace." Isa. ix. 6.

But "this Melchisedec" was not only "King of Salem," but at the same time "the Priest of the most High God." And so we read concerning the King Messiah, in the sixth chapter of Zech. vs. 12, 13: "Thus speaketh the Lord of hosts, saying, Behold the man whose name is the Branch; and he shall grow up out of his place, and he shall build the temple of the Lord; even he shall build the temple of the Lord; and he shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon his throne; and he shall be a Priest upon his throne: and the counsel of peace shall be between them both." Christ is now indeed our great High Priest. Heb. viii. 1, 2.

But he is not as yet a priest upon his throne. In the coming age, however, he shall indeed be a King-Priest, after the likeness of Melchisedec, having not only pardon to bestow upon his friends, but also power to deal with his enemies; and the blessed result of this joint exercise of the priestly and kingly functions will be "peace;" "the counsel (or mystery) of peace shall be between them both;" that is, between the two offices he exercises in conjunction. In other words, that peace which was heretofore sought in vain by the separate offices of the priesthood and kingly power, (Christ, as the son of Israel, and of priestly race, the case of the Christian Church shall then at last be perfectly secured by the concurrence of the two offices in active exercise, in the one person.) For, when Christ, as the Priest-King—the antitype of Melchisedec—shall sit on the throne of his glory, the "counsel" of God shall be realized in the establishment of "peace," alike for the Church, Israel, and the world at large.

Again, a very interesting confirmation of the view advocated in this paper is afforded by our Lord's remarkable declaration to the Jews, which we find recorded in the eighth chapter of St. John's Gospel: "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it, and was glad," vs. 56. Now, by the "day" of Christ we are not, I apprehend, to understand, as is too generally done, the days of his humiliation, but the day of his glory; the same "day of Christ," in fact, which is spoken of in Phil. i. 10 and I Cor. i. 8; the "day of the Lord" in contradistinction to "man's day" (2 Pet. iii. 10; 1 Cor. iv. 3, margin). It was this later day of Christ that Abraham rejoiced to see; "and," our Lord adds emphatically, "he saw it and was glad."

But how or when did he thus see it? Here commentators are much divided in opinion. But if the expression simply means, as many suppose, no more than that he had by faith a prophetic foresight of the future glory of Christ—the second clause of the verse just repeating the first—what pertinence was there in the retort of the Jews, "Thou art not yet fifty years old, and hast thou seen Abraham?" vs. 57. "And if it mean that Abraham was then beholding, in his disembodied spirit, the incarnate Messiah, as Stier, Tholuck, Alford, etc., understand it, the words seem very unsuitable.

"Plainly it speaks of something past—he saw (eide) my day, and was glad (echare); that is, surely, while he lived." I am disposed, therefore, to understand the assertion as referring to this very meeting between Abraham and Melchisedec, and to the practical confession by the latter of his inferiority. For if we look at the preceding context of the chapter in which our Lord makes this statement, we shall see, from the 53d verse, that the question which was in controversy between Christ and the Jews was the superiority or otherwise of Abraham over himself. "Art thou greater than our father Abraham," etc. Now where in the history of Abraham, as recorded in the Bible, can we discover so striking an instance in which, on the one hand, the patriarch "saw the day of Christ," and on the other, confessed his own inferiority to him, as when he bowed himself before Melchisedec, the priest-king, "made like unto the Son of God," who, in the realization of the divine purpose, shall be, in the coming age, "a priest for the age, after the order of Melchisedec"?

But, lastly, the nature of Melchisedec's offering—if offering it was—of "bread and wine," points to the same conclusion. The apostle Paul, speaking of the Aaronic priesthood, says, "For every high priest taken from among men is ordained for men in things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins." Heb. v. 1. But in the case of Melchisedec we have the apparent anomaly of a priest without any sacrifice, save the eucharistic offering of bread and wine. Can he, then, in this aspect, be supposed to adumbrate the priesthood of him who, not by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood, entered in once for all into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us?" Heb. ix. 12.

The answer is yes, provided his millennial priesthood be typified. Christ entered the most holy place, not made with hands, even heaven itself, as the antitype of Aaron; and as such he entered as an atoning priest "not without blood." But when he comes forth again, it is not as the antitype of Aaron, but as the antitype of Melchisedec—a priest without any bleeding sacrifice whereby to make atonement, but whose offering is acceptable on the ground of a perfect and everlasting sacrifice already made. "So," says the apostle, "Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin-offering unto salvation," Heb. ix. 28.

Thus even the "bread and wine" which Melchisedec "brought forth," acquire now significance when viewed in the light of this interpretation. There is no evidence to show that they were intended merely for the purpose of refreshment; on the contrary, Abraham distinctly refuses (verse 24) that the young men had already eaten of the spoil.

It seems to follow, therefore, that the bread and wine were intended to have a mystical significance—that they were, in fact, the elements of an eucharistic offering. And, thus viewed, they again seem to point, at least indirectly, to the millennial character of Christ's Melchisedec priesthood. For as they naturally, though not perhaps designedly, direct our thoughts to the use of the identical emblems in the great Christian ordinance of the Lord's Supper, wherein "as oft as we eat the bread and drink the cup, we do show forth the Lord's death till he come," 1 Cor. xi. 26, so does that ordinance in turn remind us of the memorable words of our blessed Redeemer on the occasion of its first institution, when, having taken the cup and given thanks, he said, "I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom."

On the ground, then, of a threefold analogy (1) that our Lord as the antitype of Melchisedec is to be "a priest for the age;" (2) that it was when Abraham was returning from the slaughter of the kings that Melchisedec met and blessed him; (3) that the millennial priesthood of Christ will be one exercised in conjunction with kingship; (4) that it is probably in reference to his meeting with Melchisedec that Abraham is said to have seen Christ's day; and (5) that Melchisedec was a priest without a sacrifice, while the bread and wine which he brought forth were, as in the Lord's Supper, predictive of millennial blessings—I arrive at the conclusion that it is in his coming kingdom that Christ shall hereafter be manifested as "a priest for the age, after the order of Melchisedec."—William Maude, in Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.

CIRCULAR.

To the Students of Prophecy throughout the World:

The undersigned proposes to issue from the press, either in Chicago or in New York City, as circumstances may decide, the following works, to-wit:

I. The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. In the first division the nature of the Coming Age is fully discussed, as to its physical and moral character: 1. That the earth itself has a crowning age, in which it shall be perfectly adapted to be the residence of man in his highest type; 2. That man, in that resurrection state, will be under the endless reign of the Personal Messiah; 3. In establishing the proximity of that age, the prophecies of Ezekiel, Isaiah, Daniel, Zechariah, Christ, Paul, Peter, and the Apocalypse, are critically examined, relative to its rapid approach.

II. The second work will be devoted to the investigation of the various phases of the Eastern Question:—1. The Egyptian phase, 2. The British phase, 3. The Russian phase, 4. The Ottoman phase, 5. The Hebrew phase, 6. The American phase, 7. Lesser phases of the Eastern Question, 8. The location of each of the Great Powers in the coming contest, 9. All nations marshal under the banners of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. These powers are traced in history to the present time. All the great national issues are fully investigated.

If all that are interested in these great and most sublime topics will aid, they will be issued immediately. They will be printed and bound in a form that will do credit to the vastness of the subjects, and put to subscribers at prices quite reasonable. The books will contain about 600 large royal 8vo. pages each.

About sixty million copies of The Sun have been sent out of our establishment during the past twelve months.

If you were to paste end to end all the columns of all The Suns printed and sold last year you would get a continuous strip of interesting information, common sense, sound doctrine, and fun, long enough to reach from Printing House square to the top of Mount Coppernose in the moon, then back to Printing House square, and then three quarters of the way back to the moon again.

But The Sun is written for the inhabitants of the earth; the same style of intelligence would excite the globe twenty-seven or twenty-eight times.

If every buyer of a copy of The Sun during the past year had spent only one cent over it, and his wife or his grandfather had spent another cent, this newspaper in 1877 has afforded the human race fifty-three thousand years of steady recreation and instruction.

It is easy by simple calculations like these that you can form any idea of the circulation of the most popular of American newspapers, or of the influence of the opinions and sentiment of Abijah can you find room in it.

The Sun is, and will continue to be, a newspaper which tells the truth without fear of consequences, which gets it if it can, no matter how which the process costs, and which presents the parts of all the world's history worth of knowing, and in the most readable shape.

REFLECTIONS ON ETERNAL DESTRUCTION AND RESTORATION.

In connection with the subject discussed by your correspondent Mr. Malone, under the title, "The Fair Chance for All Theory," and feeling great sympathy with the question of Mr. Colegrove in Oct. 2nd No., "But is there no hope for any Heresiarch? Is there no resurrection to a lesser blessing?" i. e. after the aionial cutting off. Will you allow me a little space for the following reflections upon the matter of "Eternal destruction and restoration of all things"?

Scholars are divided in their opinion of the derivation of the word "aion"; some maintaining it is composed from ai, ev, always being; whilst others, with Trench, derive it from ao, aem, to breathe. Whichever it is, its primary meaning is "an age," i. e., a period of time either short or long comparatively in its duration, as 1000 years, or 2000 years, or more, or less. That it means "eternity," I readily accept, but the question arises, what does "eternity or eternal" really mean? Some say Greek writers used it in the sense of perpetual, endless, or everlasting; to this I add that English writers have continually done the same thing; but does that prove the correctness of the usage, or the true meaning of the word.

That the two words "eternal and everlasting" in the English tongue have been long and commonly used as synonymous, and in the sense of endless, I readily allow; but that such usage is a questionable one is, I think, clear, when the derivation of the words and the Scriptural usage of "eternal" are considered.

"Eternal" is of Latin origin, and derived from æternus, a contraction of æviternus, from ævum, an age; whereas "everlasting" is of Saxon origin, from æfer, "perpetual, always," in composition with "lasting." I suspect the Revisers of the New Testament have felt the force of this, if I may judge by their habit of exchanging "everlasting" in the Old version to "eternal" in the New. This action, and the derivation, therefore, are sufficient to manifest a distinction between the two words, and to show that, whilst both terms clearly refer to duration, in the one case a duration of, what I may term, unlimited character is intended, and in the other the duration, when applied to time, is limited by the very meaning of the word "an age" (ævum or aion), the noun whence the adjective is derived; for we do not commonly use an adjective to deny that which is the essential meaning of the noun whence it springs. An "age" is a period of time which may be of a longer or shorter duration, according to the particular work or dispensation to be wrought out therein. De Quincy, in an essay on this subject, says, "Doubtless the idea of an aion is in one sense always uniform, always the same, just as a tenth or a twelfth is always the same. But this uniformity of ratio or proportion does not hinder but that a tenth may now represent a guinea, and the next moment represent a thousand guineas." Thus an "age" represents different periods of time, varying in their length, as, e. g., the "age" before the flood, and the subsequent "ages," or as the "age" of any species of animal now extinct; therefore, the adjective eternal, or age-lasting, must consequently partake of the same nature. The prevailing idea is, that this period of life is time, and that the period succeeding death, or, as we would say, resurrection, is eternity; whereas the truth strictly is, that we are living in eternity, or an age-abiding time, as Paul shows in Rom. xvi. 25; 2 Tim. i. 9, Titus i. 2. (R. V.)

Professor Plumptre, in the Contemporary Review, 1878, well says respecting the word aion, "If we cannot hope that the word Aionian will be naturalized in our English speech as its only true representative, we must yet remember as we use it that it carries with it, as a word, the sense of undefined, and not of infinite, duration." It ought never, therfore, to be used in the sense of endless.

When the idea of endlessness, or everlasting, is in view, the divine author of the New Testament uses another word, which may be seen by the Greek reader in Heb. vii. 16, where it is rendered "endless," a word meaning strictly "indissoluble," or "indestructible."

I, for one, wish that our Revisers had been content always to have given the simple and exact rendering of the word which they translate, "for ever, etc.," or "never," and thus adhered to the precise meaning intended by the Spirit of God. With regard to the latter word "never," it is simply a contraction of "not ever;" and as such makes clear the meaning of John x. 28; and xi. 26.

A remarkable confirmation of the view that I here take of the meaning of "eternal" is seen in the case of the restoration of Sodom and Gomorrah. Our Lord confirms the testimony of Moses in Genesis that the inhabitants of Sodom and adjacent cities were all "destroyed" by fire from heaven, Luke xvii. 29; and Jude, moreover, states that they are "an example of eternal fire" (Jude: I quote the Revised Version margin as the more correct). Now, when we turn back to a more detailed statement concerning Sodom in "God's plan of the ages," Eph. iii. 11), and remember that all he does in the various ages is based upon love and wisdom in his great purpose of the world's redemption and education, we are informed by Ezekiel (chap. xvi. 49, 53, 55, 61), after stating wherefore such punishment was meted out to them, that an age or period of time is coming, side by side with that of Israel's restoration, when Sodom and the adjacent cities shall be restored, when her captivity by the hand of destruction and death shall be over, and when her waters shall abound, as probably they did in former times, with "fish exceeding many" as the waters of the Mediterranean; and the Savior adds to the picture the statement that her "stripes," or judgments, which evidently are given for a remedial purpose, will not be so heavy as those of the inhabitants of Capernaum, Matt. xi. 23, 24, who had seen and heard things of which Sodom had been left in ignorance, her "due time" not having come, (comp. 1 Tim. ii. 6, and Rom. xv. 21, Revised Version).

I need hardly say that in such a case, a restoration of necessity implies that the persons who had previously existed, and had been cut off or destroyed by fire for their sins, lived again and occupied that locality once more; otherwise words would cease to have their legitimate meaning; and in this particular instance, the force of the comparison between the character of Sodom's inhabitants and those of Jerusalem, in which the former will be considered as "more righteous than they" would be utterly meaningless. This instance is chosen by Jude as "an example of eternal fire." Does it not clearly illustrate in what sense "eternal punishment," "eternal or age-lasting fire," is to be taken?

I understand, of course, that meanwhile, until the resurrection, or "the restitution of all things spoken" of by all the prophets" takes place, the persons once living in these cities are not in a state of actual suffering, seeing that the dead are unconscious, Ecclesiastes ix. 5, 10, and can neither suffer nor know aught till the resurrection (an axiom clearly maintained in the word); when, as Christ showeth, "judgment" will take place.

I am aware that some strangely maintain that though cities may be restored, it does not include the inhabitants. Without stopping to argue the point that such position renders the meaning and application of the word "restitution, or restoration" defective, let me draw your readers' attention to a case in which those men of worse character than the Sodomites will be restored when their cities are restored, Ezek. xvi. 52. This case is also illustrative of that oft-quoted, though I think scarcely understood, passage in 1 Tim. ii. 4, that "God willeth all men to be saved, and come to the (thorough or full) knowledge of the truth" (the Greek is intensive). I refer to the restoration of Israel, as depicted by the dry bones in the valley of Ezekiel's vision, Ezek. xxxvii., and particularly to verses 12–14, in which the prophet writes concerning the whole house of Israel: "Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel: and ye shall know that I am Jehovah when I have opened your graves, O my people, and brought you up out of your graves, and shall put my spirit in you, and ye shall live; and I shall place you in your own land: then you shall know that I, Jehovah, have spoken and performed, saith Jehovah." Here, then, is a resurrection upon totally different principles to those upon which that unique body, the church, will be raised. The continued use of the plural "graves" forbids the thought of a mere national restoration, not composed of individuals who had formerly lived; and I cannot suppose that the readers of THE RESTITUTION would esteem it to be figurative, seeing that it is the explanation in plain terms of the preceding figure. The resurrection of the church is to be like that of its head, immortal and incorruptible (1 Cor. xv. 53, etc.): the church meets the Lord in the air, 1 Thess. iv., whilst this is a resurrection of persons known as Israel, upon another plane, and as another order or rank, 1 Cor. xv. 23, and who, like Sodom's inhabitants, return to their own land. There and then, as I understand it, they become subject to the New Covenant described in Jer. xxxi. 29, 30, when men "die for their own iniquity," and not as now, "in Adam," 1 Cor. xv. 22; Rom. v. 12, etc., and under such conditions, if dying, bringing about, I suppose, "the second death" themselves. These and similar restorations, or regenerations, reveal, I think, the true meaning of that text previously quoted in 1 Tim. ii. 4, when men will be saved from death, first, by virtue of the ransom paid by Christ to death, and then brought to a full knowledge of the truth—a process contrary, it would appear, to that characterising at present the calling out of the church from among the Gentiles, Like Esau in type, rejecting true kingship and priesthood, yet being blessed, though not with Jacob's blessing, which is first of the dew of heaven, whilst Esau's is first of earth, Gen. xxvii. 28, 29; so has it been and, I take it, shall be with Israel. Is there no deeper meaning than this commonly obtained from that touching cry of Esau? (the fleshly man), "Hast thou but one blessing, my father; bless me, me also, O my father!" Has God lavished all his blessings on the church, (the spiritual man) alone?

I take these two cases to be, as it were, samples of restitution, and they reveal that God's "kindness in the ages to come," beyond this and the millennial age, together with his work of "regeneration" and knowledge in "due time," are far more comprehensive than has been commonly supposed, as I do also the passages, Rom. v. 18 and 1 Cor. xvi. 22. Some of your readers may limit the latter, "as in Adam," etc., by its English translation, to believers, to men "in Christ;" but a comparison of the other passages, where, as in this one, the Greek article is used—"in the Christ"—Eph. i. 10, 12, 20, together with the plain fact that he is drawing both a parallel and contrast in the two heads, "the Adam and the Christ," will, I believe, convince the reader that Paul is not limiting his application of "life" to believers only, but extended it to the human race as far as the "death" has reached.

The former passage is equally comprehensive; for the principle of contrast and parallel is the same: "As through one trespass judgment came upon all men to condemnation, even so through one act of (or establishment of) righteousness, the free gift came unto all men to justification of life."

I ask, can language be found, or framed, even, more explicit upon the subject of universal restoration to life than is this and the kindred passage previously quoted? In both cases a restitution of life—a regeneration, or restoration to life, is asserted without limit. The "all" of the one parallel extends as far as the "all" of the other by all honest laws of interpretation. To run counter to such clear statements is to set rules of language at defiance. Paul does not say "eternal life" or "immortality." As I understand him at present, he means universal salvation from death, which could not be, as some have strangely supposed, only at once to recast them into "the second death," but rather, on the face of Paul's declaration (1 Tim. ii. 4), to give them an opportunity of "coming to a full knowledge of the truth," after having passed through the sphere of "many or few stripes" (Luke xii. 47, 48), and of proceeding onwards to the tree or the waters of life, to which men will then be invited by the bride and others (Rev. xxii. 17), though as far as I can see at present, such raised ones cannot come into that unique position occupied by the church as his body in being made "partakers of a divine nature" (2 Peter i. 4); for as the Head, so must the members be. To use your correspondent's (Mr. Colegrove's) language with a slight change of words, "This dispensation past, with its present possibility of a divine union with Christ lost, it will shut out forever from such imperial honor a great multitude." Much also hinges upon the meaning of the term "saved." I regard it as being often used as the equivalent of being "made whole," terms which are synonymously used in the Gospels in the typical healings by our Lord; for, as men were "saved" or "made whole" from diseases, so will they be from death. Some have (Acts xiii. 46) rejected already eternal life, and consequently are out-shut of that age-abiding life, which, to my mind, is intimately and especially connected in the promises with our Lord's reign on earth. This folly may be equally perpetrated amongst Gentiles; but, though shut out of that glory (2 Tim. ii. 10), the salvation from death which is in Christ Jesus must still extend to them according to Paul's two statements above quoted, though not before "the ages to come." In that coming age of Christ's rule, the bride, as I gather it from type (Gen. ii. 21), though at present non est, will then, when taken out from, as a part of, Christ's body, be associated with her Lord in the work of regenerating mankind, or producing a spiritual race, as the first Adam and his bride were of generating mankind, otherwise the expression, "the Lamb's wife," is nullified, since marriage is but a means to an end.

In this light I can understand the meaning of Ezekiel xviii. 2–4 and Jeremiah xxxi. 29,30, as having a wider bearing than is usually given to those words. The death there spoken of cannot mean the first death, for that is the result of being "in Adam," whether holy or sinful. "The death of him who dies which God willeth not" has a deeper meaning than would appear at first sight, and implies that, in the age to come, when thus restored to life by virtue of Christ's act of righteousness, should such persons in such conditions of past experience and immunity from Satan's temptations, refuse to follow the will of God, there is nought for such incorrigibility but "the second death, which is the lake of fire," in which I conclude the utter destruction, if there is such a thing, takes place. This harmonizes with the declaration in the epistle to the Hebrews, (Heb. x. 26, 27), "If we" (which surely includes others than Hebrews, though in that epistle the use of such pronoun is frequent), "If we sin willfully, after we have received the (full) knowledge of the truth (Ezekiel xxxvii. 13, 14,) there remaineth no more a sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful expectation of judgment, and a fierceness of fire which shall devour the adversaries." This latter subject deals with, and perhaps may help to solve the question raised by your other correspondent, Mr. C. Boardman, in Oct. 10th number, in the matter of "the sorer punishment" of Heb. x. 29. This can hardly be applied to the most desperate case of backsliding which has ever come to our notice in this present dispensation.

To sum up, I accept the statements in Ezekiel about Sodom and Israel as samples of restitution, of salvation from death, of "being made whole," combined with the exhortation "Go, and sin no more." I accept them, too, as denoting a part of what God meant when he told Abraham, "In thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." Yes, "all the families"—not merely those "in Christ," but those of whom Paul says, "They shall see to whom no tidings of him came" (Rom. xv. 21); yes, and also those who came into this world with "their teeth set on edge because their fathers ate sour grapes," with their bodies tainted with inherent sin and corruption, and who could no more help, under the circumstances by which they were surrounded, gravitating downward than the sparks can avoid flying upward. "All the families in thee and in thy Seed;" that Seed is Christ, and it includes his body (Gal. iii. 21), Abraham's seed also, for which he waits in order to act. Acts xv. 14, etc. That blessing is retrospective, and he stood in the very center of the great geographical circle of the earth when he pronounced it, and his blessed glance around surely embraced them all. And so in the ages, the eternities to come, for we, too, as I said, are jirling in "eternal times," the surpassing riches shall be seen. And when the wise purposes connected with needed evil and suffering shall have been accomplished, its day shall close, and the glad world shall know its name no more, but know and own at last the omnipotence of that truth, as "everything that hath breath doth praise him," that "God is love."

Editor Restitution:

I send you enclosed a translation from the Septuagint of Deut. xxxii. 1–44, inclusive.

As you will see, it is intended to be an "apothegm" or epitome of God's purpose as regards man as a whole, and his chosen people in particular, and in its prophetic import reaches down to the end of time. The thoughtful reader will see in it a world of meaning and to such the importance of an exact understanding of the thought of this oracular word will assert itself. To my mind it is the key to a proper understanding of the whole plan and purpose of God in relation to man, as more fully developed in detail elsewhere where throughout the inspired word.

The thoughtful reader will observe many important variations in this translation from the thoughts of the common version. For instance, the eighth and ninth verses assert the sovereignty of God distinctly, his appointment of angelic rule and about the time of this appointment, the selection of Jacob (the Jew) as God's special instrumentality for the redemption of nations, the true definition of the name Israel in its relation to the inheritance stated, and as stated harmonising perfectly with Paul's interpretation of it, etc., etc. Again in the forty-second and forty-third verses, the headship of the Christ is distinctly prophesied and the ultimate subordination of the angelic rule to him as referred to in Hebrews ii.

This thought and statement, for some unaccountable reason, seems to have been entirely ignored or perverted in the common version.

I might call the reader's attention to many other things of importance in the way of exegesis, but time and space forbid; and I trust that the word itself, when sown in the good ground of understanding hearts and minds, will bear fruit to God's glory and individual well-being to many.

CHAS. GARDNER.

THE SONG OF MOSES, DEUT. XXXII. 1–44.

1. And Moses spake in the ears of all the church the oracular words of this ode even unto an end.

2. Attend, O heavens, and I will speak, and let the earth hear oracular words from out my mouth; may my apophthegm be looked for expectantly like rain, and may my oracular words have come down like dew, as if were a shower upon the growing grass and as it were the falling snow upon a sown field.

3. Ascribe majesty unto our God, because I have named the name of the Lord.

4. God; truthful are his works, and all his ways judicial ways; a trustworthy God, and his is not injustice, a just and holy Lord.

5. Have they not sinned against him, culpable offspring, a crooked and perverse generation? 6. Is this your return unto a Lord? In this way O thou senseless and unwise royal people? Did not he, this one, thy Father, own thee, and did he not create and mold thee?

7. Recall to mind days of an age; understand years of generations unto generations. Ask thy Father and he will declare it unto thee, thine elders and they will tell thee.

8. When the Most High was distributing nations by allotment, while he was sowing the sons of Adam, he established boundaries for nations according to a number of God's angels.

9. And Jacob's royal people became a Lord's portion, Israel the measured out allotment of his inheritance.

10. He became satisfied with him in the wilderness, in the thirst of a scorching heat, in a land without water; he encompassed him, and disciplined him, and watched over him as it were a pupil of an eye.

11. As an eagle he longed to hover over his nest and over his young; spreading his wings he received them and took them up upon his back.

12. Sole Lord he led them; there was no other God with them.

13. He led them up upon the strength of the earth; he moraseled out to them products of fields. They sucked honey out of a rock, and olive-oil out of a barren rock.

14. Butter of cows and milk of sheep with the fat of lambs and of rams, yearling bullocks and he-goats with the fat of the kidneys of wheat; and wine, the blood of the grape, gave he them to drink.

15. And Jacob ate and was filled to repletion, and the Beloved kicked; he waxed smooth with fat, he became gross and enlarged; and he forsook the God who made him; and apostatized from God his Savior.

16. They provoked me with strange gods; with their abominations they embittered me.

17. They sacrificed unto demons and not unto a God, gods whom they had not known; new and recent had they come, whom their fathers had not known.

18. The God who begot thee didst thou forsake, and the God who brought thee up didst thou forget.

19. And the Lord saw and his zeal was aroused and he was provoked to wrath against his sons and daughters.

20. And he said, I will turn away my face from them, and I will show what will be theirs in last days, because a perverse generation are they, sons in whom there is no faith.

21. They provoked me to emulation with no god, they incited me to wrath with their idols; and I will provoke them to emulation with no nation, with a nation without true understanding will I incite them to wrath.

22. Because fire hath flamed out from mine anger, it will have burned down to hades below; it will devour an earth and its products; it will set on fire the foundations of mountains.

23. I will gather together calamities against them; and with my bolts will I war against them.

24. Melting away with famine and with the devouring of birds of prey will they be, and a pray to insurable hindrance: teeth of wild beasts will I send against them with the anger of those who bite upon the earth.

25. Butter of cows and milk of sheep with the fat of lambs and of rams, yearling bullocks and he-goats with the fat of the kidneys of wheat; and wine, the blood of the grape, gave he them to drink.

26. And Jacob ate and was filled to repletion, and the Beloved kicked; he waxed smooth with fat, he became gross and enlarged; and he forsook the God who made him; and apostatized from God his Savior.

27. They provoked me with strange gods; with their abominations they embittered me.

28. They sacrificed unto demons and not unto a God, gods whom they had not known; new and recent had they come, whom their fathers had not known.

29. The God who begot thee didst thou forsake, and the God who brought thee up didst thou forget.

30. And the Lord saw and his zeal was aroused and he was provoked to wrath against his sons and daughters.

31. And he said, I will turn away my face from them, and I will show what will be theirs in last days, because a perverse generation are they, sons in whom there is no faith.

32. They provoked me to emulation with no god, they incited me to wrath with their idols; and I will provoke them to emulation with no nation, with a nation without true understanding will I incite them to wrath.

33. Because fire hath flamed out from mine anger, it will have burned down to hades below; it will devour an earth and its products; it will set on fire the foundations of mountains.

34. I will gather together calamities against them; and with my bolts will I war against them.

35. Melting away with famine and with the devouring of birds of prey will they be, and a pray to insurable hindrance: teeth of wild beasts will I send against them with the anger of those who bite upon the earth.

36. Butter of cows and milk of sheep with the fat of lambs and of rams, yearling bullocks and he-goats with the fat of the kidneys of wheat; and wine, the blood of the grape, gave he them to drink.

37. And Jacob ate and was filled to repletion, and the Beloved kicked; he waxed smooth with fat, he became gross and enlarged; and he forsook the God who made him; and apostatized from God his Savior.

38. They provoked me with strange gods; with their abominations they embittered me.

39. They sacrificed unto demons and not unto a God, gods whom they had not known; new and recent had they come, whom their fathers had not known.

40. The God who begot thee didst thou forsake, and the God who brought thee up didst thou forget.

41. And the Lord saw and his zeal was aroused and he was provoked to wrath against his sons and daughters.

42. And he said, I will turn away my face from them, and I will show what will be theirs in last days, because a perverse generation are they, sons in whom there is no faith.

43. They provoked me to emulation with no god, they incited me to wrath with their idols; and I will provoke them to emulation with no nation, with a nation without true understanding will I incite them to wrath.

44. And Moses went in and spake all the words of this law in the ears of the royal people, he and Jesus (Joshua) son of Nave.

THE JEWS AND LUTHER.

An interesting feature of the recent Luther commemoration services has been the part voluntarily taken by representatives of the Jewish race and faith. Among the numerous acknowledgements from this source, of the work of the great Reformer, was a discourse in the Sinai temple at Chicago, by Rabbi E. G. Hirsch, closing with the following passage:

The Talmudical legend that the Messiah will appear after a period of social and individual depravity finds again an apt illustration in the condition of things today prevailing, in the years immediately preceding the advent of Luther. Selfishness within the church, Alexander Borgia's outrage, Leo X's refined scepticism, egotism among the ruling classes misery and moral degradation among the peasants, had reached a pass such as very seldom disgraces the pages of history. The change had to come, and it came through the man whose birthday we will commemorate the tenth day of this month—next Saturday. In him arose the prophet whose word is a mighty hammer to beat into fragments the rock of iniquity. He gathered up the separate threads of the age before him into one web, dug a new channel for the mighty waters of the past to flow on to the future.

The average stature of adult males in England is 67.80 inches, and of females 62.09 inches, showing a difference of 4.71 inches. The average weight of males is 155 pounds, and that of females 122.8 pounds, showing an excess of 32.2 pounds, or about 2½ stone, on the side of males. The difference of strength was found to be 85 pounds, the females being little more than half as strong as the males.

A little boy in one of the city German schools, while engaged in the delightful exercise of defining words, a few weeks since made a mistake which was not all a mistake. He said: "A demagogue is a vessel that holds beer, wine, gin, whisky, or any other intoxicating liquor." He was probably thinking of demijohn, but he hit the truth just the same.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Nov. 28, 1893.

THE news is becoming very important in its bearings on the "irrepressible conflict" involved in the settlement of the Eastern question. As this is really the great question of our times, we give our readers a somewhat lengthy synopsis this week, to the exclusion of other matter designed for this number.

WE have received two new books recently, of which we have only the space now to give the briefest notice. One is entitled, "New Testament Theology; Independent of and Unfettered by the Traditions of Men." By Elisha Johnson, Boston, Mass. The other is "The Law and the Covenants." By Dr. L. C. Thomas, Wyoming, Delaware. Will read and give fuller notice soon.

THE Western Rural comes weekly. Each number is filled with articles of important interest to our agricultural friends. Two numbers of another agricultural journal, The Farmer's Review, have also come to hand. These are creditable numbers; one especially so from its cuts and descriptions of animals exhibited at the late exposition in Chicago.

By direction of the Directors of the Publication Association, I thank all who contributed to the Free-will offering during the year that has just closed. You do not, and never will, know, until the great day of final account, the amount of good that has been accomplished by these offerings to the Lord. The paper is out of debt, and closes the year with less than ten dollars in the treasury. But the support of the paper is the smallest item in the account. The papers that have been sent out by these contributions have gone, as silent but effective missionaries, not only into the homes of many dear ones in the United States, but they have been welcome messengers to the Israelites of families in Jerusalem, in India, and many other countries. You have done well; but let us each resolve that in the coming year we will do a little better than we did in the past, and have a little larger credit on the books of the Lord at its close. It is a safe investment. If by investing five or ten dollars in this manner we can lead one soul to Christ, and thereby add a star to our crown, the money will certainly be well spent.

R. S. DWIGGINS, Pres.

MISSIONARY FUND.

We, as a people, have never had any system for missionary work. It is very desirable that a plan be adopted through which all can contribute to both home and foreign missionary work. To this end, the Publication Association has concluded to establish a missionary fund, to which all may contribute. The plan is this. Any one can send to THE RESTITUTION such amount as they may desire to contribute, and have the paper sent to such person or persons as they may name. Or they can send the money and leave Brother Chaplin to use it in sending the papers to such persons as he may think best. The Free-Will offerings sent out many missionaries, in the shape of RESTITUTIONS. These missionaries went into the families of persons who were hungry for the truths of the glorious gospel, and I have no doubt will be as bread cast upon the waters. When we sit down at our firesides, with our families gathered around, and take up THE RESTITUTION and read the encouraging reports from brethren residing in different parts of the world, the glorious promises made by God to his children, the signs of the times indicating the near approach of the time when our dear Redeemer will return again to this earth, bringing with him the reward of the saints, do we not feel that we would like to be the instrument of gladdening the hearts of others by putting THE RESTITUTION into their hands that they might read and understand these beautiful truths, and learn the road that leads to everlasting life, that the angels in heaven may rejoice over one more sinner who hath repented, and another star added to our crown?

This is not a vain undertaking. We know that every dollar spent will bring in, some thirty, some sixty, and some an hundred fold. It is more blessed to give than to receive.

Oh! let us remember the words of Christ, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

How we admire Paul's efforts to convert King Agrippa! There are millions of souls in the world just as valuable as Agrippa and who would more readily accept and obey the truth. Then let us work while it is day, for the night cometh wherein no man can work. Our time is short, and what we do must be done quickly. Do not put it off until next year or next month. We may never see next year. Now is the accepted time. The harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few.

The Little Messenger of Love.

'Twas a little sermon preached to me
By a sweet, unconscious child—
A baby girl scarce four years old,
With blue eyes soft and mild.
It happened on a rainy day:
I, seated in a car,
Was thinking, as I neared my home,
Of the continual jar
And discord that pervade the air
Of busy city life,
Each caring but for "number one,"
Self-gain provoking strife,
The gloomy weather seemed to cast
On every face a shade,
But on one countenance were blent
By sorrow deeply laid.
With low-bowed head and hands clasped close,
She sat, so poor and old,
Nor seemed to heed the scornful glance
From eyes unkind and cold.
I looked again. O, sweet indeed
The sight that met my eyes!
Sitting upon her mother's lap,
With baby face so wise,
Was a wee child with sunny curls,
Blue eyes, and dimpled chin,
And a young, pure and loving heart
Unstained as yet by sin.
Upon the woman poor and old
Her eyes in wonder fell,
Till wonder changed to pitying love
Her thoughts, oh, who could tell!
Her tidy hands four cents held;
She looked them o'er and o'er,
Then stepping but the largest one,
She struggled to the floor.
Across the swaying car she went
Straight to the woman's side,
And putting in the wrinkled hand
The coin, she ran to hide
Her little face in mother's lap
Fearing she had done wrong.
Not knowing, baby as she was,
That she had helped along
The up-hill road of life a soul
Unat down, discouraged quite,
As on the woman's face there broke
A flood of joyous light.

Dear little child! she was indeed
A messenger of love
Sent to that lonely woman's heart
From the great Heart above.
This world would be a different place
Were each to give to those Whose hearts are sad, as much of joy
As sent with baby's rose.

A True Gentleman.

There is a whole sermon on manners in the following from the Youth's Companion.

A few years ago a young man fashionably dressed took his seat at the table of the Girard House, in Philadelphia. There was an air of self-conscious superiority in the youth which attracted general attention. He read the menu with smothered disgust, gave his orders with a tone of lofty condescension, and, when his neighbor civilly handed him the pepper-box, stared at him for his presumption as though he had tendered him an insult. In short, a person of the blood could not have regarded a mob of serfs with more arrogant hauteur than did this lad the respectable travellers about him.

Presently a tall, powerfully built old man entered the room, and seated himself at one end of the larger tables. He was plainly dressed, his language was markedly simple, he entered into conversation with his neighbor, who happened to be a poor tradesman, and occasionally during his dinner exchanged ideas with a little lady of five summers who sat beside him. The colored servants spoke to him as an old friend. "How is your rheumatism, John?" he said to one, and remembered that another had lately lost a son.

"Who is that old-fashioned gentleman?" asked a curious traveler of the steward.

"Oh, that is Judge Jere Black, the greatest jurist in the country!" was the enthusiastic reply.

"And the young aristocrat? He surely is somebody of note."

"He is a drummer who sells fancy soaps."

Judge Jeremiah Black, who has just died, was noted and feared in public life for the massive force of his intellect. "Every blow kills!" said a listener to one of his arguments. On the other side, an old farmer who wrote of him, "We shall never have another man so pure, kindly and simple among us."

The boys could find much to study in the massive nature of this old man with his powerful brain, his simple, direct manner, and his unfaltering childlike faith in God. With his last breath he took his aged wife by the hand, and saying, "Lord, take care of Mary," so died.

Drifting.

It is easy to drift in the current of the stream when wind and tide join with the natural flow of the river to bear one on. To seize the oars and force one's way against wind and current and tide, is quite another thing. Anybody can drift; only he who has muscle and nerve and skill and purpose can row up stream. The one is nothing, the other is everything. Such is life, such is human character. A man finds it very easy to go with the crowd, to do as the multitude does, especially when there is an air of jollity and good fellowship with it. To resolutely set one's face against the blandishments of the world, to deny its lusts and ambitions, and to hold one's course steadily onward and upward against the course of the throng, this it is that tries the strength of manhood. In these contrasts are the secret springs of all life. Scest thou the profane, lawless, drunken reveler? Be assured he came not to his present condition by any single act, nor yet by any deliberate purpose to become what he is. It required only the absence of all purpose for the favorable laws of things to fix his destiny. The young man did not plan to be a bad man, nor did he plan to be a good man. Just there was the trouble, he had no care for anything. He simply drifted. The saddest part of this whole business is that the longer one drifts the easier it is to drift; the more formidable seem the obstacles which must be overcome in order to go the other way, the more nerveless becomes the hand, which in the beginning might have changed all this course of life, and the more purposeless the heart to resist evil; until he who had in his youth the promise of a noble, true manhood, drifts a boneless, nerveless mass of useless material into helpless, hopeless ruin. He still exists, but who asks or expects anything of him? He has chosen to drift, and the world has accepted the situation and lets him drift.

The number of young men who are thrown aimless and purposeless upon the world today, and who thence are left to drift wherever the current or tide may sweep them, is something truly alarming. It is so in respect to business matters; it is even more so in morals and religion. It can hardly be too carefully or too earnestly impressed upon the minds of young people that life is real, earnest, solemn business; that to accomplish anything worth accomplishing requires a determined purpose, and a resolute will which can resist temptation, and a hand that can seize the oars with steady, manly sweeps row while the world drifts; that nothing in this world worth the achieving is ever achieved without such purpose and work; and that no young man can waste the bright, golden days of his youth and early manhood, in aimless, easy, luxurious drifting, and then suddenly regain what thus he has lost. The chances are he will lose all desire to be or do anything worthy of the true man. So in religious matters.

The man who has strong convictions, and is able to give an intelligent reason for his faith, and dares to live by and labor for that faith, is fenced more a man than he who sees no difference in creeds, and who could be one thing as well as another, if only everybody else would do so. Young men, believe something; in the conscientious observance of your faith, do something; and by the purity of your faith and the earnestness of your doing, be somebody. By all means, don't drift.

Death Will Come.

"Death will come; he will certainly come. He cannot be evaded; he cannot be put back; he cannot be made to take his step any slower.

Oh, he will come! All that live on earth will die—every beast, bird, and creeping thing; the humming bird, the insect that flutters in the sunbeam; every tree and shrub and flower; the oak, the cedar, the moss that grows over the wall; every monarch, every peasant; every rich man, every poor man; every slave, every master of a slave; every maid, every woman, every child; every old man that prides himself on his honors and wealth; every young man that prides himself on his talents or his strength; every maiden that prides herself on her beauty. Oh, all will die! I am in a world of death; I am amidst the dying and the dead; I see not a living thing in all my rambles that will not die—no man, no woman, no child; no bird, no beast; no plant, no tree. The eagle that cuts the air cannot fly above it; the monster of the deep cannot dive below it; the tiny insect cannot make itself so insignificant that death will not notice it; the leviathan cannot, with his great strength, struggle against it. The Christian will die; the sinner will die—yes, the sinner! Your wealth cannot save you; your accomplishments cannot save you. Death cares for none of these things; they are all trifles—gewgaws beneath his notice. He no more "loves a shining mark" than an ignoble one; he has no more pride in cutting down the rich man than the poor man—the daughter of beauty and fashion than the daughter of ugliness and sin. He loves to level the thistle as well as the rose-bud; the brambles as the magnolia; the brier as the cedar of Lebanon. He cares as little for the robes of ermine as for the beggar's rags; as little for your richest vestment and gayest apparel as for the blanket of the savage. You will die, and the fear of death will come upon you. Death comes just as he is—pale, solemn, fixed, stern, determined on his work. He hears no cry for pity; he regards no shriek of terror. He comes steady, certain, unchanged and unchangeable in his purpose, to take you from your bed of down; to hurry you away from your splendid dwelling; to call you out of the assembly room—taking you away from your companions, that will miss you for a moment, and resume their dance, that you may die. Death will come. He has been advancing towards you ever since you began to breathe. He has kept on his way, always advancing to meet you while you were asleep or awake; and if you have gone north, or south, or east, or west, he has always put himself upon your path—how near or how remote you have never known. Death will come. He has always been advancing, never receding; and soon his baneful shadow will fall upon your path; and that shadow will deepen and become more chilly, like an advancing eclipse; and then his dark form will stand right out before you between you and the light of the living world, and you will be in the dark valley. Death will come—fearful enough under any circumstances, even if you are a Christian—awful, unspeakably awful, if you are not.—Rev. Albert Barnes, D. D.

ONE BAPTISM.—Eph. iv. 5.

What is it—water or spirit? But why ask such a question, for Paul does not say that there is but one baptism. His exhortation is to unity. Keeping the oneness of the spirit in the bond of peace. This one body in common received the one and the same spirit. The members of the one body each took hold of the one and the same hope. Each member obeyed the same lord. The faith was one and the same. The immersion was the same whether in water or in spirit.

If Paul in Eph. iv. 5, had said that there was but one baptism, how would we understand him when he speaks of baptisms in the plural? See Heb. vi. 2. Here he speaks of baptisms as being amongst the first things taught by the anointed Jesus. The anointed Jesus taught baptism in water. First by example—see the record. Second by command—see the commission. He taught baptism in the Holy Spirit. See also Acts i. 5. Immersion in water and immersion in Holy Spirit then are the baptisms spoken of in Heb. vi. 2. Paul did not teach contrary to Christ, and did not say there was but one baptism. Hence he must, in his exhortation to the Ephesians, hold forth the fact that the baptism was one and the same. One body, one spirit, one hope, one Lord, one faith, one baptism.

Immersion in water does not effect a unity, else those thus baptized would be one in faith. Baptism in the Holy Spirit did effect a unity, for the early church was a unit in faith. Baptism in water is a legal act—an act in conformity to law—Mat. iii. 15; xxviii. 19; Acts ii. 38; x. 48.

Immersion in water, when the faith is correct, brings one into forgiveness of sins—into justification. Forgiveness of sins is based upon the death of Jesus, and baptism in water leads into his death. Rom. vi. 3. Hence Peter issued the command, Repent and be immersed, each one of you, upon—epi—the name of the Anointed Jesus, into—eis—forgiveness of sins.

This act of obedience leads into forgiveness because it leads into the death of Christ. The act is performed upon the basis of the name, because there is salvation in none other.

But the early church sustained a nearer relation to Jesus than simply this legal relation; for each member received the same spirit that was given to him. In 1 Cor. xii. 13, we learn just how the one body was united—for in one spirit we were all immersed into one body, whether Jews or Greeks, bond or free; and all drank one spirit—yes, in, and not by one spirit. See the Greek.

Jesus taught this, (Acts i. 5. You will be immersed in Holy Spirit after a few days. Immersion in the Holy Spirit effected a oneness—the one body was immersed in the one spirit—sealed by the one spirit, and anointed with one and the same spirit. Baptism in the spirit cannot be restricted to the apostles, nor to the one hundred and twenty on the day of Pentecost. Jews, Greeks, bond and free, were all baptized in one spirit, and all drank in one spirit. Could there be a unit body, some receiving the Holy Spirit—immersed in it—anointed with it—and others having not received it? Could members be builded compactly into that one body without receiving the spirit?

The early church was not only the body of Christ, but it was the anointed body. 2 Cor. i. 21, 22. Anointed, sealed, and received the pledge of the spirit in their hearts. 1 John ii. 20, 27. The little children addressed were anointed.—Diaglott. By this anointing they were taught. We go back to the type; Aaron was first anointed, then his sons the priests. We follow the shadow of heavenly things, and Jesus was anointed—then the members of his body. If the type was fulfilled in the anointing of Jesus and the first disciples, then the one body must have been made complete in all of its parts, or members.

Men and brethren, tell me how one can get into the one body, of which Jesus is the head, without the anointing? The church then was one body, the baptism was one, because each member was immersed in water and in the Holy Spirit. Each drank in the same spirit, took hold of the same hope, obeyed the same Lord, embraced the same faith, and worshiped the same God and Father of all. All received the one spirit, and the promise is to all that the Lord calls.

Let us accept the faith as it was delivered. Immersion in water leads into the death of Christ. Hence into forgiveness, into reconciliation. Immersion in the Holy Spirit leads into the life of Christ. Into fellowship with the Father and with his Son, Jesus the Anointed.

I find one and only one case where parties were re-immersed in water. See Acts xix. These persons had not heard, hence had not believed the promise of the Holy Spirit. Now why were they re-immersed if not that they might be conformed to the divine order? Let each one of you be baptized upon the name of Jesus Christ into forgiveness of sins, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit. For the promise is unto you and your children, and unto all them that are afar off, even to as many as the Lord our God shall call.

The Gentiles were afar off, so the promise is to every Gentile that the Lord calls. Jesus was anointed with the Holy Spirit and with power. And the members of the one body were anointed with the Holy Spirit and with power. If we expect to live and reign 2. Here he speaks of baptisms as being amongst the first things taught by the anointed Jesus. The anointed Jesus taught baptism in water. First by example—see the record. Hear Paul's question, Have ye received the Holy Spirit since you believed? But why ask such a question if they were not entitled to it provided the faith was correct? But immersion in the Holy Spirit did not annul, abrogate or set aside baptism in water. See the case of Cornelius. By this we know that we abide in him and he in us, because he has given to us his spirit. 1 John iv. 13.

These are they marking out boundaries, soulical, not having the spirit.—Judas 19.—Diaglott. Interlinear. There is none more prone to mark out the boundaries of the faith than those who have not the spirit. Submitted in love.

HICKS PASHA'S WATERLOO—HIS ARMY COMPLETELY DESTROYED BY THE FALSE PROPHET.

LONDON, Nov. 22.—A despatch to Reuter's Telegram Company, dated Cairo, 8:25 this morning, says that the army of Hicks Pasha has been destroyed by the forces of El Mahdi, the False Prophet. The intelligence was brought to Khartoum by a Coptic official. The fighting is said to have continued three days, beginning on Nov. 3, and to have resulted in the complete annihilation of the Egyptian troops. It is said that an artist was the only person who escaped.

The forces of El Mahdi comprised, it is estimated, 200,000 men and included dervishes, Bedouins, mulattoes, and regulars. The battle was fought near El Obeid. El Mahdi first sent forward the dervishes, declaring that they would vanquish the enemy by divine aid. Subsequently the regulars joined in the attack and the engagement became general. The army of Hicks Pasha, which early in the battle was divided into two bodies, was subsequently reunited and formed into a square, which the forces of the False Prophet broke after three days' desperate fighting.

A council of Ministers has been held, and it has been decided to concentrate at Khartoum what Egyptian troops remain at Duen, Gobs, and other places in the Soudan. The force under Hicks Pasha comprised 10,500 men. He had ten British officers, Mr. O'Donovan of the London Daily News, and an artist connected with a German illustrated paper, also accompanied his army. The correspondent of the London Graphic, who was also with the army, it is believed, was killed.

Sir Evelyn Baring has advised the Egyptian Government to abandon the Soudan and establish a strong frontier line from Khartoum in the north of the Sennaar province to Suakim on the Red Sea. It is asserted that the recent orders for the evacuation of Egypt by the British troops have been countermanded.

Hicks Pasha marched out of Khartoum on Sept. 8 with 7,000 regular infantry, 400 cavalry (of which 100 were cuirassiers and the remainder Bashi-Bazouks), one battery of Krupp guns, two batteries of mountain guns, and one battery of Nordenfeldts. At Bersir and Dujm, the route to El Obeid, he was to be reinforced with 1,600 regular infantry and 1,000 additional Bashi-Bazouks, making his total command about 10,000. After leaving the Nile, en route to El Obeid, some eight posts were to be established in order to keep up a line of communication which would require a total detail of nearly 3,000 men. It was not expected that when Hicks Pasha arrived near El Obeid he would muster over 7,000 available forces of all arms to meet the 20,000 men reported to be under El Mahdi. Among the troops in Hicks Pasha's army was the First regiment of Egyptian infantry of 1,600 men, which was formerly under the command of Arabi Pasha, but was then under the command of English officers. Capt. Herith, an Austrian officer, who formerly commanded a Uhlan regiment, was the principal drill officer of Hicks Pasha's army.

In a pronunciamento issued by two prominent sheiks under El Mahdi in September it was claimed that his forces numbered 200,000: that they had Remingtons, guns, and rockets, which they had taken from the Turks, but that El Mahdi had forbidden their use, as only spears and swords would be used by his fighting men.

Ismail Pasha, the ex-Khedive of Egypt, in an interview in London today with a representative of the Pall Mall Gazette, said that the disturbance in the Soudan was due to the weakness of the central Government at Cairo. Throughout the Soudan, he said, much power was exercised by religious chiefs and dervishes, who could be readily controlled by conciliatory measures and the allowance of a small stipend, a practice which had been unwisely discontinued. The sufferers by this discontinuation threw in their lot with the slave dealers; hence the present misfortune, which might have been avoided if the railway from Suakim to Berber on the Nile had been completed to the Soudan. The abandonment of that scheme, he thought, was false economy. He attributed the defeat of Hicks Pasha to the constitution of his forces. Egyptian soldiers, he said, needed more than other soldiers a flag, military music, and all the eclat of war. Without these they would not and could not fight. The army included Arabi Pasha's disbanded soldiers, who had been sent up like malefactors. How could Hicks Pasha, he asked, fight with such material? The ex-Khedive was not surprised at the calamity. He would not advise the sending of English troops to the Soudan, as such a course might involve greater evils.

CAIRO, Nov. 22.—A council of war met today to examine into the military situation and to decide whether Khartoum or a point further south was tenable. No decision was reached.

EL MAHDI'S VICTORY.

CAIRO, Nov. 26.—The latest reports from Soudan confirm the news of the defeat of Hicks Pasha.

The panic at Khartoum is said to be increasing, owing to rumors that El Mahdi, with a large force, is advancing upon the city and has cut off all supplies of grain. Official advices, while not confirming these rumors, admit that the Europeans are leaving Khartoum by boats.

Two transports with gendarmes leave Suez tomorrow for Suakim. Baker Pasha will probably command the expedition.

Plans are being prepared for the fortification of Assouan, on the right bank of the Nile.

PARIS, Nov. 26.—The Journal des Debats says: "If England should abandon Egypt the barbarians now at its door would occupy the country and civilization would suffer an immense loss.

The Soleil fears that England will seek to compensate herself for the loss of Soudan by taking the Island of Hainan, off Tonquin, and advises France to accept England's assistance in the far East without paying for it too dearly.

LONDON, Nov. 26.—A Khartoum dispatch says: Arabs report a large force of rebels close to Khartoum. El Mahdi has issued orders to all the tribes not to send corn to Khartoum. The dispatch says: "We have only food for a month. There are only 2,000 men here to defend nearly four miles of lines. It is perfectly useless to attempt to hold Khartoum, where the population is a slumbering volcano. The land line is closed, and the river line may be stopped tomorrow. The rebels hold the cliffs overhanging the river at Sibuluke.

The recent bloody news from Egypt has for the time being thrown the France-China controversy into the shade. Should Egypt's False Prophet succeed in marching his armed host to the Red and the Mediterranean seas, both England and France would have their hands full of a new war of very large dimensions—France in Mohammedan Tripoli, Algiers and Tunis, and England in Egypt and the East Indies.

The leader of the Soudan rebellion against Egypt calls himself El Mahdi, which means The Prophet. Those Mohammedans who deny his pretensions call him the False Prophet. His real name is Mohammed Ahmed. He comes of obscure origin, but appears to be a man of unusual powers. He claims that he is the true prophet foretold in the ancient Mohammedan prophecy, who is to rise up to redeem and rejuvenate the Islam faith. Should the Mohammedans generally recognize the genuineness of his pretensions as a God-sent leader, and rally to his standard, we may anticipate one of the most extended and most bloody "holy wars" of modern times. Wherever Mohammedanism exists there will be an uprising, and this involves all of Turkey, the British East Indies and the French possessions in Northern Africa.

Khartoum, an important city in Upper Egypt, at the junction of the White and the Blue Nile, is believed to be the point against which the False Prophet of Soudan with his victorious army is now marching. If so, he will capture it without much resistance, most of its inhabitants being in sympathy with him. From Khartoum he would probably make rapid progress down the Nile towards Cairo. If the British Government desires to save the latter city to the Khedive, it must forward reinforcements forthwith, and in large numbers too.

CHINA'S WARNING TO FRANCE.

LONDON, Nov. 22.—A Paris despatch to the Daily Telegraph says it is absolutely true that China has informed France that if the French forces attack Bac-Ninh, it will be considered a casus belli. It is reported that the French troops in Tonquin have dysentery.

The latest news from Tonquin confirms the previous reports that Sontay is powerfully fortified by the Chinese.

PARIS, Nov. 22.—Orders have been given at Toulon to prepare two transports for service in case of necessity. the question of preparing supplementary war material at Toulon is being considered.

PARIS, Nov. 26.—The departure of the Marquis Tseng, the Chinese Ambassador, from the city, is believed to be imminent.

A state of siege has been proclaimed in five districts of Servia, and there have been renewed conflicts between the insurgents and the military. The dissatisfaction is described in the European journals as having been caused by the summary manner in which the legislative chambers, called the Skuptschina, were dissolved after the radical successes and the heavy conscription levied by King Milan. The demands of the insurgents as formulated by their leader, M. Pastritch, are in the form of a draft of a constitution. It is of an almost republican character, but adopts the name of monarchial government.

DEATH OF SOJOURNER TRUTH.

A dispatch from Battle Creek, Mich., says that Sojourner Truth, the famous colored lecturer, aged 108 years, died in that city on the morning of Nov. 26.

THE JEWS' PRAYER ON "HOLY CROSS DAY."

Up to a late period, the Jews in Rome were driven on "Holy Cross Day" to attend a service in one of the churches, and to hear a sermon from a Bishop directed particularly to themselves. Robert Browning, in his striking poem, "Holy Cross Day," represents one of these compelled hearers as repeating, under his breath, the prayer of Rabbi Ben Ezra. Rabbi Ben Ezra was one of the most eminent of the Jewish sages of the Middle Ages, who was born in Toledo, Spain, 1092.

. . . . Rabbi Ben Ezra, the night he died,
Called sons and sons' sons to his side,
And spoke, "This world has been harsh and strange,
Something is wrong, there needeth a change,
But what, or where? at the first, or last?
In one point only we pinned, at most.

"The Lord will have mercy on Jacob yet,
And again in his border see Israel set.
When Judah beholds Jerusalem,
The stranger-seed shall be joined to them:
To Jacob's House shall the Gentiles cleave.
So the prophet saith and his sons believe.

"Ay, the children of the chosen race
Shall carry and bring them to their place:
In the Land of the Lord shall lead the same,
Bondmen and bondmaids. Who shall blame,
When the slaves enslave, the oppressed ones o'er
The oppressor triumph for evermore?

"God spoke, and gave us the word to keep;
Bade never fold the hands nor sleep
'Mid a faithless world, at watch and ward,
Till the Christ at the end relieve our guard.
By his servant Moses the watch was set:
Tho' midnight come, or cock-crow—we keep it yet.

"Thou! if thou wast he, who at midnight came,
By the starlight naming a dubious Name!
And if we were too heavy with sleep—too rash
With fear—O Thou, if that mercy gush
Full on thee coming to take thine own,
And we gave the Cross, when we owed the Throne—

"Thou art the Judge. We are bruised thus.
But, the judgment over, join sides with us!
Take thine to it the truest and not more thine
Than ours, in the work of those dogs and swine,
Whose life laughs through and spits at their creed,
Who maintain thee in word, and defy thee in deed!

"We withstood Christ then? Be mindful how
At least we understand Barabbas now!
Was our outrage sore? but the worst we spared,
To have called there—Christians—had we dared!
Let defiance to them, pay mittimus of thee,
And Rome make amends for Calvary!

"By the torture, prolonged from age to age,
By the infamy, Israel's heritage,
By the Ghetto's plague, by the garb's disgrace,
By the badge of shame, by the felon's place,
By the branding zeal, the bloody whip,
And the summons to Christian fellowship,

"We beat our proofs, that at least the Jew
Would wrest Christ's name from the Devil's crew,
They fling look never to deep a shade
But we fought them in it, God our aid!
A trophy to bear, as we march, a band
South, east, and on to the Pleasant Land."

THE SORER PUNISHMENT.

Of how much sorer punishment, shall he be thought worthy who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and counted the blood of the covenant wherewith he was sanctified an unholy thing, and done despite to the spirit of his grace. Heb. x. 29.

Our punishment consists in the loss we sustain. A true loss can only be valued by the knowledge we have of it. Death is the highest penalty of the law. That is the doom of the race, for in Adam all die. An idiot suffers the penalty of the law. He knows nothing more; he can't lose more, for he knows nothing more. It certainly would be unjust to punish him for a thing he had no knowledge of. Take the class Paul is speaking about—the intelligent Hebrew race. They had the knowledge of the one true living God. They had the Scriptures, which contained the utterances of the Holy Spirit of God; they had the law of Moses, which abounded in types, shadowing forth the substance, the Lord Jesus, the Christ, who in the fulness of time came in exact harmony with the voice of the prophets; they were well stored in divine knowledge. More than this, they had seen their Messiah, who had given ample testimony of the truth of his mission, that he was indeed the Son of God, the Savior of the world—yea, more: that he had come to bring life and immortality to light through the gospel. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that believeth my words and believeth on him that sent me hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life." John v. 24. Yet more: The Jews had done just what Paul in our text accuses them of, or in the words of Peter on Pentecost, of killing the Prince of Life. They had seen God's power so signally manifested in raising up Christ from the death state, who after forty days' sojourn with his disciples ascended to the right hand of his Father. All these, with many more equally astounding facts, had the Jews a correct knowledge of. Yet more: They had seen Moses' prediction of the destruction of their temple and hierarchy; had heard the fearful utterances of him who spake of their ignominies and sufferings which pen cannot describe nor tongue utter. Is not a knowledge of these facts a sorer punishment than for a heathen to die the Adamic death? Judge ye.

I take no stock in the unscriptural dogma of raising up dead men to kill them over again to gratify judicial vengeance. Our God of the Bible we worship and adore is a God of infinite love, of boundless mercies, of infallible justice, and will not the Judge of all the earth do right?

Can there be any sorer punishment than for an intelligent Bible student to know he has deprived himself of the gift of eternal life? "Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power." So says Paul.

Who is right? Daniel says, "The kingdom and the dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heavens, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him."

Brother B. says there is no kingdom under the whole heavens; there never was. Please explain. Will the dogs and sorcerers remain outside after the thousand years' reign of Christ in millennial glory? Come on. Bible students like myself and others must be careful we don't get into deep water.

Brother Gelletly is pleased to say what in the gospel good news concerning Jesus that does not strike us as an intelligent Bible answer. I think Jesus himself will give a better answer. Mat. iv. 23: "And Jesus went about all Galilee, teaching in the synagogues and preaching the gospel of the kingdom." Mat. ix. 35: "And Jesus went about all the cities and villages teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing every sickness and every disease among the people." Mark i. 14: "Now after John was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God." Verse 15: "Saying the time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent, and believe the gospel."

Enough is quoted to show that the gospel is the good news of the kingdom of God, and that there is but one way marked out by the Great Teacher and his holy apostles to enter that kingdom. We must hear the word of the kingdom, repent of our sins, believe the good news, put on Christ by being baptized in water in the name of the Holy One for the remission of our sins.

Some have got their backs up on baptism, and I think are leaning on a broken reed. The word is plain and clear, and we need not err. It is a great thing to have the will completely subdued. Be honest. What did you believe when you were baptized in the apostate churches thirty or forty or fifty years ago? Be honest. Talk it out plain, so that we of later date may understand. Don't darken counsel by words without knowledge. Oh, I understood just enough to induce obedience. Would it not be well to at once become obedient to the faith and answer a good conscience, and thus take up the stumbling blocks out of the way of poor perishing mortals? Come right forward and give a thus saith the Lord. It will relieve our minds. It won't hurt you a bit, even if you have been a minister for years. It will be much better than to take a lower seat when the Master views the guests at the feast. The cross is heavy. I have been a Baptist or a Methodist preacher for half a century, and now to call my baptism in question is too bad. Thus men reason.

Come, tell us just what you believed concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus the Christ. If you are honest, Jesus will help you bear the cross. Did you believe the kingdom of God was a myth in men's hearts, or it was set up on Pentecost? A correct faith is essential to a valid baptism. Take every case named in the New Testament—it is predicated on an intelligent faith. A spurious faith cannot be coupled with a valid baptism. The two cannot go together. Read James and all will be well. An intelligent faith, true repentance, willing obedience in baptism, a holy, godly life, insures resurrection out from among the dead ones. On such the second death hath no power. An honest man is the noblest work of God.

Editor Restitution:

Allow me space in your valuable paper to give Brother Richard Corbaley a good remedy for asthma. It may also be of great benefit to many readers of THE RESTITUTION. I have just been looking over the paper, and find that Brother Corbaley is unable for duty, and I have a remedy for asthma, which I have never known to fail:

"Take one quart of linseed oil, raw; one fourth of an ounce each of oil of cedar, oil of sassafras, oil of origanum, oil of hemlock, oil of spruce; one ounce of gum camphor; mix, shake well. Dose, a half teaspoonful every two hours, and at the same time use oil of cubebs, ten drops every four or five hours. Use both without water. Also, take a piece of cloth and cut a pattern to fit the chest; then take newspaper on both sides of the cloth, three ply. Put strings at top and bottom, so as to hang the plate around the neck, and fasten it around the waist. This will keep an even temperature of the blood's circulation through the lungs, and the compound oil will effect a cure. I feel assured that this will quickly cure asthma, and hope Brother Corbaley will give it a trial. It is also good for many other ailments, such as croup, lame back, etc. For pain in the lumbar region of the back, take a teaspoonful every four hours. There is nothing better for burns; anoint the burn well with the oil, and cover with cotton. Use no other remedy for burns.

And now a word about affairs here. The masses are ignorant of the truth. I have done all in my strength to put the truth before them. I have sent THE RESTITUTION to as many as I am able, and scattered many pamphlets among the people, and preached when I could. But I have no one to help me in any way, and when I get an interest aroused, there are so many sectarians to catch away the good seed and devour them up. I have tried to get some help from the brethren, but have failed, so far. The preachers here tell their congregations that I am the only man in the world who advocates the doctrine of the kingdom and Christ's glorious reign over the nations. This makes the people think it a new doctrine, and they are harder to reason with. If some able brethren would come and preach with me a week, we could get a start in pulling down the strongholds of Satan. I have baptized two since I came here, and have hopes of several more obeying the sacred command. I have a Baptist preacher on the fence, and think he will fall on the side of truth. He says he will hear, believe, and obey the truth; if he will do all this, he will surely be one of us.

A young lady said to me, "Doctor, I attended church yesterday, on purpose to hear the preacher abuse you, but I was disappointed; he did not come. But I was dunned for money to pay the preacher." She also said she thought we were ignorant enough of truth, without paying anybody to distribute any more falsehood, and that we had already been led too far from the truth. Her words go to prove that the fowls have not destroyed all the good seed I have sown. I enjoyed the short conversation. She has some knowledge of the truth, and if all had that much light we would not have much trouble touching the people concerning the kingdom.

Brethren and sisters, pray for me, and for the good of the cause in this part of the country.

Your brother, in hope of the kingdom. GEO. KIDWELL, M. D.

"FEAR."

Woe unto ye have made the heart of the righteous sad, and strengthened the hands of the wicked, that he should not return from his wicked way, by promising him life. Ezek. xiii. 22.

Not long since a friend of mine was urging on a Christian minister the propriety of announcing "death" as the award of unforgiven sin, and backing his sentiments on the penal matter by testimonies from Holy Writ. The preacher, a worthy man, listened not merely with patience, but with interest. After musing for a little while he replied—"What would be the effect were I to proclaim that doctrine? I fear." "Fear what, may I inquire?" said my friend. "That sinners would be emboldened to sin the more." Now such is a very common opinion, though not likely to be held in long esteem by a thoughtful mind. On its first appearance everything looks in its favor, but only then. However, this we must allow, that the very suspicion of danger to morality in its diffusion augurs well for his condition who gives utterance to the alarm; his anxieties are on the side of righteousness, and for the spiritual interests of his fellow men. But after all, is the danger he contemplates real? Is the alarm, suggested by what he reckons a new and suspicious interpretation of "the wrath to come" justified before the tribunal of conscience and of truth?

No one who fears God, and is capable of estimating the inherent power and tendency of truth and its opposite, could hesitate for a moment to admit that sin can never issue from what is true; in other words, from what the Holy Spirit has revealed to faith and obedience. A lie is of the nature of poison; truth has but healthful qualities. The real doctrine will alone bring forth consequences profitable to man and honoring to his Creator.

It is not asserted that whenever the Biblical teaching is announced such consequences must be exhibited as in the light of noon-day; for, since man is a free agent, there is no "must be" in the case. The effect may be neither positively one thing nor another, and has often been so. But this we venture to affirm, that whenever the truth on any question, such as the doom of the unholy, be the doom what it may, is honestly received into the heart, it will be attended exclusively with good and lasting moral consequences. So that the proper attitude in respect to any divine communication is not—will its practical results be excellent? as if that were in doubt; but a loyal and unwavering confidence in it as incapable of doing harm. And, why? Simply because it is truth, or a reflex of the Infinite Mind, which exists eternally in uncompromising hostility to falsehood, deception and wrong.

That question settled, and placed, as it ought to be, on the list of sacred axioms, the next which the devout intellect will entertain in reference to any doctrine advanced as of supreme authority, is—does it rest not in the most venerable of creeds, but on the Word of God? No choice is left us as to what should be in the Record, or might with advantage be there, according to our limited perceptions. All such intermeddling and conjecturing is beyond our province, no less than in respect to our own organism, or any other physical arrangement in the world where we dwell. What eminently becomes us is modestly and faithfully to accept the natural appointments of the Creator; and with equal modesty and faithfulness to interpret what he has revealed in words. In short, the proper attitude for each listener is—"Speak, Lord; for thy servant heareth."

Whatever be the final punishment of iniquity, of this we may have complete certitude—it is by the ordination of limitless wisdom and justice. It is the form of vengeance best adapted to accomplish what ends were contemplated in its appointment and infliction; ends such as these—the display of the holiness of Almighty God, the conservation of his authority over moral intelligences, the enforcement of righteousness as the highest law for conscience, and the ultimate extinction of evil over all his wide domains.

When my friend urged upon the gentleman he conversed with the duty of announcing the Scriptural penalty of sin, instead of that one under which the lost beyond the grave resemble

"The voices of the wandering wind,
Which moan for rest and rest can never find."

I have no doubt he supplied valid reasons for what he maintained was the Bible truth. He has studied the matter thoroughly, and can express his ideas in a way both clear and inoffensive. The Scriptural evidence has often been detailed, and never more explicitly than in the columns of this little journal, so that we may be excused for omitting confirmatory lengthened testimony on this occasion. Suffice it to repeat that "the wages of sin is death,"—not life in torture; and that Jesus our Lord came, love-moved, to rescue us from perishing everlastingly. These statements command our unquestioning submission, and we are more than persuaded that they are worthy of him who rules over all. We dare substitute no penalty for the one revealed. It proceeds from an Infinite Mind that comprehends all causes and their results; that measures guilt with unerring exactness; that has an absolute right to determine who shall survive, and who in the end shall for good reasons pass away.

The paragraph just written suggests the remark that many, when final issues are pressed upon their notice, too exclusively occupy their thoughts with "death," or termination of being—the penalty of transgression, as we read the Volume; almost entirely overlooking the correlated sublime truth—that Jesus is the Life of men. The dogma of interminable pain, as it presupposes essential immortality, detracts immensely from the grandeur of the Savior's mediation in our behalf. He actually places ever-blooming existence, crowned, of course, with bliss, within our reach; and that was his meaning when he uttered the assurance, unspeakable in its magnitude and solace—"I am the resurrection and the life." That understood, the universe becomes a new abode. There is nothing horrible within its confines. Vanishes, as a gifted pen has written, "that blasphemous superstition which is found in all Christian creeds alike, which has not feared to blacken even the shining gates of heaven with the smoke of hell." Henceforth it can be understood more perfectly than ever that "God is love;" and how confidently a poor sinner may draw near to the mercy seat in hope of pardon. "Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die? saith the Lord God; and not that he should return from his ways and live." If the orthodox view of man and of punishment hereafter, things indissolubly bound together, thus obscures the vastness of the Savior's achievement, is not that something to be afraid of? The thought that he is the fountain of immortality—might that not cause a heart, professedly on his side, to exult when for the first time the rapture-inspiring conception dawns on the understanding? Shall the veil of heathenized theology be permitted longer to hide his transcendant glory?

The preacher was alarmed lest the punishment being death—only death, as such objectors usually have it in their mind—might impel men into more extreme criminality. It cannot be said that perpetual misery has exercised a very restraining influence on depraved natures, and worse retribution than that fierce woe could not be devised. It is awful, it is incomprehensible, it is stupefying, and tends rather, if dwelt upon, to force the more sensitive into despair, than to bend their preferences in accord with the Eternal love and will. How many it has turned against the All-Merciful; how many it has bereft of reason, no one can tell. The contemplation of death allays agitation in the mind, and thus is favorable to serious thought. The solemnizing award appeals to our reason, and the innate sense of justice in the human breast. If life is refused—deliberately refused—what can happen but eternal oblivion? "Why will ye die?" sums up the matter. Should life not be accepted, then non-being must be accounted the destiny preferred. There is no mystery about it. All is simple, intelligible and fair. Death is chosen, and the choice has its realization at length.

Whether the doctrine of literal death as the recompense of sin has manifestly in any instance encouraged men to go on in wickedness, is to us unknown. Our observation for a number of decades has led rather to an opposite conclusion. Perhaps some, on estimating the penalty, have with new energy proceeded defiantly in forbidden ways. Men have braved the threat of everlasting anguish, and we need not wonder if they on reckoning perdition, accurately understood, to be dreaded less, should perhaps offend with more unblushing hardihood. The pleasures of sin for a season, and the price is known. A portion in this life, and the consequent loss is well apprehended. "Why will ye die?" surely supposes that there may be a definite reason for the choice, and the reason may be a few years of lawless indulgence, let the night—to be followed by no dawn—arrive when it may. 'Tis mournful to reflect upon, but there are many who to all appearance seem hopelessly wedded to their lusts, and pleasures, and vanities, whom neither Heaven's love nor Heaven's terror can in the least overpower. They resist the Holy Spirit day by day; and what can be looked for except that they shall die—as it were be drowned—in their sins?

Perhaps we have exceeded the reasonable space allowed us, but before retiring shall take the liberty to add: A happy deliverance to all inquirers after truth! Their number is on the increase, and that is a cheering omen to those who are helping forward this new reformation. What is chiefly needed is a frank, heroic, and reverential testimony on the part of those who in their hearts acknowledge the hollowness of the system which they were early led to admire and vindicate. Is it for peace they are silent? Could they offer that plea in the Master's visible presence? Are a few tranquil days to be bought at the sacrifice of eternal truth?—*W. G. I have never written to you before this, but now take the opportunity and pleasure to do so. I have for a number of years been a reader of your very valuable paper, my father-in-law being a subscriber to it, and he living with me. It is about three years since my wife and I embraced the truth, for which we have much reason to thank God, for the light and understanding he hath given us. To the best of my knowledge there are but us three of the one true faith in this place, although we have tried hard to convince many of their mistake by reading to them and showing them the truth, but to no object as yet. They appear to be willingly ignorant. From a brother in hope of eternal life.

I cannot get along without our most excellent paper; we seem lost without its weekly visitation. I wish you would announce that I have removed from Centerville, Lewis Co., W. T., to The Dalles, Oregon. I sincerely regret to leave the dear ones there that we had the pleasure of burying with Christ in baptism, but hope yet to be able to return and speak the words of life to those that have so earnestly requested us to do so. Please tell the brethren in eastern Oregon and Washington that my health is so much improved that I shall be able to speak and would be glad to have the brethren let me hear from them as I want to do all that I can before the Master comes. Please send my paper to The Dalles, Oregon, instead of Skookum Chuck, W. T.

Enclosed find two dollars to be applied on my subscription for your excellent paper another year. I feel that your paper has done me a great deal of good. I was almost a skeptic before I took your good paper, because I had never been taught the true light as it is revealed in the word of God. What used to seem to me obscure and impossible to understand now is more plain and clear. I am an old lady seventy-two years old; I shall soon pass through the valley of the shadow of death, but I shall fear no evil if I have Christ for my guide. In him will I trust.

I enclose two dollars to pay for THE RESTITUTION another year. My daughter, her husband and myself are here alone in the faith, and THE RESTITUTION is our only preacher, bringing us weekly glad tidings of good things to come, building us up in the faith and renewing our strength, enabling us to run with patience the race set before us. The Scriptural doctrine of Jesus and the resurrection, so ably advocated and so well defended in THE RESTITUTION, is full of comfort to us. We read through the columns of THE RESTITUTION of meetings held in different parts of the world, and we would like very much, if it was convenient to meet with the brethren and sisters, but as it is we must make the best. May the Lord bless all the brethren and sisters and their labors of love, and may God give us all the needed grace that we may prove faithful and true to our trust, for we believe if we are faithful we are to become kings and priests under him in the kingdom of God. And may the time soon come when he who is our life shall appear. We also shall appear with him in glory, amen. Your brother in hope of eternal life and the soon-coming of our great King and Lord of hosts.

Exegetical.

Professor Friedrich Delitzsch, in his correction of various Hebrew etymologies from the Assyrian, imparts a new signification to the word Adam, "man." It has been hitherto supposed that Adâm was connected with Adamah, אַדְמָה, "ground," which prima facie is not improbable. In translation "earth-born" has, however, already been shown by Ewald, on grammatical grounds, to be inadmissible. But in Assyrian a verbal root אדם, adam, is preserved in a number of derived nouns, which go to show the original meaning of the root to be synonymous with that of בָּנָה, banah, "to build," or "to beget." Thus we have admanu, "building" or "dwelling-place," and admu, "child," which is expressly stated to be a synonym of lidanu, and is specially used of the young of a bird, with which also the analogous expression apal issuri, "young bird," may be compared to the Hebrew ben-yonah, "young pigeon." Adam, אָדָם, is therefore synonymous with בֵּן, ben, meaning "the begotten one," or "the created one." The verbal root adam was used of the cultivation of the ground in the same manner as the Hebrew banah, which occurs in this sense in 1 Kings xvi. 24, and in some other passages. "Adamah is thus "the cultivated ground," as in Gen. iv. 2; and Oheb adamah, 2 Chron. xxvi. 10 is "the lover of agriculture," or "the agriculturist." The Assyrian reduplicated root dadam likewise signifies "to cultivate," while dadmu is "dwelling-place," or "cultivated land," or "country" in general.—The Index Reformed.

To the Students of Prophecy throughout the World:

The undersigned proposes to issue from the press, either in Chicago or in New York City, as circumstances may decide, the following works, to-wit:

I. The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. In the first division the nature of the Coming Age is fully discussed, as to its physical and moral character: 1. That the earth itself has a crowning age, in which it shall be perfectly adapted to be the residence of man in his highest type; 2. That man, in that resurrection state, will be under the endless reign of the Personal Messiah; 3. In establishing the proximity of that age, the prophecies of Ezekiel, Isaiah, Daniel, Zechariah, Christ, Paul, Peter, and the Apocalypse, are critically examined, relative to its rapid approach.

II. The second work will be devoted to the investigation of the various phases of the Eastern Question:—1. The Egyptian phase, 2. The British phase, 3. The Russian phase, 4. The Ottoman phase, 5. The Hebrew phase, 6. The American phase, 7. Lesser phases of the Eastern Question, 8. The location of each of the Great Powers in the coming contest, 9. All nations marshal under the banners of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. Those powers are traced in history to the present time. All the great national issues are fully investigated.

If all that are interested in these great and most sublime topics will aid, they will be issued immediately. They will be printed and bound in a form that will do credit to the vastness of the subjects, and put to subscribers at prices quite reasonable. The books will contain about 500 large royal 8vo. pages each.

WHAT THEN.

What then? Why, then, another pilgrim song,
And then a hush of rest divinely granted,
And then a thrilling siege, oh me, so long,
And then a brook—just where it is most wanted,

What then? The plucking of the evening fruit;
And then perchance a willow rough and thorny;
And then some sweet and tender messages sent
To cheer the faint one for to-morrow's journey.

What then? The wailing of the midnight wind;
A feverish sleep, a heart oppressed and aching;
And then a little water cruse to find
Close by my pillow, ready for my waking.

What then? I am not careful to inquire,
I know there will be tears and fears and sorrows;
And then a loving Savior drawing nigher,
And saying, "I will answer for to-morrow."

What then? For all my sins His pardoning grace;
For all my wants and woes His loving-kindness;
For darkest cloud the shining of God's face,
And Christ's own hand to lead me in my blindness.

What then? A shadowy valley lone and dim;
And then a deep and darkly rolling river;
And then a flood of life, a seraph's hymn,
And God's own smile forever and forever.

THE GREAT PYRAMID.

The Great Pyramid of Jeezah, in Egypt, was the largest of the seven wonders of the ancient world, and was accounted the most astonishing. So far as we have information, it was the first pyramid built, and is the only one which has held the attention of mankind in all ages. The others have appeared to be mere imitations, with no idea in them.

Herodotus, the "Father of History," B. C. 484–404, is the first of writers to mention it, except some allusions in the Bible, and from his day until ours no one has known what the building meant, or for what it was built; but to all ages it has been a wonder and puzzle.

At length the solution of the puzzle was studied out, and declared to the world. In the last month of 1869, John Taylor, for many years publisher of the London University, London, England, and then eighty years old, after thirty years of earnest investigation, published a book entitled, "The Great Pyramid; Why was it Built? and Who Built it?" to which he disclosed the clue to all the secret meaning of the building. As one result, in November, 1864, C. Piazzi Smyth, Astronomer Royal for Scotland, started for Egypt, and lived four months, with his brave and devoted wife, in a tomb near by, while he measured the Great Pyramid within and without, with a laborious patience and accuracy which have no parallel. The discoveries of Mr. Taylor, and those made through these measurements, are among the most extraordinary of modern times. They show the building to be even more wonderful, in the ideas which it contains, than in its unequaled vastness; and fully worthy the reverent study of all serious men. These discoveries divide into two classes.

I. The Great Pyramid is found to be a grand world standard of weights and measures, for the whole globe, for all time, constructed according to the highest truth, and embodying a complete and perfect science. Indeed, the scientific knowledge which it displays, in its own field, surpasses all that has been manifested among men, in that field, since Christendom began.

II. A large and increasing number of devout people believe that they have found in it a system of Bible chronology, in which the chief biblical events of the past are recorded, and the outline of what is yet future is disclosed.

A brief statement of the more striking and important discoveries of the first class may be given as follows in Pyramid inches.

1. The height of the Great Pyramid is to twice the base as the diameter of a circle is to its circumference.

2. The height of the Great Pyramid is the radius of a circle whose circumference is equal to the sum of the four sides. That is, the Great Pyramid is a squared circle. But what circle has it squared? The next great fact shows.

3. Along its diagonals, that is, along the slope at the corners, the Great Pyramid draws in 10, as it goes up 9. This teaches that 10 raised to the 9th power, and multiplied into the Pyramid's height, that is, the line along which the going up takes place, will give the distance to the most notable object at which it points; that is, the distance from the earth to the sun, and which is thus found to be 91,840,000 miles. Now, this line is the radius which the Pyramid's height symbolizes, and the circle from this radius is the path of the earth round the sun, and is that circle which the Pyramid has in symbol squared. This is shown beyond doubt by the next great fact.

4. The sum of the four sides of the Great Pyramid, in Pyramid inches, divided by 100, gives the exact solar year; i. e. 9131 multiplied by 4 and divided by 100 equals 365.24. The same is given by the circle of which the foregoing is the square. Multiply the height (equals the radius) by 2, (to get the diameter), then multiply by $pi$, (to get the circumference), and divide by 100, and you have the same result: i. e. 5813 times 2 times 3,14159 divided by 100 equals 365.24 plus. But within the period of written history this accurate knowledge of the length of the solar year has not been possessed by men till the most recent times. How came the builders of the Great Pyramid to possess it?

5. The sum of the diagonals of the base of the Great Pyramid, in inches, counting an inch for a year, gives the length of time of the precession of the equinoxes, or in which the equinoctial points pass backward through all the signs of the zodiac; which period is called the Pleiades year, and consists of 25,827 solar years. The best modern computation is 25,868 years.

6. The Great Pyramid was built to commemorate the year and the day when this vast cycle began, which was the day of the autumnal equinox 2170 B. C. This is shown by the structure of the building in itself, and by the position of the sun and stars as to the earth at that time; and it is called the Pleiades year, because that constellation dominates and is most conspicuous in the combination of the heavenly bodies which form the starting point of this vast period.

7. The Great Pyramid stands with close practical exactness on the 30th parallel of latitude, that line which divides into two equal parts the hemispheres made by the equator.

8. The Great Pyramid also stands at the centre of all the land on the globe; that is, of the whole habitable earth; thereby signifying that it was built for all mankind.

9. The Great Pyramid was built by those who, in pre-historic times, "divided the earth" with meridians of longitude and parallels of latitude,—the times of "Almodad," "the Measurer, when a child was named "Peleg," "Division," to commemorate the event (see Gen. x. 25, 26), and being at the land centre of the globe, it is perfectly placed to mark the standard meridian of longitude from which all nations should measure all meridians on the globe. Moreover, they who built it so planned and shaped it as to make it a combination of geometrical, geodesical, and stellar truths, worthy to be the grand standard of a world-system of weights and measures; and so it gives, as the base line for its system, that one perfect line—the earth's polar diameter. This line it divides into 500,000,000 parts each of which is only a fifteen-hundredth longer than the standard British inch. It also gives the earth's mean density at 5.7 times that of water. From these two elements the Great Pyramid unfolds its system according to the highest ideal truth. And certain close resemblances make it probable that the Israelitish and English systems of weights and measures were originally derived from it, or from those who built it.

10. From the multitude of deeply interesting facts which this building contains we draw forth but one more. The Great Pyramid gives a perfect scale for a thermometer, far surpassing in fitness, for human uses, anything now possessed by men. This scale places zero at freezing point, and makes boiling point 250 deg. And now come out certain remarkable truths. Just one-fifth of the way from zero to freezing point is 50 deg., which, as the combination of the 5 with the 10, is the most perfect decimal, and which number the building proclaims with greatest emphasis. Now this 50 deg. just corresponds to 68 deg. Fahrenheit, which is the "mean temperature of all lands inhabited by man," and is "that temperature most suitable" for the perfect health of man on the globe. Then multiply the 250 deg. by 4, for the four sides of the base of the Pyramid, and we come to 1,000 deg., that most notable and dividing line of heat, where it causes bodies to begin to give out light, and which has been called "Iron Bright Red in the Dark." Multiply this again by 5 for the five sides of the angles of the building, and we come to 5,000 deg., the probable melting point of platinum, the most dense and refractory of all metals."

The extraordinary harmony of this decimal scale, with the material facts in nature, places it beyond all comparison above every other scale known to man. But it has another strong excellence. Fahrenheit, the most finely graded scale now in use, has only 180 deg. between freezing point and boiling point, while the Great Pyramid scale has 70 deg. more. Thus, very much finer gradations of heat and cold can be read in even degrees from this scale, than from that of Fahrenheit; and as for Centigrade and Reaumur, they are too far away to be mentioned. Now this finer gradation is of great practical value to chemists, observers of the weather, and indeed all who have occasion to use a thermometer. Hence, a thermometer marked with this scale is altogether superior for human uses to any other now offered to men.—Jesse H. Jones.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—Second Series, Number 24.

THE DOG RIVER AND ITS MONUMENTS.

It was near noon on a bright April day when I mounted my favorite Nesik—one of the prettiest and wildest of Arab horses—at the gate of Beyrout. My servants and muleteers were already hours in advance; and Nesik, as he champed the bit and pawed the ground, showed his eagerness to follow.

The mulberry groves and cactus-lined lanes were soon passed. For a moment I drew up in the bay of St. George, to take another look at the fabled scene of our patron saint's conflict with the dragon, with which the fine old crown pieces have made English eyes so familiar. Then fording the sluggish Magorus, I reached the silver strand that here stretches for miles along the Mediterranean. Loosening the rein an hour's gallop brought me to the foot of the famous pass of the Dog River.

One of Lebanon's great "roots" here strikes far out, and dips, a rocky precipice, into the bosom of the deep. Over the rugged cliff the Egyptian Sesostris, thirteen centuries B. C., cut a zigzag road. Seven hundred years later the road was repaired by the Assyrian Sennacherib, when on his march to the fatal plain of Libnah. 2 Kings xvhi. 13, etc. Then, after a still longer interval, came the Roman Antonine, and reconstructed the pass. And since his day the Turks and the French, if they have done little in the way of repairs, have at least indulged their vanity by leaving a record of their presence.

The long history of the pass is written upon its rocky sides. Nine tablets are there, each as big as an ordinary door. Three are Egyptian and six are Assyrian; the latter distinguished by quaint stiff figures, and yards of cuneiform letters. The Roman tablet is of more moderate dimensions: plain and matter-of-fact, like the men who made it. The Turks have as many flourishes in their letters as in their legend; and the French, with characteristic modesty, have, it is said, for their visit was subsequent to mine, appropriated one of the Egyptian panels.

How strange to see in one spot, at one glance, inscribed records extending back in succession almost to the time of Moses! To see there, too, monumental evidence of one of the most remarkable incidents in Bible history—the expedition of Sennacherib! The tablets on this pass are not surpassed in interest or importance by any monuments in Syria.

Scrambling up the ancient road, and round the edge of a dizzy crag, the glen of Nahrel-Kelb opened suddenly before me. It was a scene of singular grandeur. Away in the depths beneath dashed the mad torrent in sheets of foam, over its rocky bed. Its banks fringed with oleander, now wet with spray, and glistening under the bright sunbeams. Above rose jagged precipices of white limestone, crowned far overhead by a convent and a village.

On a former occasion I traded the river to its source, through rich Alpine scenery which gave me a vivid picture of "the glory of Lebanon." Now my course was different. I followed the deeply indented shore; and after an hour's hard ride cooled my horse's foaming sides in

THE RIVER ADONIS.

A few days before my visit heavy rain had fallen in Lebanon; and I had therefore an opportunity of seeing Adonis "run purple to the sea;" its waters tinged with the earth the swollen torrent tore from the mountain sides. The fable of Venus and Adonis is well known. The Greeks borrowed it from the Syrians; and the bank of this stream was the scene of the catastrophe. The story has a sacred as well as a classic interest. Adonis was probably identical with Tammuz, for whom Ezekiel represents the infatuated Jewish women as weeping (viii. 14); and our own Milton has thrown around the heathen fable and the prophetic vision all the charms of his matchless verse:

"Thammuz came next behind,
Whose annual wound in Lebanon allured
The Syrian damsels to lament his fate
In amorous ditties all a summer's day;
While smooth Adonis from his native rock
Ran purple to the sea supposed with blood
Of Thammuz, yearly wounded."

I rode slowly on, looking up at Lebanon, as peak after peak revealed itself; and now out over the boundless Mediterranean gleaming like burnished gold beneath the evening sun.

GEBAL.

I found my tent pitched under the crumbling ramparts of Gebal; and dismounted at its door as the sun touched the water.

Jebeil, the modern name of this town is the diminutive of the Hebrew Gebal, which signifies "mountain." The city was the capital of the Giblites, or "mountaineers," the leading tribe of Lebanon in the days of Joshua. xiii. 5. The Giblites appear to have been an educated and enterprising people in a very remote age. They were Solomon's chief architects when he built the temple; though unfortunately our English version in 1 Kings v. 18, conceals the fact by rendering Giblites "stone squarers." They were famous, too, as ship-builders; for the ancients of Gebal and "the wise men thereof" were the leading men in the dock-yards of Tyre. Ezek. xxvii. 9.

It is most interesting to observe how fully even incidental allusions of the sacred writers are confirmed and illustrated by the facts of ancient history and the results of modern research. During the wars of Alexander the Great, the fleet of Gebal, or Byblus, as the Greeks called it, was a formidable power in the Levant. When, on the morning after my arrival, I proceeded to explore the ruins, I was particularly struck with the massive and splendid masonry of the ancient citadel. Some of its stones are twenty feet long, and in their size, style, and perfection of finish, they closely resemble those I had before seen in the foundations of the temple at Jerusalem. May it not be that the very same workmen were employed in the erection of both buildings?

But the glory of Gebal has passed away. Its massive walls are rent and shattered; its harbor is a ruin; its navy is reduced to some half-dozen fishing boats; and its population now consists of about six hundred poor peasants.

TRIPOLI.

A pleasant ride of eight hours took me from Gebal to Tripoli. My road lay along the shore; now winding over the brow of a cliff, now diving down a break-neck path into a dell, now treading softly the pebbly shore on which the ever restless waves made solemn melody. Little villages, and convents, and vineyards, and groves of figs and olives, tell of modern industry and Lebanon's fruitfulness; but wide-spread ruins, and shattered battlements, and deserted harbors, tell still more impressively of departed greatness.

Tripoli is a picturesque town of thirteen thousand inhabitants, embosomed in gardens and orchards of orange, apricot and apple trees. Its fruits rival those of Joppa and Sidon. The surrounding plain is a little paradise, covered with verdure, and sparkling with stream and fountain. A triangular promontory juts out from the town into the Mediterranean, and on its northern shore, a mile and a half distant, is the Mina or port of Tripoli. This promontory was the site of the ancient city—the Tripolis, or "Triple City" of the Greeks, which, tradition says, was so named because it was founded by three colonies from Tyre, Sidon and Arvad. I traced the ruins of the old walls along the neck of the promontory, and around its shores; and I saw columns of granite and marble, with heaps of stones and rubbish scattered over its surface. During the first Crusade, Raymond of Toulouse built a castle inland on the banks of the Kadisha, for the protection of Christian pilgrims; and around it the modern town has grown.—J. L. Porter.

JEWEL CASKET.

SILENT TIMES.

Every true Christian life needs its daily "silent times," when all shall be still, when the busy activity of other hours shall cease, and when the heart, in holy hush, shall commune with God. One of the greatest needs of Christian life today is the revival of devotion. Ours is not an age of prayer so much as of work. The tendency is to action rather than to worship; to busy toil, rather than to quiet sitting at the Savior's feet to commune with him.

The way to spiritual health lies in the paths of consecrated service. Yet the other side is just as true. Before there can be a strong, vigorous, healthy tree, able to bear much fruit, to stand the storm, to endure the heat and cold, there must be a well-planted and well-nourished root; and before there can be a strong, noble, enduring Christian life in the business of the world, safe in temptation, unshaken in trials, full of good fruits, perennial and unfading in its leaf, there must be a close walk with God in secret.

WE SHALL BE LIKE HIM.

The last and loftiest attainments of holiness shall be reached. Love shall hold an undivided empire within us. What is foreign to our nature shall be taken out of it, and itself filled with all the fullness of God. Whatever you consecrate as holy or admire as good, shall be concentrated in the person of the glorified saint. Every grace in Christ's heart shall have a reflection of itself in the hearts of all his worshiping brethren. There shall be "no more consciousness of sin;" all its forms and all the evils it has brought shall be forever done away. "The glory of God" now seen in the face of his Son Jesus Christ, shall then be seen also in the faces of the members of the household. The perfection of Christ shall distinguish every one of them; for they "shall be satisfied, when they awake with his likeness."

THE BEATIFIC VISION.

How should we rejoice in the prospect—the certainty rather—of spending a blissful eternity with those whom we love on earth, of seeing them emerge from the ruins of the tomb, and the deeper ruins of the fall, not only uninjured, but refined and perfected, with every tear wiped away from the eyes, standing before the throne of God and the Lamb, in white robes and palms in their hands, crying with a loud voice, Salvation to God that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb forever and ever! What delight will it afford to renew the sweet counsel we have taken together, to recount the toils of combat and the labor of the way, and to approach, not to the house but to the throne of God, in company in order to join the symphony of heavenly voices and lose ourselves amidst the splendors and fruition of the beatific vision.—Robert Hall.

NEW JERUSALEM.

There shall you see New Jerusalem, the heavenly metropolitan city, all garnished with glory, like a spouse prepared for her spouse, with glorious mansions, and pleasant tabernacles in it, prepared ready to see you; even such tabernacles as Peter wished in the Mount Tabor to be made when he was rapt in glory, that he could not tell where he was, nor what he spake. Luke ix.

Briefly, in that Mount Nebo ye shall see what eye never saw; paradise without any serpent to tempt you any more, riches without measure, glory without comparison, life without death, day without night, liberty without thraldom, solace without ceasing, joy without ending, a land flowing with milk and honey. And here, to make an end of speaking of those things which are endless, looking in this mount well about you, you shall see with your spiritual eye, that which Daniel with his prophetical eye did see so long before—that the kingdom, the power, and magnitude of the kingdom, that is or shall be under heaven, shall be given to the people of the highest, which kingdom shall destroy all other kingdoms, and this kingdom shall be everlasting. Dan. vii.—John Fox.

SELECTED MISCELLANY.

An effort is being made in New York to establish a newspaper to be published in the Hungarian language. The subject has been under consideration for some time, and meets with the endorsement of the Rev. Messrs. Howard Crosby, S. Irenæus Prime, Morgan Dix, and others. There are at the present time about 6,000 Hungarians in the city of New York, and about 100,000 throughout the country; they have no paper published in their mother tongue.

A wonderful mirage was visible on the coast of Maine a few days ago. The day had been warm and calm, and waves of heated air seemed to vibrate with great intensity on the sea. Suddenly the ocean assumed a wonderful appearance. Above the true horizon seemed suspended in air a second ocean, which faded away and formed a gray vapor that appeared like an immense tidal wave and fell and rose to a great height. Vessels before invisible rose from below the horizon, and sailed in spectral procession through the clouds. Just beyond the spectral cliffs the sea broke on a long ledge and the spray leaped skyward with lightning rapidity. The phenomena lasted till sunset, and then in the haze slowly faded away. Observers describe the scene as one of unequalled beauty. It is explained by natural causes, but prophecy indicates that a more wondrous sight will yet be manifested with which natural causes will have nothing to do. It is the scene the seer of Patmos saw in prophetic vision when the city of God will descend from Heaven adorned as a bride for her husband. Rev. xxi. 2, 3.

THE GROWING RACE.

In a work recently published in London we are told that between 1870 and 1880 the population of the whole world increased about 9½ per cent. Within the same period the increase in Great Britain was 10½ per cent.; in the United States, 31 per cent.; Canada, 14½; Australia, 46½, and South Africa (of Anglo-Saxon population only) at the enormous rate of 73½ per cent. With the exception of Belgium, where the gain was 11 per cent., most other nations seem to have been nearly at a stand-still. France showed a gain of only 1½ per cent., and Turkey of 2 per cent. The rapid growth of Australia may be judged from the fact that in 1821 New South Wales, the only portion settled to any considerable extent by Anglo-Saxons, had but 29,783 inhabitants; in other parts of the island or continent, perhaps 3,000—say 33,000 in all. In 1881 the population was rated at 2,860,000, a growth of 2,817,000 in 60 years, most of it being within the last 20 years.

The author of the work quoted argues that with such rates of increase it is only a question of time when the Anglo-Saxons, everywhere acknowledged as the dominant race, will have the whole world to themselves.

An earthquake is predicted to take place in Utah in the not very remote future. Professor G. K. Gilbert, U. S. Geologist, published in the Salt Lake Tribune recently a solemn warning that danger exists of a terrible earthquake in the Territory. He says: "From the Warm Springs to Emigration Canon fault scarps or earth fractures in the mountains have not been found, and the rational explanation of their absence is that a very long time has elapsed since their last renewal. In this period the earth strain has been slowly increasing, and some day it will overcome the friction, lift the mountains a few feet, and re-coast on a more fearful scale the catastrophe of Owens Valley." The professor's prediction is based on the theory that something beneath each mountain is slowly, steadily and irresistibly rising, and that in yielding to this force the earth's crust is broken. "The motion at the instant of yielding is so swiftly and so abruptly terminated as to constitute a shock."

THE SUN.
NEW YORK, 1884.

About sixty millions copies of The Sun have gone out of our establishment during the past twelve months.

If you were to paste end to end in two columns of all The Suns printed and sold last year, you would get a continuous strip of interesting information, common sense wisdom, sound doctrine, 1.2 times as long as the distance from Printing House square, as the crow flies, to the top of Mount Copernicus in the moon, and back to Printing House square, and then three quarters of the way back to the moon again.

But The Sun is written for the intelligent of the earth; and same strip of intelligence would girdle the globe twenty-seven or twenty-eight times.

If every buyer of a copy of The Sun during the past year had spent only one hour over it, and if his wife or his grandfather has spent another hour, the newspaper in 1884 has afforded the human race thirteen thousand years of steady reading, night and day.

It is only by little calculations like these that you can form any idea of the circulation of the most popular of American newspapers, or of its influence on the opinions and actions of American men and women.

The Sun is, and will continue to be, a newspaper which tells the truth without fear of consequences, which gets as the facts no matter how much the process costs, and which presents the news of all the world without waste of words and in the most readable shape.

If you know The Sun, you like it strongly, and you will read it with accustomed diligence and profit during what is sure to be the most interesting year in its history. If you do not yet know The Sun, it is high time to get into the sunshine.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. Also a yearly Bible of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

A PLEA FOR TRUE REVIVAL.

PART I.

Revival and reformation in relation to the religion of Christ since its first establishment have ever and anon been considered necessary. More especially has this been the case for the last three or four centuries. Such men as Wickliffe, Luther and Wesley, are more notable instances of this, in their efforts to correct the abuses that prevailed in the professing churches with which they were connected. And even more recently still, with the last hundred years, have farther revivals been attempted with more or less of success. Within the last few years the term "revival" has to a great extent given place to what is termed "evangelistic work," and it is well known that both in America and in Britain at the present time this work is being pushed on with considerable activity. Messrs. Moody and Sankey need only to be named by way of illustration. The fact that such men can attract crowds of people of all classes to their meetings, and even obtaining the patronage of eminent professional ministers, strongly points to the conclusion that the system of gospel preaching which generally obtains in the popular religious bodies is wanting in some essential elements of successful propagandisms.

At a time of revival such as the present, when men's minds become deeply stirred about the things that pertain to their religious interests, it is of the highest importance that there should be a clear understanding of what properly constitutes a true revival of religion. Living as we do in a Protestant age and country, with high ideas of freedom from the doctrinal errors and corrupt practices of a whole millennium of apostasy, it becomes us to look well to our own foundations—to "examine ourselves whether we be in the faith," lest, counting too much on the Reformation of the sixteenth century, we should be found still clinging to the "traditions of the elders," instead of the pure word of the living God, as preached by Jesus and the apostles. Availing ourselves, then, of the fundamental element of Protestantism—the right of private judgment in matters of religion—let us, in the spirit of the noble Bereans, who scrupled not to test even the words of an apostle by a direct appeal to the Scriptures, proceed to enquire what those Scriptures authorize us to desiderate as essential elements in any revival of the religion of Jesus. "The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in heart, that is, the word of faith which we preach; that if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved." The word is nigh us. The Scriptures in our own tongue are in our own hands, even in our mouths and hearts. This is a high privilege and cannot be too highly prized. But, alas! how many are in the position of the accomplished Ethiopian chamberlain, who, with the fifty-third of Isaiah on his tongue, if not in his heart, was constrained to ask—"I pray thee, of whom speaketh the prophet this? of himself, or of some other man?" And how many are deluded with the idea that faith is a supernatural influence which comes by the "vain repetitions" of wild and vehement prayers and praises of ignorant and unbelieving sinners, who "think they will be heard for their much speaking," forgetting that "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." With minds as simple and hearts as ready, may the readers of this piece be as successful in coming to a knowledge of the truth, as the childlike Ethiopian. "To the law and to the testimony," then, let us make our appeal. What is a revival of religion according to the Scriptures?

The only answer which should satisfy a mind bent on knowing the truth, is—the faith and practice of the first disciples. Not the ideas of the nineteenth or any century since the apostles fell asleep, but the "one faith," "the truth as it is in Jesus." Whatever may be the measure of truth possessed by any portion of the professing church, it is surely no disparagement to any party to take the doctrine of the Great Teacher himself, and of those who had the advantage of his personal instruction, with the subsequent enlightening influences of the Holy Spirit, rather than any form of faith of later times. This, moreover, is the course enjoined by the apostles. When certain men had crept in unawares, and threatened to corrupt the infant church about thirty-three years after the ascension of Christ, we find Jude exhorting to "earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints."

In enquiring into this, notice first, that the only gospel publicly preached, that is, proclaimed, was what is styled "the gospel of the kingdom of God," or more briefly, "the kingdom of God." Thus he said—"I must preach the kingdom of God to other cities also; for therefore am I sent." Luke, iv. 43. "Jesus came into Galilee preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God, and saying, The time is fulfilled and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent ye and believe the gospel." Mark i. 14, 15. This was the burden of Jesus' proclaiming to Israel—Repent, or change your minds, and believe the gospel, or good news, concerning the kingdom of God; for that kingdom is at hand. A crisis in the course of events has come; the divine power, after a season of withdrawal, is again put forth—much will depend on the reception my message gets at the hands of the nation as such: in any event see ye to your own salvation—Repent ye and believe the gospel. Such was the preaching of Jesus.

The preaching of the apostles during the Lord's ministry was precisely the same as that of their Master. "He called his twelve disciples together, and gave them power and authority over all demons, and to cure diseases. And he sent them to preach the kingdom of God, and to heal the sick. And they went through the towns preaching the gospel and healing everywhere." Luke ix. This "word of the kingdom" was the good seed which, received into honest and good hearts, brought forth good fruit—Matt. xiii. 19. Hence the solemn declaration of Jesus—"Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child shall not enter therein." Mark x. 15. That is, whosoever shall not receive into an honest and good heart," the "word of the kingdom," as it was proclaimed by our Lord and his apostles, shall not be privileged to enter into that kingdom when it shall be established upon the earth at the second appearing of the Son of man.

But some might be disposed to ask here—Did not Jesus and the apostles at this time publicly preach acceptance through the blood of the cross? Was not the death of Jesus as a sacrifice for sin preached then as well as afterwards? Strange as it may seem, such was not the case. It is true that Jesus frequently taught the necessity of his death—"As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth in him might not perish but have everlasting life." And yet the apostles preached the gospel for two years in ignorance of this, for from that time forth began Jesus to show unto his disciples how that he must go unto Jerusalem and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed and be raised again the third day. Then Peter took him and began to rebuke him, saying, be it far from thee, Lord; this shall not be done unto thee." Mat. xvi. 20-22.

It thus becomes necessary to inquire here as to the nature of that kingdom which we have thus seen to be the grand subject of gospel preaching by Jesus and the apostles.

And first, our Lord, shortly before the conclusion of his ministry, taught that the kingdom of God should not be established until his return from the right hand of God to the earth to judge the world. "He spake a parable because he was nigh to Jerusalem, and because they thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear. He said, therefore, a certain nobleman went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom and to return. And he called his ten servants and delivered them ten pounds, and said unto them, Occupy till I come. ...And it came to pass that when he was returned, having received the kingdom, then he commanded those servants to be called unto him," etc. Those who had been faithful were rewarded, while those who had neglected their duty were punished.

And so Paul—"I charge thee (Timothy) therefore, before God the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and kingdom." 2 Tim. iv. 1. Another distinct testimony to this point by Jesus himself is conclusive: "Ye who have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Mat. xix. 28; also Luke xx. 28-30. If it be asked, When shall the Son of man come in his glory? let Jesus answer—"When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory." Mat. xxv. 31.

These testimonies are submitted as evidence that the kingdom of God preached by Jesus and his apostles is a kingdom to be set up when the Son of man shall come from heaven to reward his faithful followers and punish the wicked. But besides showing this important truth, they plainly teach another of equal importance, namely, that the establishment of the kingdom of God is intimately connected with the restoration of the twelve tribes of Israel. Twice doth our Lord solemnly promise to the twelve apostles that they should sit on thrones and judge the twelve tribes of Israel; a promise which necessitates the gathering of that people to their own land from all the ends of the earth, where they have maintained a distinct existence for from eighteen hundred to nearly three thousand years.

This will farther appear on the consideration of a few other testimonies. In the passage from Luke xxiii, above cited, Jesus says—"I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me." Now, what kingdom has the Father appointed unto Jesus? Listen to the words of the angel to Mary—"He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Luke i. 32, 33. It is reasonable to suppose that this language was intended to be understood by Mary: if so, what other meaning can we conceive her to have put upon it, than that which it most obviously expresses, namely, that her son was to be the promised Messiah, or anointed King of Israel; that in him should be fulfilled those glorious promises made to the nation, and contained in the writings of the prophets. Mary, doubtless, knew that it was declared concerning the last king who sat on David's throne—"Remove the diadem, take off the crown.....I will overturn it, until he comes whose right it is, and I will give it him" (Ezek. xxi. 26, 27.) and also that "the Lord had sworn in truth unto David, Of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne." Taking the announcement of the angel in this its obvious and natural sense, we find that it accords exactly with all the promises of Messiah's kingdom given in the Old Testament. Let one example suffice—almost identical in language—"Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The Mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even forever." The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this." Isa. ix. 6, 7.

It must be evident to the reader that in the rendering "Everlasting Father" here applied to the Messiah, the translators have committed a mistake. The idea is "the founder of the everlasting age" or dispensation. The phrase "mighty God" is quite capable of being rendered "strength of God," and would thus correspond with Paul's language in 1 Cor. i. 24—"Christ the power of God."

It has been asserted that there is no promise of Israel's restoration to their own land, and that a spiritual sense is therefore to be put upon all those predictions of such restoration contained in the Old Testament. In the passages just quoted from the New Testament declaring that Christ and the apostles are to reign over the twelve tribes of Israel, there is no intimation that the language was used in any other than its strictly literal sense. Nor is there any intimation in the whole New Testament that such promises are to be understood in any spiritual sense.

But there are other passages in the New Testament which imply the restoration of Israel to the Holy Land as strongly as those already quoted. For example, Rom. xi.: "And so all Israel shall be saved, as it is written, There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob." The term "saved" here means simply delivered, as the title of the Messiah, "the Deliverer," shows. This is a national and not an individual deliverance, because none but Universalists would maintain that "all Israel" shall be saved in an individual sense. But both Old and New Testaments declare that "all Israel" shall be delivered—and a national sense is that which alone suits the case. That it is the fleshly Israel that is intended is also shown by the way in which the apostle is treating of Israel in relation to the calling of the Gentiles; and the same is evident from the quotation by the apostle of Isaiah lix. without any explanation that he used it in a spiritual sense.

FROM JERUSALEM.

JERUSALEM, Oct. 17, 1883.

Last night was an occasion of great joy and festivity with the Jews, it being the end of "The Feast of the Tabernacles." This feast is strictly kept in Jerusalem. The shops are closed and the people dressed in holiday attire. Each family must build a temporary booth in which they live and sleep during this feast. I visited the synagogue in company with some friends last evening, the largest and finest in the city. I am told that there are thirty synagogues within and without the walls. There must have been between three or four thousand people, men, women and children, who took part in this service, the most impressive part of which was kissing the rolls of the law. These rolls were borne by twelve men, each roll representing one of the twelve tribes. Seven times they passed around, and every man, woman and child kissed the rolls. This they must do once every year. Tiny flags, on which were printed in Hebrew the names of the twelve tribes, were borne in the hands of beautiful children who seem to quite understand the part they take in this most impressive service.

The Jews are quite excited about the canal survey and fully expect to see the fulfillment of God's promise. Mr. Hilpers, a proselyte Jew, is at the head of the expedition. He was here a few nights ago and gave us much information on the subject. He says the company have appropriated fifty thousand dollars for the survey which will occupy four months.

The mission has bought a tract of land for colonizing the refugees. This land lies about four hours from Jerusalem. The mission will send out forty families.

I think I promised your readers that I would tell them something more about our Arabic cooking. I will send a few more recipes.

Stuffed Tomatoes.—Remove as much of the inside of the tomatoes as can be removed without injury to the skin. Any kind of cold meat chopped fine with pepper, salt, and a little parsley and as much butter as you choose. Fill the tomato with the prepared meat and place in a baking dish and bake until done. This is a most delicious dish. Try it. The Arabic for tomato is kendora.

Lentiles and Rice to Cook.—Take one pint of whole lentiles, boil till a little soft, add half as much rice and boil till quite dry. Chop an onion quite fine and fry in butter, with pepper and salt. Pour the butter hot over the lentiles and rice and serve. This is one of the most nutritious dishes that can be cooked and inexpensive and palatable.

Lentil Soup.—Boil the split lentiles till tender; fry one or two onions in butter or beef suet, pour into the soup and cook till done. Salt, pepper, and allspice.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—Second Series. Number 60.

ASCENT OF LEBANON.

The sun had not yet risen over Mount Hor (Num. xxxiv. 7,) when I set out for the Cedars. For nearly two hours I rode along the northern bank of the Kadisha, where it cuts its way through the lower spurs of Lebanon. Then the real ascent commenced. It was no child's play to climb that mountain. The road is a mere goat track; now in a rocky torrent bed, now on the brink of a fearful ravine, now over a slippery crown of naked limestone, now up rude stairs that seem as if "let down from heaven itself." Many a bad and dangerous path I have traveled in Syria, but this was among the very worst. Never before, not even when ascending Hermon, had the mettle and the steadiness of Nezik been more severely tested. I confess, too, that my own nerve was sometimes tried, when I found one stirrup ringing against the overhanging cliff, while the other was suspended over a fathomless abyss. The pass was often such as that which Rogers paints:

"The very path for them that dare defy
Danger, nor shrink, wear what shape he will;
That o'er the caldron, when the flood boils up,
Mane at its sle[illegible]
Its results?
[illegible]rious. Villas
These few thoughts again to the cliffs, or hustling away down in deep secluded
dells—convents, like feudal castles, perched on every airy crag and hilltop—vines springing from chinks in the rock, and sending their long branches in festoons down its jagged sides—ranges of figs and mulberries covering terraces which the hand of industry has formed everywhere from the bottom of the deepest glen to the summit of the highest peak. Little isolated patches, and narrow ribbon-like strips of green corn were there too.
Art and industry, in fact, appeared as if triumphing over nature; while nature itself, in all its magnificent ruggedness, rejoiced in the triumph.

On crowning each successive eminence I looked down with ever increasing wonder and admiration on new scenes of mingled richness and grandeur. It is only under such circumstances, and after such experience, one can thoroughly comprehend the meaning of the prophet when he says, "It shall blossom abundantly, and rejoice even with joy and singing, the glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it;" (Isa. xxxv. 2); or of the Psalmist when he utters the promise, "There shall be an handful of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountains, the fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon." Psalms lxxii. 16.

I spent the night at the village of Ehden, which for beauty might almost pass for an Eden. Beneath the shade of one of its fragrant walnuts I lay the long afternoon gazing dreamily down the mountain side, and away out over the boundless sea. How sweet and fresh on that balmy evening, when the dew began to fall, was "the smell of Lebanon"!

The direct road from Ehden to the Cedars contains nothing of interest, so I rode down in the early morning to Kanobin, the most celebrated of the Maronite convents, and the chief residence of the Patriarch. Its site is singularly romantic. A little above it the glen of the Kadisha contracts to a sublime chasm, its rocky walls rising perpendicularly a thousand feet on each side, and in places not leaving room for a footpath beside the stream that foams along the bottom. On a ledge of one of these stupendous cliffs, partly natural and partly artificial, stands Kanobin. Its church and some of its cells are hewn in the rock; and many a strange and stirring legend is told of the fathers who excavated and inhabited them. The Patriarch was absent, but I was kindly and hospitably received by the monks. In going round their shrines I could not suppress feelings of shame—almost of horror, at the parody of Christianity which is there exhibited. Except in name the church at Kanobin differs little from the shrines of Baal, which probably occupied the same place in the days of the old Giblites.

The road from Kanobin to the Cedars passes through some of the grandest and richest scenery in Lebanon. It winds up the glen of the Kadisha, which gradually expands into terraced slopes, covered with vineyards, and the brilliant foliage of the mulberry. Picturesque cottages, and the mansions of hereditary sheikhs, here grouped together, there scattered singly among gardens and orchards, stud the whole banks. The cultivation is wonderful. Every little dell away down beneath overhanging cliffs, every nook and corner among the jagged rocks, every ledge and cranny on precipice side, which the foot of man can reach, or on which a basket of earth can be deposited, is occupied with vine or patch of grain.

THE CEDARS.

At the head of Wady Kadisha is a vast recess in the central ridge of Lebanon. Round it in a semicircle rise the loftiest peaks of the range, their summits glittering with perpetual snow. The sides of the recess are smooth, white, uniform, and perfectly bare; and in its center, on the top of a limestone knoll, far removed from all other foliage and verdure, stand, in strange solitude, the Cedars of Lebanon. Seen from a distance, the little grove is but a speck on the mountain side; and the first feeling of the pilgrim who has traveled far to visit it is that of bitter disappointment. But when he enters all such feelings vanish. Then the beautiful fan-like branches, and graceful forms of the younger trees, the colossal trunks of the patriarchs, and their great gnarled arms stretching far out to embrace their brethren, and the deep and sombre shade amid that blaze of sunshine—all combine to excite his admiration.

The grove is scarcely half a mile in circuit, and in some places is not dense. It contains only about four hundred trees of all sizes. A dozen of them are very ancient, one or two measuring upwards of forty feet in girth, and the others not much less; but their trunks are short, and are much hacked and hewn by the vandalism of travellers. Thirty or forty others are of very respectable dimensions—three, four, or even five feet in diameter. The younger trees are mostly in the outskirts of the groves, and the patriarchs in the center. The grove would increase were it not that the seedlings are either cropped by goats, or broken by shepherds. At present there are no very young trees.

This was my second visit to the Cedars; and the impression made upon my mind was even deeper than before—probably in part owing to the solitude. My former visit was during the annual feast, when the grove was filled with noise and riot. Now, not a living creature was there, and the snow wreaths still lay deep around the sacred trees. I had ample time to examine their grandeur and beauty, and to meditate on their long and glorious history. And as I looked, I could not wonder that the Hebrews regarded them with almost religious veneration, and that their prophets called them the "trees of the Lord," (Psa. civ. 16), and the place where they grew "the garden of God." Ezek. xxxi. 8. Nor could I wonder that Hebrew poets selected such graceful foliage, and stately forms, and colossal trunks, as emblems of pride, and majesty, and power. "The day of the Lord of hosts," writes Isaiah, "shall be upon every one that is proud and lofty, and upon every one that is lifted up, and he shall be brought low; and upon all the cedars of Lebanon that are high and lifted up." Isa. ii. 12, 13. And Ezekiel says, "Behold, the Assyrian was a cedar in Lebanon with fair branches.... and of a high stature;.... his height was exalted above all the trees of the field," etc. Ezek. xxxi. etc.

As I sat there alone in the Cedar Grove, the Psalmist's magnificent picture of a storm was brought more vividly before my mind than it had ever been before. A huge branch of one of the oldest trees had recently been broken by a tempest, and in its fall had partly destroyed a younger tree. There it lay before my eyes, amid the ruin it had caused, as if to show the power of the storm, and to illustrate the words of the Psalmist. I read the words, looking out as I read, upon those "great waters" whence the voice of the storm came, and upon those mountain sides up which it rolled, and upon those cedars which it broke:

"The voice of Jehovah is upon the waters:
The God of glory thundereth:
Jehovah is upon great waters.
The voice of Jehovah is power;
The voice of Jehovah is majesty.
The voice of Jehovah breaketh the cedars,
Jehovah breaketh the cedars of Lebanon:
He maketh them skip like a calf."
—Psa. xxix. 3-6.

A piece of the broken branch I afterwards obtained and brought to this country; and I retain some of it still in its natural state. Having read many contradictory accounts of the quality and beauty of cedar-wood, I resolved to put it to the test. I gave the branch into the hands of a skillful workman, who made me an ornamental piece of furniture out of a portion of it. He pronounced the wood to be of the first quality—"almost as hard as oak, with a grain as close as box." It takes a high finish, and the carving stands sharp and perfect. In appearance it does not differ much from pine, but its color is deeper and richer. It retains its fragrance as fresh and strong as when first cut. Should any of my readers wish to see genuine cedar-wood from Lebanon, if they will favor me with a visit, I shall feel great pleasure in gratifying them.

THE TEMPLES OF LEBANON.

From the cedars I turned southward, following a path I had travelled before, and have described elsewhere. It was now both difficult and dangerous, for the snow lay deep, and the summer streamlets were converted into foaming torrents.

On the second day I reached the fountain of the Adonis at Afka. It bursts from a cave at the foot of a stupendous cliff, and its foaming waters rush down into a wild chasm. The ruins of the Temple of Venus, built, tradition says, on the spot where Adonis fell, lie strewn over a little mound by the cave's mouth, and some of the massive stones and granite columns are now in the bottom of the torrent bed.

Hence I rode along the flank of Jebel Sunnin, which rose on my left, a spotless pyramid of snow. Passing the upper sources of the Nahr el-Kelb, and the chasm spanned by the natural bridge, I revisited the castle and temples of Fukra. One temple is in part hewn in the rock; another, simple, massive, and grand even in its decoration, is of the oldest type. These were doubtless shrines of Baal or Tammuz, built by the Giblites in remote ages.

Crossing another sublime glen, which sends a little tributary to the Dog River, I clambered up vine-clad slopes to the Greek Convent of Mar Elias, situated on the summit of a cliff commanding a wild and wide panorama of mountain and sea.

After a short stay I again mounted and proceed to Bukfeiya, and received a hospitable welcome in the palace of the Emir, one of the hereditary princes of Lebanon. The site is charming. One would never weary looking down through the vista of the magnificent valley of the Dog River. The gardens, vineyards, fig and olive groves, that encircle the houses and clothe the steep slopes below, bear noble testimony to the fruitfulness of Lebanon. The peaks above the village rise so steeply, and bristle so with pointed rocks, that cultivation is impossible. Yet even there the brilliant foliage of the ilex, which springs out of every rent, contrasts beautifully with the white limestone; while along the serried top of the ridge, where the sandstone crops out, are thickets of pines.—J. L. Porter.

It is impossible for a man to be careless in business affairs, or unmindful of his business obligations, without being weak or rotten in his personal character. Show me a man who never pays his notes when they are due, and who shuns the payment of his bills when it is possible, and I shall see a man whose moral character is, beyond all question, bad.—Dr. Holland.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Dec. 5, 1888.

To correspondence and contributions for our paper we will attend as soon as we can. Some more of the delayed articles will soon find a place in our columns.

BROTHER WEXTHER, in making up the material for his forth-coming work, found that several numbers, as published formerly in THE RESTITUTION, were lost. We have been copying these missing numbers from our file papers. We are happy indeed that we can thus supply the deficiency, and hope soon to announce that his truly able work—The Coming Age; Its Nature and Proximity—is ready in book form.

WILL JERUSALEM BECOME A SEAPORT?

As unlikely as this might appear from the typographical situation of Jerusalem, yet it now seems that, partly by human achievement, and partly by a miraculous earthquake, the mountain city will become a maritime center of commerce with a harbor, which for spaciousness and security will be unrivaled by that of any of the great commercial cities that now concentrate the trade of the world. In another part of our paper we give the latest and fullest account of an enterprize having for its object the construction of a water-way from the Mediterranean Sea to the Red Sea by way of the Jordan valley. To understand the nature of this enterprize more perfectly a short description of this river, and river valley, will aid our readers. The Jordan has its source in the mountain chains of Lebanon. The highest springs are said to be 1,700 feet above the common sea level for the western branch, the Hasbany, and 1,150 feet for the spring heads of the eastern branch. These two streams unite in the Huleh marshes, where the Jordan proper really commences, and which soon enters Lake Huleh, the ancient Merom. After leaving this lake the Jordan flows onward nine miles to the sea of Tiberias, on a grade so rapidly descending that the level of its waters in this lake is 653.3 feet below the Mediterranean.

From this latter inland sea the river flows still onward through a deep valley, or Ghor, in a course so tortuous, that in the distance of 60 miles on a direct line, it traverses, in its windings from one edge of the valley to the other a no less distance than 200 miles, plunging over 27 formidable rapids, as well as numberless others less precipitous. It finally enters the Dead Sea, at its northern extremity, which is depressed 1,316 feet below the Mediterranean. From its sources in the Libanus ranges its entire course, on a direct line is about 120 miles; while the entire fall from the spring-heads of the Hasbany is 3,000 feet, while the fall of the eastern branch is about 2,450 feet.

Jerusalem is situated on a broad mountain ridge, the highest part of the city being 2,610 feet and the lowest about 2,400 above the sea level. At the point where the valleys of the Kidron and of Hinnom meet near Job's well, the elevation is less than 2,000 feet. Allowing the Jordan Valley to be filled up to the level of the Mediterranean the surface would be found to be about 880 feet below the level of the city. This level down the rapidly descending valley of the Kidron would soon be reached. But the prophet Zechariah, xiv. 4-8, seems to give the final outcome of the problem of making Jerusalem a seaport and commercial center.

God will work wonders, as in days of old, when he restores the scattered tribes to their own land. In the wonderful developments of the future it may come to pass that a river that has never been navigable, that has been for ages flowing into a sea that never had a port, a river rising from those springs of purity fed by the melting snowfields and ice of Lebanon, and well named — יַרְדֵּן — The Yarden, i. e., The Descender, may be that river whose "streams shall make glad the city of God." See Psalms xlvi., xlvii., and xlviii. Ezekiel shows that the waters of that sea "of unfathomable brine" shall be healed by the influx of a river (two rivers margin of v. 9) upon whose banks groves of fadeless, ever-fruitful trees shall flourish. Ch. xlvii. 1-12. When the exploring party shall have finished the preliminary survey, we shall have something more definite, as respects cost and other matters.

IMPORTANT IF TRUE.

From the November number of the Prophetic Times we copy the following as a response to questions that have been proposed to us relative to this discovery. It is all we know about the matter. It may turn out to be a sensational piece of news, and, as we live in an age of wonderful discovery, it may turn out to be true. Timbers frozen in ice would last thousands of years:

NOAH'S ARK.

A correspondent of the Levant Herald, at Trebisond, announces the return of commissioners sent by the Turkish Government to inquire into the reported destruction by avalanches of Moshul, Ashak, and Bayasid, and to afford relief to the sufferers. He reports that "The expedition was fortunate in making a discovery that can not fail to interest the whole civilized world. For among the fastnesses of one of the glens of Mount Ararat they came upon a gigantic structure of very dark wood, embedded at the foot of one of the glaciers, with one end protruding. This they believed to be the old Ark, in which Noah and his family navigated the waters of the deluge. The place where the discovery was made is about five days' journey from Trebizond, in the department of Van, in Armenia, about four leagues from the Persian frontier. The way led through a dense forest, and the travellers were obliged to follow the course of the stream, walking sometimes up to the waist in water; but they were rewarded by the sight of a huge dark mass projecting 20 or 30 feet from the glacier on the left side of the ravine. It is formed of a wood not grown in these elevated districts, nor nearer than in the hot valleys of the Euphrates, where it is known by the natives as 'Islm.' This is said to be the Gopher wood of Scripture. It was in a good state of preservation, being painted or stained on the outside with a dark brown pigment and constructed of great strength. The projecting portion seemed about 40 feet or 50 feet in height; but to what length it penetrated into the glacier, they could form no estimate. Effecting an entrance through one of the broken corners, the explorers found it filled for the greater part with ice, the interior being partitioned off into compartments of about 12 to 15 feet high. Into three of these they were able to make their way. The commissioners, one of whom is an Englishman, Capt. Gascoigne, formerly attached to the British Embassy, and well known as a scientific investigator—are confident that it is the Ark of Noah, which has been preserved under the accumulated snow and ice."—Methodist (London.

THE DRIFT.

We take the selection below from Messiah's Herald. We do this more particularly to show that the attention of the Jewish people is being turned toward the grand problem of our age—restoration to their own land. The rightful King of the Jews is now at God's right hand in heaven, but whether or some eminent Jew may come into possession of a short rule over this people remains to be seen.

KING OF THE JEWS.

A correspondent of the Boston Traveller, writing from Washington, Oct. 28, in giving some "pen pictures of Treasury Department officials," relates the following:—

"Hon. J. J. Noah, one of the most distinguished Israelites in this section of the country, told me of an interesting affair which occurred in this city not long ago. Said he: 'One evening a gentleman called at my house while I was absent, and handed his card, on which was engraved, "John Morrison Hunter, M. D." He said to my wife that he desired to see me on important business, and finally, while awaiting my coming, he divulged the object of his errand. Said he: "I have made the subject of the restoration of the Jews to Palestine an especial study for many years. I have been, and am now, possessed of a fortune large enough to supply me funds necessary to carry out my intentions, and I wish to see Mr. Noah on a matter which I am sure will prove of the greatest interest and value to him. The great problem of Europe now is where to find a neutral power adequate to replace the Turkish Empire. There is none so well suited for the purpose as the Hebrew people. They represent all nations, and that is their native soil; and, further, I would point out that the real key to India is across Palestine to the Persian Gulf, (in part by an elevated railway, such as we have in New York,) or else by the river Euphrates. I have travelled all over Europe trying to enlist prominent Israelites in the project. I saw Sir Moses Montifiore, who assured me that he was in full sympathy with my objects, but that he was too old to give the matter the attention it deserved. We both agreed that the chief difficulty lay in the fact that there was no King of the Jews.' I asked him to take it, but he plead the infirmities of age. Then I visited Baron Rothschild, and he said that in view of the fact that he was loosing so much money to European monarchs, and that his interests were all centered there, that he would rather maintain his present position of the 'Jew of the Kings' than to 'be King of the Jews.' I then came back to the United States, and upon looking over the list of distinguished Hebrews I came to that of your husband, who I learned is the eldest son of the late Hon. M. M. Noah and of the house of David." Dr. Hunter remained in Washington some time and one day we met. He then explained his project more fully to me, and at the same time spoke about his interest in the subject of aerial navigation, the solving of which, he said, would limit the bounds of all human invention. He left me a paper containing prophecies from the Scripture on the twin subjects of aerial navigation and the restoration of Palestine to the Jews, and urged me to accept the crown and seat of David. I told him that I was a native American, a believer in the rights and forms of our government, and that it would be repugnant to my tastes and inclination to enter into the king business at my time of life. He left me a copy of his poem entitled 'The storm,' as a sort of revenge for my ingratitude. I would read it to you, but I value your friendship too highly."

THE JORDAN VALLEY CANAL.

HAIFA, Oct. 27.—Some time ago I described to you the nature of the concession which had been obtained by some capitalists at Beyrout for the construction of a railway from Haifa to Damascus, and of the survey of the line which had already been completed half way to the latter city. The matter has been the subject of a good deal of financial intrigue, and the capital which was sought for in London has not been forthcoming in consequence. A new element of uncertainty has just been imported into the project by the agitation created by the proposal to connect the Red Sea with the Mediterranean by means of a ship canal, which, commencing at Haifa, should be cut through the plain of Esdraelon to the valley of the Jordan, letting the waters of the Mediterranean into the Ghor, as that valley is called, and connecting the lower end of the Dead Sea with the Red Sea by a canal which should [illegible] touch at Akaba [illegible] pushing down such a steep incline in a distance of 100 miles. It is not, however, proposed to let the full force of the ocean in from this end. The operation of flooding the Jordan valley would be commenced at Haifa; from this point to the sea level in the Ghor is only twenty-five miles. The highest point in the plain of Esdraelon is 167 feet above the sea. Through this it is proposed to cut a canal 200 feet wide and forty feet deep. The volume of water thus let in, it is calculated, would be regulated to an inflow which would equal about twenty Jordans, and, allowing for evaporation, it is estimated that in five years the Dead Sea and the whole valley of the Jordan would be submerged to the sea level.

The effect of this submergence would be, of course, to bury the Dead Sea under 1,200 feet of Ocean, and to create an inland sea about ninety miles long and from four to six wide. Jericho, Belsan (the ancient Bethshean), and Tiberias would be the principal places submerged, besides a few small villages. With the exception of Tiberias, none of these are, however, of any importance. Tiberias contains a population of over 8,000, chiefly Jews, and a Latin and Greek monastery. Apart from the question of compensating this population, and paying for the fertile lands which they occupy, a very important political question comes into consideration. The French have been the protectors of the Latin monastery at Tiberias from time immemorial, and the Russians occupy the same position with regard to the Greek monastery. Are these two powers, whose interests would be in different ways vitally affected by the success of the scheme, likely to be induced to consent to it by any proposal of pecuniary indemnification? Its success would utterly ruin the Suez canal, and almost extinguish French influence in Syria, while Russia, which now aims at the annexation of Palestine and the occupation of Jerusalem, where her influence is at this moment greater than that of any other European nation, would find herself practically cut off from it by an inland sea, the private property of her traditional enemy. In both countries the Governments could appeal to the religious sentiments of the people to support them in resisting even to a war if necessary, the flooding of the holy places at Tiberias, which it may have guarded for so many centuries.

Nor would this sentimental feeling be confined to France and Russia. Even in England and America there would be a strong objection to the Lake of Tiberias, with the historic sites of Capernaum and the other cities on its margin, which were the scenes of some of the most remarkable ministrations of our Lord, being buried 600 feet deep beneath the sea. Curiously enough, the project is no less keenly supported by one set of religionists than it is condemned by the other. The former, and doubtless the six clergymen of the surveying party are among the number, pin their faith to the prophecy contained in the 47th chapter of Ezekiel, 8th to 10th verses, where it is predicted that "fishers shall stand upon the sea from En-gedi even unto En-eglaim," which would only be possible if this scheme were carried out. If it is found to be feasible it will therefore become a cause of political as well as of religious strife.

The sanguine supporters of the scheme maintain that it can be accomplished for eight millions sterling, while its opponents have entered upon an elaborate calculation to prove that the lowest figure is £225,573,648 and some odd shillings. Supposing, as seems not impossible, that the one set prove too little, and the other too much, if it could be done for fifty millions sterling it would pay a fair interest. The last year's receipts of the Suez canal, which cost twenty millions, were £4,800,000. The whole length of the canal would be 250 miles, of which, however, only about 120 would be actual cutting, but cutting of a nature unparalleled in the history of engineering. My own impression is that, both from a political and an engineering point of view, it will be found to be impracticable; but who can say in these days what science may not accomplish or what combinations of the Eastern question may not arise to remove political difficulties.—*N. ### The Sensible Goat.

A thoughtless Welshman, with a thirsty throat—
So goes the tale—possessed a favorite goat
Who followed him, when once to play the sot
He sought the taproom and the foamy pot.
He gave her drink, when, by the cheerful blaze,
Strangely forgetting all her sober ways,
She reeled about and rolled upon the floor
As never goat had rolled about before.
The giggling topers so enjoyed the sight
That they would have the fun another night.
The Welshman took her, but the goat, alas!
The portal of the pothouse would not pass.
Her master (wisely) tied every mode.
Though pats and punches freely were bestowed.
The landlord swore, and did the best, they say,
But all in vain, for Nanny won the day;
Cursing and cussing, both alike the bore,
Nor could they get her through the pothouse door.
The wondering Welshman, now no longer blind,
Pondered the thing a moment in his mind,
Then prudently adopted, in the end,
The wise example of his shaggy friend,
Forsook the pothouse, and reformed his plan,
And from that hour became a sober man.
Ye drunkards all, this prudent lesson follow,
Or own, in sense, a goat has beat you hollow.

Believing, But Not Understanding.

"I will not believe anything but what I understand," said a self-confident young man in a hotel one day.

"Nor will I," said another.

"Neither will I," chimed in a third.

"Gentlemen," said one who sat close by, "do I understand you correctly, that you will not believe anything that you don't understand?"

"I will not," said one, and so said each one of the trio.

"Well," said the stranger, "in my ride this morning I saw some geese in a field eating grass; do you believe that?"

"Certainly," said the three unbelievers.

"I also saw the pigs eating grass; do you believe that?"

"Of course," said the three.

"And I saw sheep and cows eating grass; do you believe that?"

"Of course," was again replied.

"Well, but the grass which they had formerly eaten had by digestion turned to feathers on the backs of the geese to bristles on the backs of the swine, to wool on the sheep, and on the cows it had turned to hair; do you believe that, gentlemen?"

"Certainly they replied.

"Yes, you believe it," he rejoined, "but do you understand it?"

They were confounded, and silent, and ashamed.

The Uncouth Stranger.

Some years ago there arrived at the Cataract House, Niagara Falls, an odd-looking man whose appearance and deportment were quite in contrast with the crowds of well-dressed and polished figures which adorned that celebrated resort. He seemed to have just sprung from the woods; his dress, which was made of leather, stood dreadfully in need of repair, apparently not having felt the touch of a needle for many a long month. A worn-out blanket, that might have served for a bed, was buckled to his shoulders; a large knife hung on one side, ballanced by a long, rusty tin box on the other, and his beard, uncropped, tangled and coarse, fell down upon his bosom, as if to counterpoise the weight of the thick dark locks that supported themselves on his back and shoulders. This being, strange to the spectators, seemingly half-civilized, half savage, pushed his steps into the sitting-room, unstrapped his little burden, quietly looked around for the landlord, and then modestly asked for breakfast.

The host at first drew back with evident repugnance to receiving this uncouth form among his genteel visitors, but a few words whispered in his ear satisfied him; and the stranger took his place in the company, some shrugging their shoulders, some staring, some laughing outright. Yet there was more in that one man than in the whole company. He had been entertained with distinction at the tables of princes; learned societies, to which the like of Cuvier belonged, had bowed down to welcome his presence; kings had been complimented when he spoke to them; in short, he was one whose fame will be growing brighter when the fashionables who laughed at him, and many much greater than they, shall have been forgotten. From every hill-top and deep, shady grove, the birds, those blossoms of the air, will sing his name. The little wren will pipe it with her matin hymn; the oriole will carol it from the slender grasses of the meadows; the turtle-dove roll it through the secret forests; the many-voiced mocking-bird pour it along the air; and the imperial eagle, the bird of Washington, as he sits far up on the blue mountains, will scream it to the tempest and the stars. He was John J. Audubon, ornithologist, who knew more about birds than any other man of his age, or perhaps of any age, and whose magnificent volumes, with their pictures of birds, drawn and described by his own hand, are a standing monument of his genius, skill, and industry.

The Inspiration of the Bible.

God's word declares the end from the beginning. It is not only the chart which guides each weary wanderer to his own eternal rest, but it is the record of the great plan and purpose of the Almighty concerning the world which he has made and the church which he has redeemed. It unfolds God's everlasting purpose, as manifested in Jesus Christ; and if one will read three chapters at the beginning of the Bible and three at the end, he will be struck with the correspondence which there exists.

At the beginning of the Bible we find a new world: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." At the end of the Bible we find a new world: "I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away." At the beginning, we find Satan entering to deceive and destroy; at the end, we find Satan cast out, "that he should deceive the nations no more." At the beginning, sin and pain and sorrow and sighing and death find entrance into the world; at the end there shall be no more pain nor sorrow, no sighing, and no more death. At the beginning, the earth, for man's transgression, is cursed with thorns and thistles; at the end, "there shall be no more curse: but the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it." At the beginning, we find the tree of life in paradise, from which the sinner is shut away by a flaming sword, lest he eat and live forever; at the end, we find the tree of life again "in the midst of the paradise of God," and the blessed and the blood-washed ones have a right to the tree of life, and "enter in through the gates of the city." At the beginning, man was beneath the dominion of death and the grave; at the end, "the dead, small and great, stand before God" "the sea gives up its dead, and death and hell are destroyed in the lake of fire. At the beginning, the first Adam lost his dominion over earth, and was driven out of the garden of Eden in shame and sorrow; at the end, we find the second Adam victorious over sin and death and hell, enthroned as King and Lord of all, and reigning in triumph and glory forever.

Now, when you get the plan of this book, you find that it is something more than a book of detached sentences, good maxims, and comforting words. It is a book which unfolds the divine purpose, and reveals not only the way of salvation, but it marks the pathway of the people of God through this wilderness, and reveals the destiny of the world which he has made and the church which he has redeemed.

When we look at these facts, we see that this is no man's book. When Columbus discovered the river Orinoco, some said he had found an island. He replied: "No such river as that flows from an island. That mighty torrent must drain the waters of a continent." So this book comes, not from the empty hearts of impostors, liars, and deceivers; it springs from the eternal depths of divine wisdom, love and grace. It is the transcript of the divine mind, the unfolding of the divine purpose, the revelation of the divine will. God help us to receive it, to believe it, and be saved through Christ our Lord.—From a lecture by H. L. Hastings.

A CHRISTIAN CHARACTER.

The creed of eighteen centuries is not about to fade away like an exhalation, nor are the new lights of science so exhilarating that serious persons can look with comfort to exchanging one for the other. Christianity has abler advocates than its professed defenders, in those many quiet and humble men and women who in the light of it and the strength of it live holy, beautiful and self-denying lives. The God that answers by fire is the God whom mankind will acknowledge; and so long as the Spirit continues to be visible in charity, in self-sacrifice, in those graces which raise human creatures above themselves and invest them with the beauty of holiness which only religion confers, thoughtful persons will remain convinced that with them in some form or other is the secret of truth.—James Anthony Froude.

MISSIONARY FUND.

We, as a people, have never had any system for missionary work. It is very desirable that a plan be adopted through which all can contribute to both home and foreign missionary work. To this end, the Publication Association has concluded to establish a missionary fund, to which all may contribute. The plan is this. Any one can send to THE RESTITUTION such amount as they may desire to contribute, and have the paper sent to such person or persons as they may name. Or they can send the money and leave Brother Chaplin to use it in sending the papers to such persons as he may think best. The Free-Will offerings sent out many missionaries, in the shape of RESTITUTIONS. These missionaries went into the families of persons who were hungry for the truths of the glorious gospel, and I have no doubt will be as bread cast upon the waters. When we sit down at our firesides, with our families gathered around, and take up THE RESTITUTION and read the encouraging reports from brethren residing in different parts of the world, the glorious promises made by God to his children, the signs of the times indicating the near approach of the time when our dear Redeemer will return again to this earth, bringing with him the reward of the saints, do we not feel that we would like to be the instrument of gladdening the hearts of others by putting THE RESTITUTION into their hands that they might read and understand these beautiful truths, and learn the road that leads to everlasting life, that the angels in heaven may rejoice over one more sinner who hath repented, and another star added to our crown?

This is not a vain undertaking. We know that every dollar spent will bring in, some thirty, some sixty, and some an hundred fold. It is more blessed to give than to receive.

Oh! let us remember the words of Christ, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

How we admire Paul's effort to convert King Agrippa! There are millions of souls in the world just as valuable as Agrippa and who would more readily accept and obey the truth. Then let us work while it is day, for the night cometh wherein no man can work. Our time is short, and what we do must be done quickly. Do not put it off until next year or next month. We may never see next year. Now is the accepted time. The harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few.

GOD KNOWS.

Think it not strange, Beloved, if there come
Dark lines across the vista of thy years;
All days cannot be bright, there must be some
In which the rain shall fall, as fall thy tears.
Within the shadows fragrant beauty grows;
God knows, God knows.

Think it not strange if trials should arise
When thou art least expecting grief or pain;
Perhaps these are God's angels in disguise,
Some day such mystery will be made plain.
A list of suffering thy Savior chose;
God knows, God knows.

Think it not strange if human friendship fail,
If those for whom you toil, spurn all your deeds;
Kneel at the throne of grace and there prevail,
Love for her enemies still interceded.
Into the praying soul fresh comfort flows,
God knows, God knows.

Think it not strange when evil words have gored
Thy tender heart, or filled thy breast with fear;
The servant shall not be above his Lord.
He, who in all these points was tempted here,
Shall yet deliver thee from all thy foes;
God knows, God knows.

Think it not strange, beloved, but rejoice
That thou art counted worthy thus to bear
The sufferings of Christ. Child of his choice,
Think of his reign, the glory you shall share;
And let thy heart upon these words repose,
God knows, God knows.

CLOTHED, UNCLOTHED, CLOTHED UPON.—2 Cor. v. 1-4.

This passage in Paul's writings has been a fruitful source of controversy upon the question of the state of the believer in death. By many it is taken to declare, with unmistakable clearness, the hope of going immediately to heaven at death. Let us confess that, approaching it with one's mind full of the traditional teaching on the immortality of the soul, it seems at first to support such an idea. It is right to add, however, that if the passage does teach the hope of the believer to be immediate transit to glory after death, it must do so at the expense of any further doctrine of resurrection.

What we mean is amply shown by a glance at the metrical "paraphrase" of the passage in current use in Scotland, which represents its teaching to be as follows:—

Soon shall this earthly frame, dissolv'd,
In death and ruins lie;
But better mansions wait the just,
Prepared above the sky.

An house eternal, built by God,
Shall lodge the holy mind;
Whence once these prison walls have fall'n
By which 'tis now confined.

House, burden'd with a weight of clay,
We groan beneath the load,
Waiting the hour which sets us free,
And brings us home to God.

We know, that when the soul, uncloth'd,
Shall from this body fly,
T'will animate a purer frame
With life that cannot die.

Such are the hopes that cheer the just;
These hopes their God hath given;
His Spirit is the earnest now,
And seals their souls for heav'n.

If the "disembodied soul" is at once to "animate a purer frame," as taught in this hymn, it is hard to see what place "the resurrection of the dead" need have, or, indeed, can have, among "the hopes that cheer the just;" or how even the traditional faith in the reunion of soul and body at the last day" can longer be maintained, unless the "purer frame" in spite of its being "animated with life which cannot die," is in turn to be got rid of by a new process of disembodiment.

Let our orthodox friends see to it, whether the error of Hymeneus and Philetus, who said the resurrection was past already, or the unsubstantial doctrine of Swendenborg and the modern spiritualists, be not lurking, unsuspected, amid their favorite songs of praise.

If, however, in looking at the passage, we can divest ourselves of the preconceived theories of human creeds and hymns, we cannot fail to notice one or two points of great importance in order to a proper understanding of the hope set forth by the apostle. We shall not attempt a detailed exposition but content ourselves with a few suggestive notes.

The language of the apostle is, throughout, highly figurative, but its essential points are most easily to be gathered from a consideration of the three leading terms which he employs, viz., "clothed," "unclothed," and "clothed upon." Unless we note the distinction between each of these terms, we shall fail to apprehend the apostle's intention.

Thinking of the present, transient and mortal state, he describes it as a tent, or tabernacle, a temporary covering and protection, with which we may be said to be "clothed." The description seems to take in more than merely the mortal body of humanity; it seems to embrace the whole perishable surroundings of the present state, "the things which are seen and temporal," chap. iv. 18. It may suffice, however, to think of it meanwhile as applying exclusively to the frail death-doomed body which each of us bears about from day to day. To be alive in this mortal condition is to be clothed.

But this being a merely transitory state, it is liable to be dissolved. To be deprived of this frail, temporary, tent-like protection, without any other being substituted for it, would be to be unclothed. In other words, according to the apostle, the death-state is a condition of nakedness.

How then does the apostle view the comparative desirability of these two conditions?

The present mortal state is described as fleeting, frail, and unsatisfactory. It is more. It is grievous and burdensome. "We who are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened." To be "clothed" is to be burdened.

Does he then long to be "unclothed?" The paraphrase makes out that he does; that he anxiously waits for the hour when the imprisoned soul should be set free from its burden of clay, and wing its flight above the sky. But how strange a version—or rather perversion—of what the apostle does say, "We do groan, being burdened; not for that we would be unclothed!" The statement is unambiguous. The apostle had no desire to die. We do not at present discuss whether he believed the death-state to be one of unconsciousness or not. We only point out that, to his mind, to be in the flesh with all its imperfections was preferable. To be "clothed might imply being burdened and dissatisfied; but to be dead was to be stripped and naked, and for that he had no desire whatever.

But the apostle longed for a change of some kind. What was it? "In this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house, which is from heaven." Here again the paraphrase has missed the apostle's meaning. It represents him as waiting to be transferred, as a disembodied soul, to a better mansion in the heavens. But he speaks, not of going to that eternal house which is now in heaven, but of its coming to him—"our house which is from heaven" (Greek—"out of heaven.") The "eternal house," like "the house of this tabernacle," seems to refer to more than the mere body of humanity. It seems to comprise the better inheritance viewed as a whole, "the things which are not seen and eternal," chap. iv. 18. But as it certainly includes the idea of an immortal nature for the believer, we shall again confine our thoughts to that aspect of the matter.

The apostle anxiously longs for that immortality which he knew would be brought to him out of heaven, when that Savior for whom he looked should return. But he longs for more. He wishes to be clothed upon, to be over-clothed. This strange but expressive phrase, means more than to be made immortal. It means to be made immortal without undergoing death. To be clothed upon is to be found alive and be changed to immortality.

This is very evident from the connection in which it is found in the passage, and from the composition of the term itself. The apostle had no wish to put off his clothing. This he distinctly affirms. But he ardently desired that it were given him to put on, over it, the heavenly raiment, which should swallow up the imperfections of the old; that mortality might be swallowed up of life, not merely exchanged, but engulfed and for ever done away!

This could only happen to one found still alive at the coming of Christ; to one who had not been "unclothed;" and it is this possibility which is expressed in verse 3, although obscured by most translations. The natural reading of the verse is, "If so be that clothed, not naked, we shall be found," and it is so given in the American Revision of 1872. The idea is clear enough if we remember what the apostle means by "clothed," as distinct from "clothed upon." It is, as we have seen, to be alive in mortal flesh. Verses 2 and 3, then, convey the apostle's desire thus:

"In this we groan, earnestly desiring to be *over*clothed with our house which is from heaven, if so be (at that day) we shall be found (still) clothed (i. e., among those who are alive and remain) and not naked (i. e., among the sleeping saints)."

So far from anticipating or desiring any rapture in a disembodied state, his fondest wish was, never to suffer disembodiment at all! He knew, indeed, that whatever befel him, whether awake or asleep at the Lord's coming, he was sure of putting on that immortal nature reserved in heaven for him. But the sweet possibility filled his thoughts to the exclusion of other desires, that the eternal life might overshadow and enfold him in its blessed embrace, while he was still in possession of the mortal life. Or, perhaps, he wrote thus for the sake of those who might come after, that they too might cherish this dear desire, knowing that to some company of saints, in God's own time, it would come true.

"Behold I shew you a secret: We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we (who are found alive) shall be changed," 1 Cor. xv. 51, 52.

Thrice happy they who, like Paul can be assured that, whether awake or asleep, they shall live together with their glorious Lord when he appeareth!

—M. W. Strang, in Messenger.

"Conybeare and Howson also translate and explain it thus: "If, indeed, I shall be found clad, and not stripped of my clothing;" i. e., "if, at the Lord's coming, I shall be found still living in the flesh."

PHENOMENAL.

THE FIRES OF SUNSET—THE SOUTH-WEST SKY AFLAME AT SUNSET—POUGHKEEPSIE CALLS OUT THE FIREMEN.

New Yorkers were treated yesterday to an altogether unusual and mysterious sunset. It caused everybody to ask everybody else what the matter was with the sky. The phenomenon began about 4½ o'clock, after the globe of the sun had descended behind the housetops. At first it diffused a mellow white light that spread over the western sky like a haze. The light gradually spread towards the south, and changed to a pale lemon yellow, that grew deeper and richer and filled the sky with a brilliant glow. This lasted for nearly a quarter of an hour, and then the color changed to a vivid crimson, which became more and more fiery until the sky looked as though it were ablaze with the reflection of a great fire in the harbor.

People scurried toward the Battery and the North River front, to see where the fire was. From the Brooklyn bridge at this time the spectacle was indeed very wonderful. The red glow spread over the water from shore to shore until it became a mass of red. A section of fifteen degrees of the horizon in the southwest was of such a fiery and blazing color that hundreds lingered to watch it, and the bridge policemen were kept busy answering questions about it. Not one person in twenty who saw it was willing to believe that it was sunset.

Telephone bells rang in the Staten Island and Bayonne offices, and voices from New York demanded to know, "Where is the fire?" The last two or three clear evenings displayed sunsets of something the same sort, but not nearly so vivid.

POUGHKEEPSIE, Nov. 27.—The Fire Department was called out at 5½ o'clock this evening because of an illumination in the southwestern part of the sky. The heavens from the horizon nearly up to the zenith were covered with a red glare, as though from an extensive conflagration. Telegrams from different points tell of the same phenomenon.

The surprising sunset spectacle of Tuesday evening was in part repeated last evening, but in a much less striking form, and the display also lasted a much shorter time. The red glow did not entirely disappear from the western heavens on Tuesday until about an hour and a half after sunset. It is a singular fact, considering the extraordinary nature of the phenomenon, that on the evening of Nov. 9 a similar appearance was seen after sunset in Surrey, England. On that occasion the atmospheric glow lasted an hour and forty minutes after the disappearance of the sun, and it was also followed the next evening by a less brilliant and briefer display of the same sort. The probability that the phenomenon of Tuesday night and its modified repetition last night were similar in origin to the appearances seen in England is very strong. The cause was undoubtedly in the atmosphere, but whether it was the result of an abnormal condition of the air itself, producing extraordinary refractive effects, or of the presence of some reflecting matter in the upper regions of the atmosphere can not perhaps be definitely settled.

One explanation of the phenomenon which was put forth yesterday was that a bank of clouds happened to be so placed that it intercepted the rays of sunlight which would otherwise have passed high above our heads, and reflected them upon the city. The fact that the same phenomenon was witnessed in Poughkeepsie, in Hartford, and in Boston would alone suffice to dispose of that theory, even if there were no other objections to it. But the ordinary phenomena of sunset are well understood, and it is evident that some very unusual condition of things must have existed in the atmosphere to produce the appearances that were witnessed. Cirrus clouds floating at an enormous height sometimes greatly prolong the visibility of the sunset colors, but if the red glow of Tuesday night was caused by reflective matter in the upper portion of the atmosphere, that matter must have been at a greater height than clouds are known to reach.

The suggestion that it might have been meteoric dust is at least an interesting one. The atmosphere for several days has presented a more or less hazy appearance, and during the last four or five weeks meteors in unusual numbers have been seen both in this country and England. The earth has also only recently passed across the track of the November meteors. That meteoric dust may be found at a height very much greater than that which the lightest clouds ever reach is apparent when we consider that most meteors are consumed a hundred miles or more above the surface of the earth, and the products of their combustion find their way slowly down through the atmosphere. It is not impossible, also, that the earth in its journey through space, sometimes encounters meteoric matter which is already in the condition of dust, and which slowly filters down through the air.

Whatever the cause may be, there have been some most surprising atmospheric phenomena in the last two or three months in several quarters of the globe. India, Ceylon, and South America have recently been treated to the spectacle of a green sun and a green moon, and now in more northern countries we are having the evening skies set aflame with strange reflections. The inhabitants of the earth sometimes behold marvellous sights in their travels through the universe under the guidance of the journeying sun.—N. Y. Sun, Nov. 27, 28.

BIBLE RESEARCH.

Up to about ten years ago, both the etymology and the accurate meaning of the words Pharisee and Sadducee were much discussed and much disputed. In 1874, Wellhausen, then a comparatively unknown but promising young teacher, published a pamphlet, "Pharisaer und Sadducaer," and for the first time gave a satisfactory solution of the problem. The views which he promulgated have found almost universal acceptance among the best of scholars, and hence are now the common property of biblical investigation. According to Wellhausen the separation of these two factions and their antagonism did not arise originally from a difference in religious principles and convictions, but from a difference in their stations of life. The Sadducees or "Zadokites," are the aristocratic high-priest party; so called after Zadok, the head of this party. They constitute the nobility, and under the ascendancy of the Asmoneans and the establishment of their kingdom, are the chief support of the latter. They occupied the positions of honor and power in the political government. The Pharisees, on the other hand, must be identified with the scribes and Chasidim party of older days. Over against the Sadducees, who would rather study politics than the law of God, and who, as a consequence, were rather men of the world and its pleasures, and entertained loose views, they gradually became a distinct party. While, then, the Sadducees are in possession of political influence, the Pharisees managed to become the religious leaders of the people. The name Pharisee (פְּרוּשִׁים) they received because, as the strict party of the law, they separated themselves from the vulgar and unclean multitude. In the course of time they became a purely religious party; and in them Christ finds the strongest opposition. In his day they are the representatives of orthodox Jewish theology, while the Sadducees are political leaders, endeavoring above all to establish and foster the national and political interests of Israel, and for that reason do not fear intercourse with those who are not of the seed of Abraham. This historical bird's eye view which Wellhausen has drawn, and which has received some finishing touches from other authors in the last decade, is doubtless a faithful representation. The growth of the spirit of these parties can be traced with more or less accuracy in the history and literature of the three centuries between the Old and the New Testaments.—N. Y. Independent.

"When the enemy cometh in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him," (or put him to flight—Margin). Isa. lix. 19.

In reading this text over it seems to have at least some application to our present position as the Church of God, for surely the enemy is coming in and assailing all points of our faith; therefore it behooves us as wise servants, as faithful soldiers in our Master's cause, to see to it that the Spirit of the Lord—his blessed word placed in our hands—be not hindered or beclouded in lifting up to the world the life-giving standard. But let us see to it that that standard be lifted up just as intended by the "Captain of our salvation."

Brother C. Colegrove, in THE RESTITUTION of Nov. 21, suggests the propriety of re-examining texts treating on the subjects of penalty and judgment, or post mortem probation. This it would seem is a wise and timely thought, inasmuch as there are so many Bible students of to-day who loudly advocate such views, and so many papers are being published in the special interest of such a theory. Either there is, or is not, a future probation for all the sons of men. The Bible cannot teach both views, and it does most assuredly teach the destiny as well as the origin of our race.

I will not here attempt to prove or disprove either position, but beg to make a few suggestions which it might be well to consider duly before coming to any conclusion:

1. Did God create Adam with voluntary powers—a free, undeveloped being, with power to form whatever character he chose? or,

2. Did he create him an involuntary machine, irresponsible for what he did, and destined to be used only as an instrument, to be acted upon by other influences, over which he had no control, and against which he had no power of resistance?

3. If he was made a free will agent can there be any injustice in either him or his posterity receiving the inevitable results of the choice he voluntarily made?

4. Are either the past or present generations of mankind any more the direct creation of God than were and are the generations of the lower orders of animals? Do they not all come into existance, and go out of existence by the same law? viz: Nature, which in the beginning was ordained by God, and then left to be carried on down through successive ages without any direct interposition; or,

5. Does a God of purity, love, justice, wisdom, and power, make use of the vilest means the heart can conceive to bring into existence the future subjects of his glorious kingdom? or, rather,

6. Do not these come into existence simply through nature's law, and do they not pass out of life according to the same, or rather another law of the same controling power, simply because they have inherited from their progenitor a dying nature?

7. Is God's character in the least tarnished because he permitted freedom of choice, and the choice of necessity brought with it certain inevitable results?

These few thoughts are humbly submitted in the spirit of Christ, by your sister,

CARRIE WILLIAMS.

OBITUARY.

DIED—At his residence in Cordova, Rock Island Co. Ill. Nov. 18, 1883, Geo. W. Dean, in the 68th year of his age, after a painful and prolonged illness, which he bore with much patience.

Mr. Dean was born in Rainham, Mass., in 1815. In early manhood he left the state of his nativity and went to Syracuse, N. Y., where he remained until 1855, when he moved to Moline, Ill. In 1843 he was married, and now leaves behind his companion of 40 years.

After two years residence in Moline, he moved to the Village of Cordova, where he has resided for a period of 26 years, and has always been esteemed as one of its best citizens. Upright in character, exemplary in all the business relations of life; he justly claimed the esteem and respect of all with whom he came in contact.

Always a staunch upholder of truth and right, strong in his convictions and fearless to express them; he lived to do good, and was truly one of God's noblemen.

Brother Dean has been a reader of THE RESTITUTION ever since the beginning of its publication, and his views coincide with those therein expressed. A firm believer in the soon coming of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, and in hope of a glorious resurrection, he sleeps to be awakened, when the last great trump shall call the quick and dead to come forth.

Truly he could say with one of old, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my work, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day.

Brother Dean leaves a large circle of friends, and an aged companion, who, while she mourns her loss, mourns not as one who has no hope, for though bowed down with grief, she has the blessed assurance of meeting him in the great gathering time. What a gathering that will be!

ISABEL RATHBUN.

DIED—At Millbrook, Mich., Nov. 14, 1883, Peter Decker, aged 53 years, after a long and wasting sickness of cancer of the stomach.

Brother Decker leaves a wife and nine children, and a large circle of relatives and friends to mourn his absence.

He was one of the first settlers of this township 28 years ago. The neighborhood were all relatives for a number of years and were strongly bound together by the bond of unity and love.

About twenty years ago Brother Decker and a number of the friends embraced the faith of the gospel, and organized a church here with which he has labored faithfully for the faith of the gospel, zealously advocating the final restitution of all things spoken by the mouth of the holy prophets.

He was a faithful worker for the interests of our paper, THE RESTITUTION.

While starving to death (for he could not take food to sustain life) his hope of living again where they shall hunger nor thirst any more, was comforting and cheering to him. He made no complaint of pain at any time except of weakness and weariness. His mind was strong and clear to the last and his last counsel to the family and friends was touching, and I trust will be remembered. He did not murmur at the "light affliction," as he termed it, but was cheerful and often chided the family when outward signs of grief were manifested by them. He gave directions about his funeral and burial, requesting Brother Woodward to speak words of comfort on the occasion; but Brother Woodward failed to reach here in time, and so Brother Bower gave a good discourse on the condition of man in death, and Brother Woodward arriving soon after gave a good discourse the next day (Sunday) on life through Christ and the resurrection.

A. C. WEST.

DIED—At Hedrick, Warren Co., Ind., May 18, 1883, David Evans, aged 72 years, 5 months and 11 days.

Brother Evans was formerly a Disciple, but upon hearing the gospel, the kingdom of God, and the things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, preached by the writer, he, with his amiable companion and many others in that vicinity, were immersed by the writer into the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins.

Brother Evans was a good man, a kind husband, a loving father, an excellent neighbor and citizen, and a valuable member of the Church of God, and in his death they have all met with a loss that can never be repaired, and the writer a true yoke-fellow.

In one of my visits west, I fell in company with a gentleman, and in my conversation with him I learned that he was acquainted with many of the members of the Church of God in that vicinity, whom he called "soul-sleepers." After telling me what they believed, and giving me the following names, David Evans, Wilford Pugh, P. G. Smith, John Lincoln, Dr. Frankeberger, Elijah Byers, etc., I asked if they were men of good character. His answer was that "God never made better men!" The Lord help the writer and reader to live in a manner that the world may in truth speak thus of us.

To the Mourning Friends of Brother D. Evans.

O ye mourners! Seek ye a balm for your souls—a cordial for your loneliness? Let me proclaim it unto you. You are not ignorant of it, I trust, but let me apply that in which you already place your confidence. The God of Israel knows your sorrows, repair you to his throne and tell your simple tale of woe. Then cast your burden on him—he will heal you. Think not that you are beyond hope. You would be if there were no God of love and pity! But while he and his anointed live, and a throne of grace stands erected, the mourner need not despair! Amen.

Lieutenant Lasseni, who lately finished a scientific mission near Bogazra discovered a Roman city in the southern part of Djerba. The circuit of the ruins is stated to be about three kilometers.

The Nature reports an extraordinary case of subsidence near Hona. Naiba, an isolated mountain, more than 2,500 feet high, is slowly sinking into the earth. A deep ditch has been made all around the engulfed mass.

The Jordan canal project is still under consideration. Its future is likely to be materially influenced by the report of an expedition recently sent out by the Palestine Exploration Society. This expedition has gone out for the purpose of a geological survey of the country lying between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Akaba. The objects are purely scientific, but the results of the survey will be looked forward to with much interest, as likely to throw light upon the question of the practicableness or otherwise of the Jordan Valley Canal scheme. It is proposed, after reaching the Dead Sea, to include the whole length of the Jordan Valley, from Jericho to the Sea of Tiberias, in the line of route.

Suddenly, during a perfect calm, at Karangon, in the Province of Bohus, Sweden, a violent whirlwind arose on the night of September 24. It came from the southeast, bringing with it quantities of sand, earth and straw. Quite unexpectedly a bright light chased away the darkness, rendering every object as visible as at noon. The illumination was caused by a grand meteor, shaped like an egg, "which appeared in the zenith, and which at first seemed to consist of myriads of large sparks, gradually changing into a bright star shining with a blinding luster, and with all the colors of the rainbow, in the northwest, four or five meters above the horizon." As soon as the meteor disappeared the wind fell just as suddenly as it arose. The phenomenon lasted only about one minute.

SANDS THAT SINGS IN THE WIND.

About twenty miles south of Stillwater, in Churchill county, on the Sand Springs Flat, at the foot of the mountain there is a heap of sand about one hundred feet high and nearly a mile across, which sings in the wind and is constantly changing. It is thrown by the wind, which there has a circular motion, into a vast round well with a hollow in the center half a mile across, which goes two-thirds of the way to the bottom. It is steep and hard to climb to the top, and on the inside is even more steep, so steep that no one has ever dared to go down, for fear the loose sand would slide down and bury them up. There are similar dunes on the Sandwich Islands, on the Hebrides and on the Atlantic coast.—San Francisco Call.

Pastor Stoecker, the German court preacher, who was prominent in the recent agitation against the Jews, is paying a visit to England. He has learned there that his attitude on the anti-Semitic question is notorious. Herr Stoecker went to England ostensibly to take part in the Luther celebrations, but the British public appear to have ignored his character as a Lutheran preacher, and recognized only his anti-Jewish character, which won for him friends as well as enemies. The Lord Mayor of London administered a snub by refusing him the use of the Mansion House for his lectures. When he hired a hall in which to speak he was received with rudeness, and his remarks evoked retorts more forcible than courteous. On two occasions the audience sang songs and were so riotous that the meetings broke up in confusion without Stoecker's lecture being delivered. The most energetic and determined of Stoecker's opponents were his own countrymen resident in London, who apparently disliked him in his character as court preacher as much as in that of leader of the anti-Jewish agitation.

Circulating the Bible.

The annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society presents, in one view, the immensity of the circulation of the Scriptures going on in all parts of the habitable globe. This one Society has issued during the past year, of Bibles, Testaments, and portions, about 10,000 a day, a total of 2,938,000. Add to this the Hibernian Society's issues, 65,675: the issues of the National Society of Scotland, 103,775; and those of the American Bible Society, 1,524,778, and we have a total issue for the past year, by four great societies, of 4,630,224 copies. To this must be added the issues of many smaller societies, of private enterprise, and the vast multitude of the Revised New Testaments, if we would compass the work of publishing the Scriptures as recorded in 1881-82. This is simply prodigious, falling not much short of six and a half or seven million copies. But we do not get the full significance of this work till we follow the colporteurs of a great society like this into every nook and corner of the habitable globe—about 300 scattered about Europe and 200 in the regions beyond. And to this still must be added similar agencies of many other societies; for example, in India the Vernacular Education Society has 168—eighteen more than the British and Foreign Bible Society. And yet, again the wonder grows when we find that the Scriptures are published in 250 languages or dialects, in 345 versions, more than four-fifths of which have been prepared since the Society was organized in 1804. So, the assertion we sometimes hear that the Bible is losing its hold upon the people, is the assertion of shallow minds totally ignorant of the real facts of the case.

Services.—Chicago, Ill.—The Blessed Hope Mission, cor. of Bishop Court and Madison Streets, entrance 68 Bishop Court. Services every Sunday forenoon (D. V.) at the usual hour, under the auspices of the Restitutionists. All are invited.

A LITTLE WHILE.—Rev. xxii. 20.

"Quickly," believer! I know thine heart is beating
With fiery emotions to behold my face,
But for "a little while" will thou not spread the tidings
Of the sweet messages of my love and grace?

Fear not, beloved! mine eye is ever watching;
Thy tears are numbered in my deep, deep love;
Thy weary sighs, and all thine heart's deep yearnings
Are registered by me in heaven above.

Trust, trust, beloved! I know the world frowns coldly,
But this should only drive thee nearer me.
Earth's broken links make heaven's affection stronger,
The cross will only make the crown more bright for thee.

Look up, beloved! tread firmly on the billows,
Thou canst not sink beneath life's troubled sea.
Look up! then shalt thou learn the sweetest lesson weekly,
How my own hand hath planned thy path for thee.

Rest, rest, beloved! thine head upon my bosom;
Lean on my arm, and tell thy griefs to me.
My heart is thine in all the full perfection
Of sympathy none else could give to thee.

Weep not, beloved, because thou yet must tarry;
Will then not serve me heart and hand meanwhile?
Some hearts around thee pine in lonely sorrow;
Couldst thou not give one kindly look or tender smile?

Go forth, beloved! life's ministry is earnest!
Crushed hearts throng round thee, in thy path below;
Fond hopes once cherished, now by death are blighted;
Knowest thou not a balm to soothe their woe?

Yes, yes, beloved! I read thy heart's glad answer;
Yes, then will do this work of love for me.
Only "a little while," and earth's sad scenes of sorrow
Shall change to glory bright prepared for thee.

Then, then, beloved! heaven's song of joy awaking,
Triumphant "Hallelujah" thou shalt raise,
Then shalt thou gaze upon my face, and ever
"Knowing as known" pour forth thine endless praise.

SUNDAY IN JERUSALEM.

The strict observance of the Sabbath is not very popular in Jerusalem, any more than it is in Germany or in some parts of the United States. Its observance is not expected from the twenty thousand Jews or the ten thousand Mohammedans; and among the ten thousand Christians who complete in round numbers the forty thousand inhabitants of the city, the large majority make it in some sense a day of recreation and pleasure. Very few shops, however, or places of business that are owned by Christians, are opened on the Sabbath.

Friday, which is the Sunday of the Mohammedans, is the great market-day of Jerusalem. No Moslem closes his shop because of any respect which he has for the day. A few go early in the morning to the mosque to pray, and they have there also some kind of preaching service, but the number who have leisure to attend it is small; in reality very little notice is taken of it. On that day the Turkish flag floats from the castle—which is not the case on other days—and no business is transacted in the courts. This is likewise the case in the government offices in general. Mohammedans, provided they have the necessary leisure, wear better clothes, drink more coffee, smoke more tobacco and make more visits on that day than on any other. If they have no leisure—which is the case with all the common classes—they work just the same as on other days. The idea that the day is sacred because God has special claims upon the time and service of men never enters a Mohammedan's mind.

Saturday, the Sabbath of the Jews, is the most strictly observed of all the three days of rest. I refer to outward observance; for how the Jews observe the day at home or in secret I do not pretend to say. They close their shops and places of business, and are seldom seen on the street until late in the afternoon, when multitudes of devout Jews, in their "fine clothes" and fur-trimmed hats, throng the principal avenue leading out of the city. After a day of worship—or a day of restraint, as it no doubt is to some—they seem to enjoy a few hours of relaxation at sunset and in the early evening. As the Jews do not transact any business on their Sabbath, they make all their preparations for their day of rest on the day previous, or Friday; and this is the chief reason why this is the principle market-day of the city. The Jews, having no separate nationality, have no flag to float in honor of the day — which perhaps their religion might prevent them from doing even were they a distinct nation.

It is curious to observe that the poor bigoted Jew and the fanatical Mohammedan, not less than the Christian, however benighted the latter may be, have an idea that somehow good clothes, at least one's "best clothes," are connected with a suitable observance of the Sabbath, or the special day of rest in which one believes.

On Sundays the flags float from the consulate of every Christian nation that is represented in the city—American, English, German, Italian, Austrian, Russian, Greek, Spanish and French.

As Christians are to a large extent the best patrons of the Jews, the latter do not find Sunday a very profitable day for business; and although they keep their shops open, they do so in a sort of half-and-half way, not wishing to close them entirely, and not expecting to trade much even if they keep them open.

One of the principal thoroughfares of Jerusalem is called Christian Street. It is also one of the main business streets of the city. For a wonder in an Oriental town, it runs straight; but this is partly accounted for by the fact that it is a short street, it being less than three hundred yards in length. I have several times counted the shops along this street that were closed on Saturday, as compared with the number that were closed on Sunday, and found that many more were closed on Saturday, showing that this street might with more propriety be called "Jew Street" than "Christian Street." This means, of course that more of its places of business are occupied by Jews than Christians. The reason is partly explained when it is considered that the Christians number about one-fourth of the population of the city, while the Jews number fully one-half.

Sunday is, of all the seven, the great day of the week for recreation, in which Mohammedans and Jews join as well as Christians. The coffee-shops, which are the only pleasure resorts within the city, are then full to overflowing; small companies of friends stroll into the fields or recline under some tree; but the great mass of pleasure seekers throng the Jaffa road for miles beyond the city. This road is broad and being without trees or shade on either side, is in the summer time very hot and dusty. In any city of Europe or America such a road as this would never be thought of as a promenade; but it is the only place for the purpose that the poor Jerusalemites have. Here may be seen, towards sunset on Sunday afternoon, every variety of costume and nationality represented in the city, where not less than thirty-four different languages are spoken. This sight is in some respects grotesque, but in other respects it is one of the most interesting in the world. All this to the Mohammedans is sacred ground. Hither also "the tribes" of Israel "come up," as of old, from the ends of the earth, as though the temple and the holy of holies were still in their glory; while Christians of every name and country under heaven look away to Jerusalem, even in her ruin and desolation, as the fatherland of their religion.

Taking all the different Christian sects together, there are among them a large number of churches, and the wild, strange clanging of bells on Sunday morning leads one to suppose that the day is designed for anything rather than worship and rest. The bells here are not chimed, nor are they rung as in America, and neither the effect of their confused sounds nor the manner in which these are produced can be described. Even the ringing of church bells assumes a very Oriental phase.

Among the Protestant community in Jerusalem there are three churches, and connected with each is a Sunday-school. One of these is a Lutheran church, which has a regular pastor. The service and the preaching are in German. The present incumbent is an able and scholarly man, and the congregation under his care, which is composed chiefly of German residents, is quite large and intelligent.

Another of the three is formed of the native Arab Protestants. They have a fine church edifice, and a large congregation which is under the care of two pastors, one European and one native. The service and preaching are entirely in Arabic, and the service itself is simply a translation or an adaptation of the Church of England service, since the enterprise belongs to the Church of England Missionary Society.

The third and largest of the three churches belongs to the London Society for the Jews. This is the general place of worship for all the English-speaking people of the city, whether permanent residents or merely travelers. There is an English service (Church of England service) held here every morning and evening, and a German service in the afternoon. There is also a service in Hebrew and another in Spanish. One of the pastors is an Englishman, and preaches only in English, while the other, who is a converted Jew, preaches equally well in Spanish, French, German, English, Hebrew and Arabic.

There are no Methodist, Baptist, Congregational or Presbyterian services held in the city; and this statement will answer an inquiry which is frequently made to me by travelers, and also by persons residing in America, whether such services are not held in Jerusalem.

While for the most part the foreigners residing here are correct in their lives, reverent towards religion, and generally attentive to religious services, there seems to be a great lack of sincere and earnest piety among them. The religious services, which are maintained with great regularity throughout the year, are well enough in their way, but they never touch or move a single heart. There are many young people here whose hearts are never stirred by the power of the gospel. To them religion is something to be "performed." It consists in the observance, on certain occasions, of certain religious forms, and leaves out of the account almost entirely the devoting of the heart and the life to Christ.

When it is said that Jerusalem is the great religious centre of the world, it must be understood of ceremonial religion. That is certainly true; but it is not a centre of piety. What can be done to exalt Christ in the minds of these people—to make them love and obey him as his humble disciples? Sacred and holy names are constantly upon their lips, and in and about the city are the scenes of some of the most solemn events in the world's history, namely, the crucifixion, burial, resurrection and ascension of our Lord; but these things do not change the heart, and in the midst of them all, and in spite of them all, the mass of men, nominal Christians as well as Mohammedans and Jews, live and die without Christ.

Alone on the Mount of Olives, with the sky overhead into which the Master ascended, and the fields about on which the Master trod, with the inexpressibly beautiful and touching records of the Master's life in one's hands, the Christian can enjoy the Sabbath far better than in the filthy and noisy city of Jerusalem.—*Selah Merrill, D. ## Notes by the Way.

Editor Restitution:

Have just returned from a visit to Southern Indiana, where I met for the first time the little band of faithful ones who have been brought out of pagan darkness into the marvellous light of the truth through the labors of Brethren Skeels, Hatch, Poore, and Halstead.

The organization I think numbers about twenty. They are well informed in the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of the Anointed One, living harmoniously among themselves, and thus exerting a healthy influence around them.

The meeting continued about a week, during which time the noble confession was made by two, who obeyed the commandment of the Lord. They were immersed by Brother Stuart in a little stream that flows through the valley, and we trust rose to walk in the new life; this devoted couple—Brother and Sister Fletcher—walked about six miles, I think, to attend the meeting. May they continue faithful through life's journey.

We shall remember with pleasure the kindness shown us during our stay with them, and our earnest prayer is that they may continue united and faithful, always abounding in the work of the Lord.

Yours, waiting for the kingdom.

THE LIVING WORD.

Yes, the living word. 1 Peter i. 23, etc. The believer finds in the Scriptures what he finds in no other writings—freshness always. He may read and ponder over the same portions of Scripture daily for years: yes, for his whole believing lifetime, and still find them more and more precious. And why? Because they are words of inspiration, imparting life; old words indeed with newness ever; refreshing, strengthening, encouraging, and consoling. In no human composition can untiring interest be maintained. Even the best cannot be read over many times without weariness. We lose the zest, and say enough. But not so with the Bible. It is an exhaustless well-spring; a witness that the child of God ever has for himself and in himself; and while he duly prizes it he will wax stronger and stronger; unhurt by evil.

Hold fast, believer! Men honored by the press, and exalted to titles on account of scientific attainments may despise and pity the child of faith—he who dares to avow his simple and full belief in the recorded miracles of the Old and New Testaments, and in the yet future grand miracle of the resurrection from the dead. But believer, heed not their scorn, their ridicule, their pity. "Fight the good fight of faith;" for faith distinguishes the child of God from the worldling. Believe and endure to the end in holy living, and eternal good will be thine.

How vain and worthless are all that men of the world seek for, when compared to the overcomer's reward! The politician, the scientist, the sportsman, the usurer, the libertine, seek for satisfaction in their several pursuits, and satisfaction is not found. Or, if found, and seemingly possessed, it is but for a short while. Reaction follows; "vanity and vexation of spirit."

But what for the overcomer? The Morning Star! The crown of life! The honor of sitting with the Immortal King on his throne! Incorruptibility! No more death, sorrow, sighing, tears! Former things passed away! No darkness, no setting sun! Glory that never dims, honor that never is lost, life that never ends! All things eternal in possession! Hold fast, Christian; let none take thy crown.

ANIMAL SALVATION.

Not only was Noah and his family saved in the ark, but the animals of all orders were saved. Noah and his family left the ark in the same condition that they were before the flood and the animals also with one exception. They both were under the rainbow covenant. That covenant embraced the animal creation.

"Neither will I again smite any more every living thing as I have done. And all the cattle of Egypt died. But of the cattle of the children of Israel died not one. And Pharaoh said, Who are they that shall go? And Moses said, We will go with our young and with our old, with our sons and with our daughters, with our flocks and with our herds will we go. And the wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid and the calf and the fatling and the young lion together, and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed, their young ones shall lie down together, and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain. For the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea."

Noah, his family, and the animals, went over the waters and were saved from drowning. A common salvation. Enoch went up by translation. The great salvation. "Let us pray always that we may escape all those things that are coming on the earth and stand before the Son of man."

Sententions.

Hope softens sorrow, brightens plain surroundings and eases a hard lot.

Discontent is the want of self-reliance; it is infirmity of will.

It is the nature of God to make something out of nothing; therefore when any one is nothing, God may yet make something out of him.—Frederick of Saxony.

A man may hang the decalogue upon the walls of his home and still be an idolator; the thing to be done is to hang it on the inner walls of the heart.

Kind looks, kind words, kind acts, and warm hand-shakes—these are secondary means of grace when men are in trouble, and are fighting their unseen battles.—Dr. John Hall.

"In the love of a brave and faithful man there is always a strain of maternal tenderness; he gives out again those beams of protecting fondness which were shed on him as he lay on his mother's knee."—George Eliot.

Nothing is easier than fault-finding. No talent, no self-denial, no brains, no character are required to set up in the grumbling business. But those who are moved by a genuine desire to do good have a little time for murmuring or complaint.

The deep mysteries of faith are not given to the lukewarm and the idle, but to those who are "watching thereunto, with all perseverance, and supplication," and who make no bargain as to the way the Lord shall lead them.

The believer's is a superhuman life. The sources of his strength and consolation are not in the country in which he sojourns, but in the higher lands beyond. He lives in God, and thus experiences perennial joy, even when earthly springs are dry, or turned to bitterness.

Great offices will have
Great talents, and God gives to every man
The virtue, temper, understanding, taste,
That fits him into life, and lets him fall,
Just in the niche he was ordained to fill.

"The life of Christianity," said Luther, "consists in possessive pronouns." It is one thing to say, "Christ is a Savior," it is quite another to say, "He is my Savior and my Lord." The devil can say the first; the true Christian alone can say the second.—S. C. Ryle.

No words can express how much the world owes to sorrow. Most of the Psalms were born in a wilderness. Most of the epistles were written in a prison. The greatest thoughts of the greatest thinkers have all passed through fire. The greatest poets have "learned in suffering what they taught in song." Take comfort, afflicted Christian! When God is about to make pre-eminent use of a man, he puts him in the fire.

CIRCULAR.

To the Students of Prophecy throughout the World:

The undersigned proposes to issue from the press, either in Chicago or in New York City, as circumstances may decide, the following works, to-wit:

I. The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. In the first division the nature of the Coming Age is fully discussed, as to its physical and moral character; 1. That the earth itself has a crowning age, in which it shall be perfectly adapted to be the residence of man in his highest type; 2. That man, to that resurrection state, will be under the endless reign of the Personal Messiah; 3. In establishing the proximity of that age, the prophecies of Ezekiel, Isaiah, Daniel, Zechariah, Christ, Paul, Peter, and the Apocalypse, are critically examined, relative to its rapid approach.

II. The second work will be devoted to the investigation of the various phases of the Eastern Question:—1. The Egyptian phase, 2. The British phase, 3. The Russian phase, 4. The Ottoman phase, 5. The Hebrew phase, 6. The American phase, 7. Lesser phases of the Eastern Question, 8. The location of each of the Great Powers in the coming contest, 9. All nations marshal under the banners of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. These powers are traced in history to the present time. All the great national issues are fully investigated.

If all that are interested in these great and most sublime topics will aid, they will be issued immediately. They will be printed and bound in a form that will do credit to the vastness of the subjects, and put to subscribers at prices quite reasonable. The books will contain about 500 large royal 8vo, pages each.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXII. Read x PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, DECEMBER 12, 1883. NO. 46.

THE RESTITUTION.
TERMS--TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.
Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; the saints only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

A PLEA FOR TRUE REVIVAL.

PART II.

Another New Testament instance may be given here. Our Lord's discourse on Mount Olivet contains the following statement, "Then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth (land) mourn and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect (chosen people) from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." Matt. xxiv, 30, 31 and Mark xiii, 26 and 27. The language here is identical with many expressions in the Old Testament, when the restoration of Israel (God's chosen or elect nation) is predicted. Compare for instance Mark xiii, 27 with Deut. xxxiv—"uttermost part of heaven." The moving of the tribes is in precise accordance with the prediction in Zech. xii, 9, 14.

There was no need to expressly reiterate the promises of Israel's restoration in the New Testament when that event was implied in the restoration of the kingdom acknowledged and promised by Christ himself, and involved in the very nature of the Messiahship. But on the assumption of a so-called spiritual fulfilment of that restoration there was an absolute necessity for an express declaration to that effect, which, however, is not to be found.

Another feature of the Kingdom of God is, that it is the inheritance promised to the faithful. Jesus promised his apostles that in his kingdom they should sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. He extended this promise to all the faithful in these terms—"To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame and am set down with my Father in his throne" Rev. iii. 21. The saints are thus the "heirs" of God's kingdom, not its subjects as commonly supposed. Not only so, but they are joint-heirs with Christ, who is himself as yet only an heir—"the heir of all things," Heb. i. the restitution of which God hath spoken by his prophets. Acts iii. 21.

The ground work of this inheritance is God's promise to Abraham, that He would give him the land of Canaan; from the river of Egypt to the river Euphrates, for an inheritance. Abraham's seed, the Messiah, was also embraced in this promise—"To Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not to seeds as of many, but as of one seed, which is Christ," Gal. iii. 16. In this territory was established by God himself, among Abraham's descendants the twelve tribes of Israel, a kingdom, the crown being vested in the house of David of the tribe of Judah. Overturned for the misconduct of king and people in the reign of Zedekiah, the restoration of this kingdom is the subject of frequent and express prediction in the Scriptures. In short the promised land and the promised kingdom are both spoken of as the inheritance of the saints. Thus: "If ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise," that is of the inheritance spoken of in verses 18, 19—Gal. iii And regarding the kingdom: "Hath not God chosen the poor of this world rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which God hath promised to them that love him.—Jas. ii. 5.

Israel had a deep interest in the promises made to Abraham; indeed their fulfilment became the nations' hope, termed by Paul "the hope of Israel," for which he said he was bound with a chain. Acts xxvi, 6, 7; xxviii, 21. The only difference between Paul and the Jews was that he looked for its realization through the crucified and resurrected Jesus of Nazareth. Hence his question before Agrippa: "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?" The blessedness of all nations was also promised through Abraham and his seed, and is termed by Paul "the gospel preached to Abraham," who in this relation is designated "the heir of the world"—Gal. iii. 8; Rom. iv. 13.

To qualify the "joint-heirs with Christ" for everlasting possession of this inheritance, they must become like him not only in a moral and spiritual, but also in a physical sense. "Flesh and blood (or human nature as at present constituted,) cannot inherit the kingdom of God;" and there is no evidence that a seperate or disembodied spirit can do so. "When he shall appear we shall be like him." Hence "We look for the Savior, who shall change the body of our humiliation that it may be fashioned like to the body of his glory. Nothing short of an immortal bodily nature can make any one "meet for the inheritance." Hence the value of the resurrection, and that change of the faithful living, to take place at the coming of the Lord.

It is plain from these testimonies that the gospel of salvation preached by Jesus and the apostles consisted of things concerning the kingdom of God, embracing the restoration of Israel to their own land and they with all nations brought under the sway of God's anointed king, when he shall have come with the clouds of heaven, and taken unto him his great power to reign.

Jesus uttered the prediction to his disciples, "THIS GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations." Matt. xxiv. 14. And he gave them this commission, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned." Mark xvi. 15, 16. Luke's gospel shows that repentance and remission of sins should be proclaimed in the name of Jesus,—that is, in acknowledging the crucified Jesus to be the Christ, the King of Israel. And although this commission and prediction were fulfilled by the apostles in the first century, Col. i. 6, 23, there is no reason to believe that the conditions of salvation laid down by our Lord have been since modified or relaxed.

And this was the drift of all the apostles, preaching. Take Peter's address on Pentecost. Its aim was to prove from the Old Testament that the Messiah should die, be buried and have an early resurrection: and that David, seeing before, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his (David's) throne, —spoke of the resurrection of Christ. This, followed by the testimony of the apostles, that "This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses" convinced the Jews of the validity of the claims of Jesus to be the Messiah, and drew from them the inquiry—Men and brethren, what shall we do?

Peter does not say, as some allege, that Jesus ascended to heaven, there to sit on the throne of his father David. He simply said that God promised to raise up Christ to sit on David's throne; but that in the meantime he was, according to the prediction in Psalm cx., exalted to the right hand of God, until his enemies should be made his foot-stool. In like manner as it was said of David,—I took thee from the sheepcote to be ruler over my people"—while fifteen years elapsed between the anointing of David as king and his exercising regal authority on the throne of Israel. Jesus distinctly discriminates between the throne of Jehovah, where he now sits, and the throne he is to occupy with his disciples—"To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame and am set down with my Father on his throne." Rev. iii. 21.

Again notice the Kingdom as an element in the preaching of Philip—"Philip went down to the city of Samaria, and preached Christ unto them. And when they believed Philip preaching the things concerning the Kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized, both men and women." Acts viii, 5, 12. Philip preached Christ by preaching the Kingdom of God and the name of Jesus the Messiah.

At Ephesus, Paul went into the synagogue, and spoke boldly for the space of three months, disputing and persuading the things concerning the kingdom of God." Acts xix. 8. And in his parting address to the elders of the church of Ephesus, he reminds them of the subject of his preaching in these words—"Testifying repentance towards God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus the Messiah. . . . . And now behold I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see my face no more." Acts xx. 21, 25. In his letter to the Ephesians, Paul terms this "the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation." Eph. i. 13.

It is thus evident that the gospel as preached after Pentecost was two-fold: 1st, the things of the kingdom: 2d, the name of Jesus; the former being the prophetic outline of the main feature of the Messiah's office—the re-establishment and administration of the Theocracy; and the latter, the announcement that the rejected and crucified, but resurrected and exalted Jesus of Nazareth, was the very personage who should in due time accomplish this great work.

Such, we apprehend, is a correct statement of the faith of the first disciples. It may also be well to observe that it is "with the heart man believeth unto righteousness"—with a sincere, cordial, hearty faith in the message which God in his mercy has sent. This "faith worketh by love," producing the "obedience of faith"—that "patient continuance in well-doing," by which the true disciple "seeks for glory, honor, and immortality" in the kingdom of God. Hence he is enjoined to add to his faith virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, and charity; "wherefore the rather, brethren," adds the apostle, "give diligence to make your calling and election sure; for if you do these things ye shall never fall, for so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus the Christ."

But it has pleased God to prescribe the first act of obedience with which the believer shall begin his new life. In his commission Jesus charged his apostles—"Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost;" or, in the words of Mark, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." This is the unrevoked fiat of the Son of God. And Paul's testimony is to the same effect: "We are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus; for as many as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ."

But how baptized into Christ? As the Israelites were baptized into Moses: "All our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea; and were all baptized unto (into, the same word as in Gal. iii. 27) Moses in the cloud and in the sea." Believers of the gospel are baptized into Christ in water. And we find that the first believers yielded prompt obedience to the divine command. "They that gladly believed Peter's word were baptized." "When they believed Philip preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized both men and women."

We have thus briefly glanced at some prominent features of the faith and practice of the first disciples, and the question may fairly be asked—Is anything worthy of the name of Revival or Evangelistic Work which ignores these plainly taught first elements of the religion of Jesus? True, by applying a system of interpretation which has obtained in the Roman Catholic church since the days of Constantine, and which passed unreformed into the Protestant church at the time of the Reformation, the words of prophets and apostles, and even of Jesus himself, may be made to mean anything the fancy of the commentator may suggest. But is not the obvious and natural meaning which the plain reading would indicate, the more likely to be the true one?

An idea obtains that the Old Testament must be understood by the clearer light of the New. Where the New Testament professes to explain any obscure part of the Old there can be no objection to receive such explanation. But the converse is equally true. If the New Testament is obscure or silent on any subject upon which the Old is clear, is not the dictum of the Old to be received? Did not the noble Bereans test the teaching of the apostles by "searching the Scriptures" (of the Old Testament)? How could they do this if the light of the Old Testament was not clear enough for the purpose? Is it not said to be "able to make wise unto salvation through faith in Christ Jesus?" And therefore necessary to the attainment of this wisdom, by understanding the teachings of the Master. The most momentous interests are suspended on our understanding by any means the words of Jesus. His own declaration is—"He the rejecteth me, and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him; the word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day." John xii. 48. But how can we receive the words of Jesus unless we understand them in their ordinary acceptation? "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." "To his own master he standeth or falleth"—not to any system of interpretation, however time-honored and popular. If any man teach otherwise, and consent not to wholesome (unadulterated) words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine (or teaching) which is according to godliness; he is proud, knowing nothing, but doting about questions and strifes of words."

Reader, study the words of Jesus. Ascertain for yourself what he publicly preached as the gospel of the kingdom of God, and what he commanded for the obedience of faith, and hasten to yield allegiance. Do not deceive yourself with the idea of love to Christ in the absence of faith and obedience; for his solemn decree is: "He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me." "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city."

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.--Second Series. Number 37.

TEMPLE OF BAAL.

Deir el-Kulah is five miles south of Bukfeiya, but the road is so bad and tortuous that it took me nearly as many hours to reach it. The name signifies "the convent of the castle," and is descriptive, a convent having been built on the ruins of an old fortress. It stands on the crest of a narrow and lofty ridge, round whose base sweeps the wild glen of the Magoras. The stream is fifteen hundred feet below, winding out and in among dark foliage like a thread of silver. Eastward the eye wanders up the valley of Meta among villages and vineyards, and mulberry groves, and pine forests, till it rests on the snowy peak of Kenisch. North and south extend mountain sides, rich and rugged, far as the eye can see; and on the west the plain of Beyrout is at our feet, with its wastes of white sand on the one side, and its bright city embowered in verdure on the other; while beyond is the boundless expanse of the Mediterranean; not quite boundless, however, for when the glow of sunset mantles the horizon, the hills of far-distant Cyprus, overtopped by classic Olympus, rise in clear outline.

The ruins of Deir el-Kulah include an ancient village, a castle or citadel and a temple. The latter is the most interesting. It is one hundred and six feet long, and fifty-four broad. Its portico had a double range of columns, six feet in diameter; and some of the stones in the walls measure fourteen feet by five and a half. I saw, as others had seen before me, several Greek inscriptions. They are short and fragmentary, but fortunately long enough to throw light on the origin and object of the building. One contains a dedication to "Baal-markos, Sovereign Lord of Sports." Baal is often mentioned in the Bible. To him most of the "high places" in Palestine were dedicated. Among the Phœnicians he was the chief object of worship, and his worship was introduced into Israel by the infamous "Jezebel, daughter of Eth-Baal, king of the Sidonians." 1 Kings xvi. 31. In the Bible this deity is called by the different names, Baal berith, "Lord of the Covenant," (Judges ix. 4;) Baal-zebub, "Lord of flies," (2 Kings i. 2); and Baal-peor, (Num. xxv. 1). So here we have a temple dedicated to Baal-markos, the "Lord of Sports." It was doubtless one of the great centers of Phœnician idolatry, where the kinsfolk and townsfolk joined in their lascivious rites.

From time immemorial Lebanon has been a grand center of superstition and idolatry. Temples crowned almost every height, and sanctuaries were consecrated in almost every grove. "On every high hill, in all the tops of the mountains, and under every green tree, and under every thick oak, they did offer sweet savour to all their idols." Ezek vi. 13. Time has not changed it. Professing a different faith, and called by a different name, the religious spirit of its people remains the same. Their convents are now as numerous as their idol shrines ever were; and could the old Giblites and Phœnicians again revisit their country, they would find it hard to distinguish the saints and angels that deck the Christian altars from the images of their own deities.

From Deir el-Kulah I descended to Beyrout, having thus traversed nearly the whole Maronite section of Lebanon.

THE DRUSES AND THEIR MOUNTAIN HOME.

"Fierce, hardy, proud, in conscious freedom bold,
Those stormy seats the warlike Druses hold;
From Norman blood their lofty line they trace,
Their Gallic courage proves their generous race:
They, only they, while all around them kneel
In sullen homage to the Thracian steel,
Teach their pale despots' waning moon to fear
The patriot terrors of the mountain spear."

I have explored every interesting nook and corner in Southern Lebanon, the home of the Druses. I shall here, however, give only a brief sketch of one short tour which led me through the cream of the country, and at the best season—the vintage.

I left Beyrout for Deir el-Kamr on a sunny afternoon, early in September. My only companion was my servant, a mountaineer, who knew every inch of the road as well as I did myself. The distance is five hours, and the path none of the best. The first hour is in the plain, wading through deep sands under the shade of a pine forest, and then winding among mulberry gardens. There are more palms here than one is accustomed to see in Syria or Palestine—not in groves like Egypt, but singly, and in clumps of three or four.

The foot of the mountain is reached and the ascent begins by a track, more like the rocky bed of a winter torrent than a highway to the capital of Lebanon. But as we mount the ruggedness is forgotten, and we are enraptured with the variety, the richness, and the extent of the views. We miss, here, however, the close and careful cultivation of the Maronite district. The vines are not so well trained, and here and there are long reaches of mountain side, where the old terraces are broken and the soil waste. The Druses are warriors rather than husbandmen. They delight in arms more than in vineyards. One notices this as soon as he enters their country. He reads it in their looks. The flashing eye, and haughty step, and calm demeanor, are not the characteristics of a son of toil. The trim beard, and spotless white turban, and long dagger proclaim the soldier rather than the peasant. Still the Druses are not wanting in industry, and were they under a wise rule much might be made of them.

The costume of the women in this part of Lebanon, Druses and Christians alike, is strange and striking. Here one sees at every fountain that most singular of all the singularities of female dress or ornament—the tantur. It is a tube or horn, of gold or silver, from one to two feet long, and about two inches in diameter, tapering slightly. To the lower end are fastened a number of silver knobs by silken cords a yard in length. The horn is placed erect on the top of the head, strapped round the chin, and balanced by the silver knobs which hang down the back. Over the whole is thrown a long veil of white muslin, which at the pleasure of the wearer is either permitted to descend in graceful folds behind or is brought round so as to conceal both face and figure. Such is the ordinary costume of the matrons of Lebanon; and whatever may be said of its absurdity, there can be no doubt that it gives a grace and dignity to the carriage worthy of imitation in more favored lands. The tantur is the first requisite of the bride; for maidens are not permitted to wear it. Its origin is unknown, and it is very questionable whether it is to it the Psalmist alludes, lxxv. 4.

A DRUSE WEDDING.

On approaching the village of Ain 'Anub we were somewhat startled by hearing dropping shots, and seeing troops of horsemen galloping hither and thither along the mountain side. We soon learned that it was the wedding of one of the hereditary Sheikhs; and I was invited to halt an hour and see the fete. I gladly consented.

The ordinary mode of procedure on the wedding day is this. Some Druse priests, accompanied by a few of the bridegroom's relatives, go to the bride's house, which, in this instance, was in a neighboring village. After drawing up and reading the marriage contract, the bride, in her richest attire, and completely enveloped in a veil of white and gold, is placed on a horse covered with superb housings, and led off to her husband. A long train of relatives, male and female, in holiday costume, follow her. When they got within half a mile or so of her husband's village, his friends and retainers—in the present case numbering several hundreds—sally out, and a mock combat ensues. Both parties being armed, and well trained in mountain warfare, the scene becomes intensely exciting. From behind rocks and trees, from the tops of cliffs, from every point of vantage, volleys of musketry—blank of course—are poured upon the advancing troop. The horseman charge and retreat. Step by step the bridegroom's party retire, contesting every inch; and at length—amid singing cheers, and shrill cries of women, and salvos of musketry, the bride enters the village in triumph, and is hurried away to the harem. There she is left alone, still enveloped in her veil, to await her husband, who has never yet seen her face. After some time he enters, respectfully lifts the veil, takes one look, immediately replaces it, and returns to his guests. The revels go on for many days.....

The sun had long set ere I entered Deir el-Kamr.

THE MASSACRE OF 1860.

Deir el-Kamr is, or rather was seven years ago, a beautiful little town of seven thousand souls, built high up on the side of a wild glen, and encompassed by terraced vineyards and orchards. The castle, occupied by a Turkish garrison, crowns a cliff; and on the opposite side of the glen stands the beautiful palace of the Emir Beshir, the former governor of Lebanon. The steep and richly wooded bank leading up to it, the commanding site, the vast mass of picturesque buildings, and the wooded hill behind, all remind one of the Castle of Heidelberg. For years the palace has been turned into a barrack: and the Turks are doing there what they have done everywhere—they are fast reducing its splendid courts, and marble halls, and gilt saloons, to ruins.

Deir el-Kamr has suffered more from the hereditary strife of Druse and Maronite than any other place in Lebanon. Being an exclusively Christian town, in the center of a Druse district, it has ever borne the first brunt of battle, and has repeatedly been burned to ashes. But the most fearful tragedy, even in its sad history, was enacted in 1860. At the commencement of the outbreak in that year, the town was taken and plundered by the Druses, who after burning Zahleh, returned to complete the work of destruction. The unfortunate inhabitants resolved to defend their lives to the last, for they knew too well the fate that awaited them. The rest of the sad tale I shall give in the words of one who was all but an eye-witness—Cyril C. Graham, Esq.

"The Turkish governor, who had four hundred troops in the castle, while at Btoddin, half a mile off, there were three hundred more, told the people they had nothing to fear if they would give him up their arms; and he insisted on their doing so. They applied for an escort to Beyrout; this he would in no wise permit. Their valuables he made them place in the castle and then ordered a great part of the population there. So men, women, and children were all crowded together in the palace under his protection, on the night of the 20th. On the morning of the 21st, the Druses collected round the town; one of their leaders came to the palace and desired to speak with the governor. A conversation was carried on in a low voice.... At last a question was asked to which the governor gave the answer, Hepsi, that is, "all." Hereupon the Druse disappeared, but in a few minutes the gate was thrown open, and in rushed the fiends, cutting down and slaughtering every male; the soldiers co-operating."

Twelve hundred men were massacred on that fatal day!

SOUTHERN LEBANON.

At six o'clock I was again in the saddle, and in an hour drew up upon the brow of Wady Baruk, four miles south of Deir el-Kamr, and one of the richest and wildest glens in Lebanon. High up on its southern bank stands the village of Mukhtara, and the palace of the late Said Bey, the chief of the Druses. It is a building of great size, occupying a splendid site; but with no pretensions to architectural beauty. After a hurried visit to the Bey, whom I had known before, and who now insisted on sending a couple of horsemen with me, I continued my journey.

Our path lay along the terraced mountain side, often beneath the spreading branches of fragrant walnuts. We looked down into the lovely valley of Baruk, and away over a wooded ridge beyond it to the Mediterranean. Village after village was passed, and vineyard after vineyard. Ever and anon boys and girls came rushing out with bunches of luscious grapes that would have done honor to the vines of Eschol, and prayed the Bey to accept their offering.

Leaving the vale of Baruk, we struck up Wady Jezzin; and passing a large village of that name, we ascended through a bleak and rugged region to the southern brow of Lebanon. The scene which here suddenly burst upon our view was magnificent. Four thousand feet and more beneath where we stood, was the deep chasm of the Leontes, which intersects the range, carrying the waters of Cœle-Syria to the Mediterranean. Over it frowned the massive battlements of the Castle of Shukif, founded by the Phœnicians to guard the road to their agricultural colony at Laish. On the east rose Hermon, its icy crown gleaming in the ruddy sunshine. At its base were the plains of Ijon (1 Kings xv. 20), and Dan (Judges xviii. 7–10), extending in green meadows to the waters of Merom (Josh. xi. 5). On the south lay the picturesque mountain chain of Naphtali, over which appeared on the horizon the pale blue hills of Samaria. And away on the right was the wavy coast line running along from the shattered battlements of Tyre to the distant cape of Carmel. In fact the whole northern division of Palestine was before my eyes, every feature brought out in bold relief by the evening sun. It was one of those pictures which time can never efface from memory.

The descent to the banks of the Leontes was long and toilsome. Crossing the stream by the old bridge of Burghos, we attempted to reach a small village near it, where we intended to pass the night; but we lost our way, and were obliged to halt under a large oak tree. Tying my horse to a branch, I wrapped my cloak around me and was soon asleep. My companions followed my example; and next day we proceeded to Rashaiya, whence I went to Damascus. Thus terminated my tour in Southern Lebanon.—J. L. Porter.

The only record we have of Paul's singing was when he was in jail at Philippi, lying on the cord floor, his back bruised and bloody from the "many stripes" it had received. At midnight they "prayed and sang praises unto God." With what propriety he could afterwards exhort the Philippians to be "careful for nothing; but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God," and what weight his testimony must have had. He had set them an example of rejoicing in tribulation.

MANUSCRIPTS have accumulated. Books and pamphlets have been received. Will attend to all as we have space and time.

AN APOLOGY for not answering some letters promptly, and for brief editorials, we have to say, that we have had quite an amount of extra writing to do lately in copying some articles.

WE have an interesting letter from Jerusalem, of date Oct. 31, written by Sister Davis, for next week. She has passed through sickness and trials. Let us aid her. We forwarded some time ago all we had received for her.

THROUGH the courtesy of Mr. Edward White, of London, Eng., we have received a pamphlet written by W. A. Hobbs, a missionary in Calcutta, and printed in that city. Of this author Mr. White says: "Mr. Hobbs is a twenty years' missionary in Bengal. Rejected by Baptist mission for being convinced of life in Christ, but blessed by God abundantly since." We will commence giving this tract in parts next week, as we fully agree with the kind sender that it "is well worth reprinting in THE RESTITUTION." Many, many thanks for the favor to Mr. White.

A GREAT deal of interest has been excited in the scientific world by the extraordinary brilliancy of that red glow that appears in such gorgeousness on the sky before sunrise and after sunset. At San Francisco it seemed like a great fire in the distant west, burning over the Pacific ocean; and in New York its splendors were naturally mistaken for a conflagration. As the earth has lately been traversing through a belt of meteors, some have concluded that the beautiful colors have been a reflection of the sun's rays from meteoric dust, and that we are witnessing what may be called "a meteoric atmosphere." Others solve the mystery by supposing that this appearance may be portentous of war-crimsoned fields upon earth. Notable signs in the heavens are to mark the close of this dispensation. Joel ii. 30; Lu. xxi. 26.

Communications.

THE ASSOCIATION FOR PROMOTION OF CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.

In behalf of the officers of above mentioned Association allow me in this public way to thank the brethren of the Indiana Conference for the kindly sentiments expressed in the resolution passed at the late meeting in Plymouth. Such unsolicited acts of brotherly kindness cost nothing and at the same time assist greatly in developing a cordial fraternal spirit which is indispensible to true Christian fellowship.

And now a word about the Association itself. We have distributed nearly two thousand copies of the little pamphlets stating its object and methods, that all might have an opportunity to join in a good work. Responses have followed. Some very cordial and encouraging; others have made further enquiry, while some few have criticized and refused countenance to the movement. By answering here some of those questions we may perhaps avoid a voluminous personal correspondence.

1. As to who the projectors of this movement are? I would say that our Prospectus shows, we claim to be Christians, who are waiting for the Messiah to come, raise the dead saints, change the living, and with them reign literally over Israel and the nations.

2. As to the various shades of doctrine touching resurrection and other subjects, while as individuals the members of the Association have perhaps positive and varied opinions, yet in the work of the society all such secondary matters will be put to one side that all may join on one common platform for the sole purpose of disseminating the gospel light.

3. Some have objected to certain of the officers with whom they refuse to be associated, and to all such I can only say that I am very sorry that they allow personal feeling or prejudice to hinder their own usefulness in the Master's cause. If we refuse to countenance any person or movement that does not reach the acme of perfection, taking ourselves as the criterion, we may as well become hermits at once. We should certainly be able in this age to walk harmoniously with those with whom we expect to join in the work of future ages.

4. One prominent brother criticises the remark in our President's letter that "the means of the Association are not to be used for the promotion of doctrines not well established or in dispute among its members," and contends that this is not a progressive spirit.

If our object was to explore and investigate this criticism would be to the point, but we consider that this is not the proper function of a missionary society to undertake such work, as it would only tend to cripple its legitimate work, and that field is amply covered by the discussions in current religious literature, as well as by the pulpit and Bible classes.

I would not belittle the noble work of searching the mine of truth for hidden treasures, but at the same time there is plenty of gold that has been freed from dross that we who have in abundance should distribute to the hungry multitude.

To those who have received a copy of the Prospectus and have not responded I beg to say, do not let this opportunity pass without giving your countenance to a movement started only for the cause of truth and glory of God. If it is not convenient to subscribe liberally, at least take a single subscription. The moral effect of your name will be encouraging. If you will read the by-laws you will see that we do not ask it as a donation but allow the full amount in value to be drawn out in publications as soon as issued, thus spreading the light. We need your support now.

SAMUEL WILSON.

Philadelphia, Pa.

Baptism is, next to the ministry of the word and its hearty reception, our dispensational and imperative ordinance. The Lord's supper service follows of course. We read that the apostles preached and that many believed and said, "What shall we do? Peter said repent and be baptized every one of you, etc. They who gladly received the word were baptized." Acts ii.

"Can any man forbid water that these should not be baptized, who have received the Holy Ghost as well as we? he commanded them to be baptized in the name of the Lord." Acts x. 44-48.

"Many of the Christians hearing, believed and were baptized." Acts xviii. 8.

Note. No inquisition set to ascertain and enforce its own standard of intelligence as to the heights and depths of revelation as the vital prerequisite to baptism, or their coming into Christ and wearing his name.

Again. When I was married to my wife 50 years ago, (and to Christ 58 years ago) I know not "half that was then told me," and have learned since; but while I am more and more thankful to God yet I've never dared to think of being any more married! Once in the life engagement. Amen. "It reads, "One Lord and one baptism."

P. S. Brother Gelletly and his fellow laborer (two weeks ago writing from the south) expressed the doctrine of acceptance and the obedience of faith, as I see it embodied in the primordial example of faith through the ages, in Abraham. Rom iv; Gal. iii. "He believed God and it was committed (reckoned, imputed, estimated) to him for righteousness!" His circumcision —"the seal of his faith"—followed in about 16 years. J. B. C.

Please find room for a short report of our meetings. The Lord has blest us with means to bring Brother Finn out here in the west to preach to us. It had been over five years since we had the gospel preached in its purity. He preached ten sermons while with us to large congregations for this thinly settled place. Had good interest. Baptized two into Christ. He left us the 10th of October. O, how sorry we were that he had to leave us so soon. If he could have staid with us till spring we think he could have done much good here, he being a good workman that needs not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth. Dear brothers and sisters, none but the isolated ones can know how great a feast of fat things it was to us to listen to Brother Finn reasoning out of the Scriptures concerning Christ and his kingdom. It truly was a foretaste for the child of God to listen to the great and precious promises made to us if we only will live godly and be faithful to the end. The prayer of your unworthy sister is that we all may be found faithful to the end. My address is, Riverside, Ness Co., Kan. Good-bye for this time.

Editor Restitution:

Dear brethren are we ready for the coming of our blessed Lord, have we obeyed from the heart the form of doctrine, have we believed the gospel the glad tidings of the kingdom of God, the reign of Christ on the earth over the nations, and then been buried in baptism, planted in the likeness of his death according to God's order, first faith then obedience? It will not do to reverse God's arrangements. No, no. If we are all right in this, then are we walking in newness of life, are we in the narrow way guarding every avenue of life, is our conversation as becomes the children of light, do we refrain from the vain amusements of the world, are we living epistles known and read of all men for good, do the glorious promises fill our whole being with adoration, praise, and thanksgiving to God, are we drawing fresh supplies daily from the fountain-head, all absorbed in the glorious truths of the gospel, letting our light shine, endeavoring to enlist others to share the honor, the glory of the kingdom of God? If these things be in us and abound we shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the work of the Lord, "for so an entrance shall be ministered unto us abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." W. S. FINN.

I wish to correspond with a physician holding the truth or favorable thereto, with a view to joining with me in the electro-medical treatment of acute and chronic diseases. He must be a graduate and accustomed to a general practice—a thoroughly honorable and practical man. Would prefer an unmarried man.

THE SOUDAN.

All that part of Africa south of the Sahara, extending about 4,000 miles east and west between Senegambia and the Nile, and from ten to fifteen degrees of latitude in width, is called the Soudan. It is a very populous region. Besides the 10,000,000 inhabitants of the British and Portugese possessions in Western Soudan, there are, according to Behm and Wagner, 38,000,000 dwelling within the 631,000 square miles of Central Soudan, and 36,807,000, occupying the 668,000 square miles of the remainder. South of this is an equatorial belt of about 1,522,000 square miles, with a population of 49,000,000. The Soudan and equatorial provinces, conquered and occupied by Egypt for the purpose of suppressing the slave trade, have a population estimated at about 50,000,000. Such immense masses of people living in barbaric indolence and ease, indicate a very fruitful land which might, under civilizing auspices, become the seat of a mighty commerce. At present it is governed by Arab chiefs and other Mohammedan slave traders who maintain armies and govern by terror, compelling their black subjects to profess the Mohammedan religion, but otherwise caring for them no further than the exigencies of the slave trade may require. El Mahdi's force is probably nothing but a confederation of these slave-trading chiefs. Their resources and their relations to the vast population of the Soudan are not such as to warrant the belief that they can mobilize armies capable of carrying an aggressive war north of the Nubian frontier.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.

Any faint hopes that the extent of El Mahdi's victory had been exaggerated must disappear under the confirmatory accounts which have just arrived at Cairo. It is now beyond doubt that the Soudan has proved as fatal to General Hicks as it did to Yusef Pasha, and that the prolonged engagement of El Obeid resulted in a slaughter even more appalling than that of the surprise at Ghebel Gadir. Yusef, last year, marching against the insurgents with 4,000 men, lost all but 800 of them, and many of these were afterward either impressed into El Mahdi's ranks or sold into slavery. It will be fortunate if even a few score of Hicks' 10,000 have escaped El Mahdi's fury.

The influence of the victory of El Obeid upon the fortunes of the self-styled Messiah of Islam is not likely to be overestimated. We must remember that it is not yet three years since the inordinate pretensions of Mohammad Ahmed and the rapid enrollment of followers under his banners led to the dispatch of a force by the governor of the Egyptian Soudan to seize him. But already then the recluse who claimed to have fulfilled in his person and experience the prophecies of the coming of a successor to Mohammed had developed from seer to soldier. He put to flight the small body sent to capture him, and thereafter found his prestige prodigiously increased. The next year an army was sent against him, and the Prophet annihilated it. Then, after great exertions, he captured El Obeid, the capital of Kordofan and the chief city south of Khartoum. Now the Khedive's serious attempt to put an end to the revolt, which never would have been suffered to extend so far, save that the war with Arabi had absorbed attention, ends in overwhelming disaster.

It is clear that Darfur, Kordofan, and the greater part of Sennar, are already lost to Egyptian control, and that the city of Khartoum itself is in danger through the destruction of the chief force that covered it. Up to the present time there has been some hope that detachments, making their escape from the bloody field of El Obeid, would fall back on Khartoum. That place has defensive works, a garrison of several thousand men, and water protection on both flanks, being at the junction of the White and Blue Niles. So long as Khartoum could be held it would be dangerous for El Mahdi to go north of it, as he would expose himself to an attack from the rear. Something more than two hundred miles down the Nile from Khartoum is Berber, an important position, because thence there is a regular camel communication eastward to Suakim on the Red Sea. The true line of Egyptian defense, therefore, included the three points of Khartoum, Berber and Suakim, with communication between them.

But the annihilation of Hicks' force, leaving nothing for concentration at Khartoum, puts this city in great peril. The chances are that El Mahdi will sweep down upon it before relief can arrive. Should the garrison take the alarm and try to retreat, it will of course move down the Nile to Berber. Should Berber in its turn fall, all Nubia would then be open to El Mahdi, save the ports on the Red Sea. Of these the most important, as already indicated, is Suakim, and this should apparently be held at all hazards. Its present garrison is to be reinforced by a strong body of troops under Baker Pasha, while whatever is saved from the garrisons of Khartoum, Berber and smaller places will certainly retreat thither if possible. Above all, being on the Red Sea, it can have abundant naval as well as military co-operation, English as well as Egyptian.—N. Y. Times.

USE OF PROOF TEXTS.

Another sin against the Bible is often committed by the indiscriminate use of proof texts in dogmatic assertion and debate. They are hurled against one another in controversy with such difference of interpretation that it has become a proverb that anything can be proved from the Bible. The Bible has been too often used as if it were a text-book of abstract definitions giving absolute truth. On the contrary, the Bible was not made for ecclesiastical lawyers, but for the people of God. It gives the concrete in the forms and methods of general literature. Its statements are ordinarily relative; they depend upon the context in which they are imbedded, the scope of the author's argument, his peculiar point of view, his type of thought, his literary style, his position in the unfolding of divine revelation. There are occasional passages so pregnant with meaning that they seem to present, as it were, the quintessence of the whole Bible. Such texts were called by Luther little bibles. But ordinarily, the texts can be properly understood only in their context. To detach them from their place and use them as if they stood alone, and deduce from them all that the words and sentences may be constrained to give, as absolute statements, is an abuse of logic and the Bible. Such a use of other books would be open to the charge of misrepresentation. Such a use of the Bible is adding unto the word of God new meanings and taking away from it the true meaning. Against this we are warned by the Bible itself, Rev. xxii. 18, 19. Deduction, inference, and application may be used within due bounds, but they must always be based upon a correct apprehension of the text and context of the passage. These processes should be conducted with great caution, lest in transforming the thought to new conditions and circumstances, there be an insensible assimilation first of its form and then of its contents to those conditions and circumstances; and it become so transformed as to lose its Biblical character and become a tradition of man.* It is a melancholy feature of biblical study that so much attention must be given to the removal of the rubbish of tradition that has been heaped upon the word of God now as in the times of Jesus. The Bible is like an oasis in a desert. Eternal vigilance and unceasing activity are necessary to prevent the sands from encroaching upon it and overwhelming its fertile soil and springs of water.—Briggs' Biblical Study.

URIM-VISAGED WAR.

An Egyptian Force Annihilated by the Troops of the False Prophet. The Tonquin Trouble. Unsuccessful Attack by the Chinese on Hai-Phong.

CAIRO, Dec. 9.—On the 5th instant spies entered Suakim and reported Hilli men hovering near the town. On hearing this, Mahmoud and Tapen Pasha, anxious to efface the defeat at Tokar on the 6th ultimo, on account of which a court martial is pending, sent forward 500 black troops and 200 Bashi-Bazouks against the Hilli tribes, he himself remaining at Suakim. At a distance of three hours' march from the town the Egyptians were attacked by several thousand men. The Egyptians fought fiercely, but were cut to pieces, fifty of whom, half officers, escaped. This defeat of officers, hitherto regarded as the flower of the army, has caused consternation here, as it tends to show the task of opening the route from Suakim to Berber with the material at Baker Pasha's disposal nearly hopeless.

Surviving officers say they were surrounded by 5,000 men. The Egyptians formed a square, the black troops being stationed on three faces and the Bashi-Bazouks on the fourth face square. The latter fell back, throwing the black troops into disorder. The black troops fought with great bravery. One gun and all the arms and ammunition were lost. In consequence of the disaster the garrison at Suakim has been reduced to 1,000 men.

This defeat proves the rebels are firmly established south of Suakim on the Berber frontier.

LONDON, Dec. 9.—A Suakim dispatch says there is a panic among Egyptian officials. The fall of the garrisons at Tokar and Sinkat is expected daily, owing to starvation.

LONDON, Dec. 9.—A special from Hong Kong at midnight says: Five hundred Annamites and Chinese made a demonstration at Hai-Phong on the afternoon of the 8th instant. Commandant Cardonnant made a sortie with a handful of French troops from the garrison and attacked them with such vigor that he dispersed the enemy, killing fifty and wounding over a hundred. Two of Commandant Caronnant's men were wounded with lances. It is a seeming weakness to leave Hoe Shong, the French base of supplies, unprotected, save by a small garrison, while Bac Ninh, the Chinese stronghold, intervenes between the army and its base, rendering the destruction of the base imminent at any moment.

PARIS, Dec. 8.—Admiral Galiber telegraphs that the French fleet destroyed several ports on the east coast of Madagascar, and also Maravelta. Fevers prevail among the troops.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.

It has been remarked by one of the daily papers that the Eastern Question occupies the attention of England from time to time as circumstances force it upon her, but that it is never out of the mind of Russia. Many amongst us are asking, "What, in a nutshell, is the Eastern Question?" To this Mrs. Grattan Guinness, in one of the soirees at Hulme Cliff College during the vacation, replied that the Eastern Question, which is the great crux of politics, is what to do with the Mohammedan Turk without putting Europe in a blaze? For Constantinople is too finest geographical position in Europe, and only the mutual jealousy of the European Powers permits the Turk to remain there. But God will bring about the solution of this difficulty in His own time.

Again, it is asked, why is the departure of the Turks from Europe, and their return to the land whence they came, identified with the drying up of the Euphrates foretold in Rev. xvi.? The answer is that the Ottoman Turks, of whom Othman was the chief, were originally a wandering tribe in the country of the Euphrates, and their irruption into Europe is represented in the vision of the sixth trumpet, Rev. ix. 13-21, as consequent upon the loosing of the four angels which were bound in that great river. The vision of the sixth vial, Rev. xvi., describes the subsidence of this overwhelming flood as the drying up of the Euphrates. (For a similar prophecy of the invasion of the land of Immanuel by Assyria as the overflowing of the same river, see Isa. viii. 6-8, and its fulfilment xxvi., lxvii.)

The drying up of the Euphrates is proceeding rapidly. About 1800, Turkey began to wane, and has steadily declined, especially since 1820. When it is no longer able to keep its heel upon Jerusalem, the way of the Kings of the East (the Jews) to their own land will have been prepared. Then they shall look upon him whom they pierced. Then, like Saul of Tarsus, they will ask "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" and like him they will become the ministers of their God to the nations and to the isles afar off, that have not heard his fame nor seen his glory, and they shall declare his glory among the Gentiles.

The loss of Egypt to Turkey indicates a further extensive retrocession of the Mystic Euphrates, and this, together with many another sign of the end, calls loudly to the Church and to Israel to "Lift up your heads for your redemption draweth nigh."—The (London) Christian.

JEWEL CASKET.

STRENGTH AS THE DAY.

It sometimes seems to the child of God, that his burden of trial or sorrow is greater than he can bear. But there was never yet a burden laid on any child of God which was heavier, by a single atom, than could be upborne by the sustaining grace which was proffered with it. He who knows us better than we know ourselves, considers our strength in every trial which he permits to us.

Faint and sinking on the road,
Still I cling to thee, my God.
Bending 'neath a weight of woes,
Harassed by a thousand foes,
Hope still chides my rising tears,
Joy still mingles with my fears!
For thy word still sounds to me,
"As thy days thy strength shall be."
—H. F. Lyte.

"WE SHALL BE LIKE HIM."

"We shall be like him!" With all the affection of children, and all their hopes—with all the schooling of God, with all the judgment of self, with all the true-hearted prayer that a saint pours out for himself, and for God's dear people—how will the groans, nevertheless, come out from the heart—"so little attained, so little of power!" Never mind; go on climbing up the hill. We shall be like him. We shall yet have no taste for anything the he has not a taste for, no mind save for that for which he has a mind. Like Christ clothed with immortality, incorruptibility and glory! And not only like him outside, even in a scene where all can shine out without disturbance, but like him all within, from the quickened soul upwards and outwards. All in harmony with Christ! What a word to have in one's heart, "I shall be" like him! His name written on my forehead, I shall be clothed upon with his likeness, for I shall see him as he is!

Now we see through a glass darkly, and yet, if any measure we see, we are moulded into the same image; but then eye to eye. Go onward. Onward in darkness? No, still in light, because it is onward to Christ. While the heart is occupied with him each step leads it nearer. Every spot that is unlike Christ becomes odious. We purify ourselves, "even as he is pure."

"The sentiment that it matters not what a man believes, so that he is sincere, is as unscriptural as it is absurd. Sincerity in belief has no more effect in warding off evil in the spiritual, than in the natural kingdom. If the teachings and persuasions of a reputed chemist should prevail on you to believe that arsenic is harmless, would it therefore be harmless? Could you mix it with your bread, and you and your children eat it without injury to health and life? Oh, no! Neither will the sincerity of your belief save you from the consequence of error in religious faith. Right belief—truth, God's truth, my brethren, is the only foundation which you can safely rest your hopes."

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Lord willing, the Church of God at Watson, Allegan county, Mich., will be dedicated to the worship of God, Dec. 16, 1883. A cordial invitation is extended to all lovers of the truth to visit us at this time, enjoy communion and pleasant exchange of thought on different subjects presented in the loved Book of books, become acquainted with each other, suggest whatever will be of benefit and good to the furtherance of the gospel and be in every way benefited by the visit and meetings. Ministers from abroad are especially desired to visit us and help present the truth.

Sunday, Dec. 16, at 11 o'clock, is the day and hour appointed for the first service. Meetings are expected to continue several days.

Friends coming will take the G. R. and I. R. R., stop off at Martin, and inquire for Brother Isaac Caitor Brother James Pallette, where they will find accommodations and be taken to the meetings at Watson, four miles distant.

By order of the Church.

M. A. WOODWARD.

Send us the name of a friend who would be likely to be interested in THE RESTITUTION and we will send him a sample copy.

MISSIONARY FUND.

We, as a people, have never had any system for missionary work. It is very desirable that a plan be adopted through which all can contribute to both home and foreign missionary work. To this end, the Publication Association has concluded to establish a missionary fund, to which all may contribute. The plan is this. Any one can send to THE RESTITUTION such amount as they may desire to contribute, and have the paper sent to such person or persons as they may name. Or they can send the money and leave Brother Chaplin to use it in sending the papers to such persons as he may think best. The Free-Will offerings sent out many missionaries, in the shape of RESTITUTIONS. These missionaries went into the families of persons who were hungry for the truths of the glorious gospel, and I have no doubt will be as bread cast upon the waters. When we sit down at our firesides, with our families gathered around, and take up THE RESTITUTION and read the encouraging reports from brethren residing in different parts of the world, the glorious promises made by God to his children, the signs of the times indicating the near approach of the time when our dear Redeemer will return again to this earth, bringing with him the reward of the saints, do we not feel that we would like to be the instrument of gladdening the hearts of others by putting THE RESTITUTION into their hands that they might read and understand these beautiful truths, and learn the road that leads to everlasting life, that the angels in heaven may rejoice over one more sinner who hath repented, and another star added to our crown?

This is not a vain undertaking. We know that every dollar spent will bring in, some thirty, some sixty, and some an hundred fold. It is more blessed to give than to receive.

Oh! let us remember the words of Christ, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

How we admire Paul's effort to convert King Agrippa! There are millions of souls in the world just as valuable as Agrippa and who would more readily accept and obey the truth. Then let us work while it is day, for the night cometh wherein no man can work. Our time is short, and what we do must be done quickly. Do not put it off until next year or next month. We may never see next year. Now is the accepted time. The harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few.

B. B. DITCHFIELD, Pres.

Last week we sent out in our paper printed slips, to be used in sending renewals to us. On these slips was a space to write Name, Post Office and State. Many persons in writing leave off some part of their address, and the object of these slips was to get full address by giving a space for each part. Some received slips whose subscriptions do not expire for months, and have looked upon them as notices that their time was out, but they are only intended to be a convenience to our patrons.

Several complaints have been made of late of money sent and lost. We will now say that we cannot be responsible for money sent loose in letters. Send by Bank Draft, Post Office Order or Registered Letter, and it may be at our risk; otherwise the sender takes his own risk. Please do not send Bank Checks, as we often have trouble in collecting them. Parties who are obliged to send postage stamps will please buy the one or two cent denominations.

Youths' Column.

MARTHA OR MARY.

I cannot choose; I should have liked so much
To sit at Jesus' feet, to feel the touch
Of his kind, gentle hand upon my head,
While drinking in the precious words he said.

And yet to serve him! Oh, divine employ!
To minister and give the Master joy,
To bathe in coolest springs his weary feet,
And wait upon him while he sat at meat.

Worship or service—which? Ah! that is best
To which he calls me, be it toil or rest;
To labor for him in life's busy strife,
Or seek his feet, a silent worshiper.

So let him choose for us; we are not strong
To make the choice. Perhaps we should go wrong.
Mistaking zeal for service, sinful sloth
For loving worship; and so fail of both.

Shirking Duty.

The habit of shirking is a great evil in our land. Sad and bitter are the experiences of multitudes who have lost positions of emolument and trust by shirking duties and responsibilities devolving upon them. They saw their mistake after it was too late. It is a bad sign to see a young man contracting the habit of shirking. You may set it down at once that sooner or later he will be a drone in the great hive of human industry, living without any purpose in life and scorned by all who have willing hands, and follow up whatever they can find to do. Young men, if you want to gain the confidence and esteem of your employer, never shrink from a duty. If overtasked, lay in your complaints, and you will always get a hearing. If you begin life a shirk, you may set it down as a fixed fact that the habit will follow you through life, and instead of a success you will be an utter failure.

The Safest Way.

"You never signed the pledge, did you, Uncle John?"

Uncle John was Harry's ideal of a great and noble man. And it was not a mistaken ideal. Uncle John's hair was white with the passing of over eighty winters, but his eye was bright, his step firm, and his voice earnest and kindly as ever. His life had been one of uprightness as well as one of what the world calls success.

"I never signed a pledge on my own account; I presume I have signed several as an example or aid to others," replied Uncle John.

"Casper Firmstone is all the time teasing me to sign," said Harry; but I know I can drink a gill of cider and not want any more, or let it alone if I do want it. And I can take one sip of the best wine Mr. Fraser has and not take the second. So, I don't see any use in hampering a fellow with a piece of paper."

"Don't be too sure about what you can do, Harry. I've seen a good many 'sure' people in my life, as well as a good many 'cautious' people, and I've always noticed in the long run that the cautious people were the safest. I'll tell you where I first learned that lesson, if you'd like to know."

"I should," said Harry, always ready at the first hint of a story.

"When I was a boy, a good deal smaller than you, I lived in a small town in Vermont. There was a large creek by the village, and at a place called 'The Mills,' there was a beautiful fall of water of ten or twelve feet, pitching off from an even-edged flat rock. Reaching quite across the creek, a distance of twenty feet, over this fall of water, was a bridge spanning the stream.

"The sides of this bridge were boarded up some four feet high. These side-pieces were capped by a flat railing of boards of from four to six inches wide. Some of the more daring school children used to walk on this narrow coping-board when crossing the bridge, and more than one fall and serious injury happened there.

"There was one thing that saved me from getting hurt or killed by the dangerous crossing. You would like to know what it was? The easiest thing in the world. It happened from the small circumstance that I never had the courage or disposition to walk there at all. In other words, I wasn't 'sure' of my head, and I was sure on the broad open bridge.

"I can think of a great many places that boys and men try to pass safely which are quite as dangerous, and where multitudes fall and ruin themselves, and perhaps perish, both soul and body forever. The safest way is never to take the first step on a dangerous path."—Youth's Temperance Banner.

The Old Way the True Way.

It is frequently asserted that the old reasoning on the evidences of Christianity, or of such a fact as that of the resurrection, will no longer answer in view of modern objections.

It might have been done, they say, fifty years ago, but "the higher criticism has given a new aspect to the matter." Paley and Lardner did very well as against the more shallow infidels of their day, but there has arisen a race of unbelieving Anakim, far surpassing Hume and Voltaire. The defender of the Scriptures needs new armor to meet them. German rationalism has rendered all the old arguments obsolete. This is repeated continually. By sheer reiteration, often without the attempt to give a particle of evidence, the impression is produced, especially on the minds of the young, that there has somehow arisen some new and terrible form of doubt, some most formidable difficulty unknown to other times, and unassailable by any former arguments. It is an undefined spectre. It is everywhere haunting our modern literature, though taking no precise form. It is the shadowy presence of some new enemy, never clearly seen, but who has rendered unavailing, it is said, all former tactics, whether of assault or defense. In defending Christianity, if it can be defended, we must make a new start, and proceed upon grounds differing altogether from the old.

Now this is all an impudent falsehood. We say it unhesitatingly. There are no new difficulties serious enough to be entitled to the name. There is no substantial objection to the gospel, or to the Bible generally, that has not been known to scholarly and thinking men for more than a thousand years. Some aspects of Bible authorship have been changed, some ecclesiastical writings have been pronounced spurious, though very few that had not always been suspected; some new various readings have been discovered, but in no respects, or at least in the most unessential respects, have they changed the general aspect of the critical field, much less that great argument remaining the same from age to age because built on the unchanging foundations of our deeply investigated nature. There is, in short, no vital, no essential difficulty, no one going to the root of the great debate, that was not as familiar to the learned men of the seventeenth century as it is to the best scholars now.—Tayler Lewis.

Communications.

KEWANNA, Ind.

"Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days." Eccl. xi. 1.

My dear brother, I am not, as Paul said, ashamed of the glad tidings, for they are the power of God for salvation to all believing. Diaglott. It is said the term gospel was derived from the Saxon mode of curing disease by a charm or spell, hence the gospel was counted God's spell or charm. Whether the Saxons ever cured disease by a spell or charm I know not, but one thing I do know, the gospel, which is the glad tidings of the kingdom of God, has been so effecting in its charms, that all, who by a hearty faith, have laid hold of it in its requirements, will as surely live as those Israelites did, who, by faith, looked upon the brazen serpent; for as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of Man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in him shall not perish but have eternal life. Those Israelites who looked obtained temporal life, but those who believe in the Son of God have the promise of the life that now is, and that which is to come, which is everlasting.

Before I dismiss the above I wish to ask a few questions. Did Moses place the serpent, which God bade him lift up for the salvation of bitten Israel, in such a position that only a few could see it, and then demand that all should look upon it or die? No, all could see it. So will it be with the plan through Christ. How long had they the privilege of looking? Just as long as the evil lasted. Did Moses take down the brazen serpent and leave a multitude of bitten Israelites with no opportunity to look? No, they all had the opportunity to look—they all had the opportunity to gain the life offered by that plan. The two plans are alike. All will have an opportunity to look to Christ and live forever. "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have eternal life."

I was made to rejoice today when reading the letter in THE RESTITUTION written by the Cherokee brother that had resolved himself into the truths of the glad tidings, and out of the orthodox quagmire, as he calls it. It reminds me of the young Indian to whom the missionary gave a Testament. After he had learned to read, he, like this brother, read himself into the gospel and wanted to become a Christian, as he had read that faith and baptism, by immersion for remission of sins would bring him into Christ. Determined he would obey the injunction and come to the priest of the mission demanding baptism to which the priest made answer they would attend to it soon. The Indian made answer, saying, "No river here," having read that he must go in the river to be baptised. The priest told him he could baptise him without going into the water, to which the Indian made reply, in his native tongue, "No, no, else you gave me the wrong Bible." Thus it is; if these false teachers would let the people read the Scriptures for themselves, they would come to a correct understanding of the perfect law of liberty, for it reads to all the same and was given by inspiration for correction that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished with a proper guide unto all truth necessary to guide us to our Father's home; and what brightens my day the more is, that God would make use of such a feeble instrument as I was to bring so many unto Christ.

To give you a history of the circumstances: About twenty years ago or thereabouts, I laid my precious wife to rest in the grave to wake up at the sounding of the trump of God, then moved to Rochester, county seat of Fulton Co., and preached a few sermons in the place. My present wife being a member of Christ's body gave me the needed assistance by encouraging me; and I made an appointment to be at a school house five or six miles east of Rochester where the gospel had never been heard. My name had gone before. I reasoned out of the Scriptures and the gospel hope, testifying to no other gospel than what the prophets, Christ and the apostles proclaimed; and I also testified that I had been a Bible reader for over forty years, but had yet to find where it said the righteous got their reward prior to the resurrection.

This fastened in the mind of a man so much that when he arrived home he took his Bible down from the shelf where it had lain undisturbed for 15 years, I think he told me or about that time, supposing, as he told me, that he would find that the righteous get their reward at death in every chapter, but to his surprise could not find it there but could find many places to corroborate what I said. At my next appointment he with his lady was there as usual. He now ventured to ask me home with him, but others being before him I told him that at my next appointment I would go with him. The next time I went and he had a great many questions to ask and received my answers. He afterwards told me that every prop was removed by the gospel, his wife telling him that they ought to believe for I gave the word for everything I said.

At my fourth appointment they both demanded baptism. They were the first in that neighborhood that obeyed the glad tidings of the kingdom. Blessed thought to look upon past scenes. These two children that it has pleased God to make me instrumental in bringing into Christ are J. F. Wagoner and wife; and keeping up the proclamation of the gospel in adjoining neighborhoods there were added some seventy souls, baptized into Christ by faith. Among the rest was Brother J. Poore and wife who have been proclaiming the word of life in Kansas for a number of years; several of them have fallen asleep whose faith grew more and more up to the time of their departure. O, how sweet is the remembrance of them by me, knowing what Christ said, "Because I live, you shall live also." I feel that the time is at the door and feel to say as John said, "Amen, even so come Lord Jesus." I was 30 years old the 28th of April, 1883, and have sweet union and communion with my adorable Creator and Redeemer. JACOB SHAFFER.

I left home on Thursday, Nov. 8, 1883, according to arrangements and started for Illinois. From here I went to Indianapolis, where I took the train for Martinsville, Ill., a distance of one hundred and two miles, arriving there at 4 p. m. There I found a man waiting for me with a two-horse wagon. I was still eleven miles from the church, but arrived in time and found it so crowded that there were not seats for them to sit on. The church is controlled principally by Baptists and Christians (or Campbellites). I spoke nine times at this house, on subjects that we dearly love, to as large and attentive audiences as it was ever my lot to witness. We then had to give up the house to one of the above denominations, by former arrangements. By request I then went some three miles and spoke twice in a Presbyterian church to large audiences each time. I went from here some five miles and spoke in a Baptist church on the subject of the resurrection, text, Rev. xiv. 13, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord." I showed from this text that it applied to the dead and not to something that did not die. At the close of the meeting one man said that so far as the resurrection was concerned he believed I was correct, but said he, God told Adam that in the day that he ate the fruit he should die, and he believed he did die, which death was a spiritual death or a separation from God. I spoke and said we would consult Paul. I turned to 1 Cor. xv. 46, "Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural, and afterward that which is spiritual. I said this text proved without doubt that the first man Adam was not spiritual, therefore he could not die a spiritual death, as the 45th verse of the same chapter shows. I would like to know if we have any brethren in Shelby Co., Ind., and is THE RESTITUTION sent to Shelbyville, Ind. I would like to correspond with them if there are any persons there. I am willing to go anywhere to preach the gospel by the help of my Master, the friends bearing my expenses. You can do as you like about publishing this. Please insert my P. O. address, Sugar Creek, Hancock Co., Indiana.

Your Brother in Christ,
S. T. HOOK.

Report of Meetings.

I left home Oct. 11th for the State conference held near Adrian, Michigan, commencing Oct. 12, and continuing over the following Sunday. Had a good meeting, as already reported.

From there I went to Brother H. S. Miller's north of Blendon. Held meetings for five days.

From there I went to Brother E. Hoyt's, where I stayed two nights, and then went to Dutton, the home of Brother Wm. McCroden, and stayed over night. The next afternoon, Sister McCroden, mother of Brother Wm. McCroden, took me over near Byron Center to hold a meeting. The appointment was sent over by Brother Hoyt. Held meeting sixteen days, and over three Sundays. The first Sunday Brother Crozier had an appointment and filled it in the forenoon. The next Sunday Brother and Sister Hoyt were at the meeting, and Brother Hoyt preached one discourse. We had a good meeting. Although there were no additions, we had one of the best meetings it has been my privilege to enjoy. The brethren and sisters were built up, and they were so encouraged, and so many points cleared up that they did not understand before. That meeting will long be remembered by us all. I made my headquarters with Father Terrell's household. He and his dear companion are old soldiers in the faith. They have stood there for many years. And Sister Smith and daughter live there with the old folks—daughter and grand-daughter of the old settler that many good visits with others of the members of the church. I am requested to come some time this winter and hold another meeting. Brother Calvin Winchester is the elder of the church, and Brother Bennet intends preaching some among the brethren.

By request of Brother F. G. North I visited the village of Leslie, in Ingham county. He engaged the Free Will Baptist meeting house. He had attended their meetings, and had contributed to keep up the meetings and Sunday schools, and had the promise that if any of his folks came along they were welcome to use the house. So with that understanding he gave out meetings for Friday and Saturday nights. We had quite a good turn out, with two ministers present, one of them being the Baptist minister. My subject was eternal life, how obtained and where; proving that we could not obtain it without a resurrection of the dead and a change of the living at that time. Some few of the members said they believed that kind of doctrine, that it looked reasonable; and we anticipated a large turnout on Saturday night. But they had consulted together, and all stayed away, and we had but few out. The preacher and members all stayed away. They did not intend to come, from appearances, for on Friday they came and notified Brother North that he would have to light up and build fires. I never saw any worse treatment. A man came into Brother North's shop and wanted to borrow THE RESTITUTION. He lent it to him and I gave him one of Wiley Jones' tracts on the gospel, and after he had looked through it and the paper, he said he did not believe the doctrine they teach—he did not believe in the return of the Jews to their land with Christ to reign over them. I told him the angel Gabriel had said so. He said he did not care, he did not believe it. I quoted what the angel said to Mary. He raised his hand and said, "I don't care; I would not believe it if the Angel Gabriel should come and tell it now." He went off with the paper, and it is very evident they met and concluded to all keep away. So we got the house no more. So I came out to some four miles from town, and will hold meetings over another Sunday. I am having a good meeting here. The Lord is good, and may his word have the desired effect, is my prayer. J. S. HATCH.

I am still a pilgrim, joyfully wending my way through this vale of sorrow to the highlands of glory. Never did fair Beulah's blissful plains look so glorious! By faith I can view the blood-washed throng walking amid its beautiful groves, all clad in white, bearing in their hands the victor's palm, and shouting their loud alleluias to "him that hath loved them, and washed them from their sins in his own blood, and hath made for us a kingdom—priests for his God and Father; to him be the glory and the might for the ages of the ages. AMEN."

Glorious day when the redeemed of all ages shall in harmony meet each other to greet upon the plains of Eden restored! O what a thrill of joy will fill each heart as they walk beside those crystal waters, and reach forth their immortal hands, and pluck fruit from life's fair tree, which will then grow in the midst of the paradise of God! View them as they repose themselves among those vine-clad hills of Eden, dressed up by a hand that is all divine, and to make their happiness the more complete, listen to those sweet notes that now fall from Eden's feathered songsters, borne along on zephyr's stainless wing, and salutes the ears of the redeemed throng! Glory be to God! Eden's beautiful city, with its jasper walls, its pearly gates, and streets of gold is in full view! Its glories beam upon my mind, its odors are wafted to me, its sound salutes mine ear, its spirit I inhale! O my Father, shall I be gathered with the ransomed hosts within those jasper walls? If so, I know that I must keep thy commandments. Rev. xxii. 14. R. V. LYON.

You probably are not aware that my work is principally among our German population. If I had more means, so that I could devote the most of my time to the ministry—which I would gladly do—there is no doubt but that much could be done, as a great field is opening among us. But as it is, I have to do much manual labor to earn the means for a living.

I translated a tract into German, and would like to translate more of our English reading matter into German if I had the means to get it printed.

For this purpose I have opened a German tract fund into which any one can contribute who has means and feels an interest in spreading the glad tidings of the coming kingdom. Any amount is thankfully received, from ten cents up, but I do not resort to begging, as the Lord will take care of his things.

We expect to have a protracted meeting at our house in the early part of this winter, when Brother Keim, of Philadelphia, will preach in English.

Thanks for the copies of THE RESTITUTION you have sent me.

Your brother in Christ,
J. Z. SOLLMAN.

CIRCULAR.

To the Students of Prophecy throughout the World:

The undersigned proposes to issue from the press, either in Chicago or in New York City, as circumstances may decide, the following works, to-wit:

I. The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. In the first division the nature of the Coming Age is fully discussed, as to its physical and moral character: 1. That the earth itself has a crowning age, in which it shall be perfectly adapted to be the residence of man in his highest type; 2. That man, in that resurrection state, will be under the endless reign of the Personal Messiah; 3. In establishing the proximity of that age, the prophecies of Ezekiel, Isaiah, Daniel, Zechariah, Christ, Paul, Peter, and the Apocalypse, are critically examined, relative to its rapid approach.

II. The second work will be devoted to the investigation of the various phases of the Eastern Question:—1. The Egyptian phase, 2. The British phase, 3. The Russian phase, 4. The Ottoman phase, 5. The Hebrew phase, 6. The American phase, 7. Lesser phases of the Eastern Question, 8. The location of each of the Great Powers in the coming contest, 9. All nations marshal under the banners of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. These powers are traced in history to the present time. All the great national issues are fully investigated.

If all that are interested in these great and most sublime topics will aid, they will be issued immediately. They will be printed and bound in a form that will do credit to the vastness of the subjects, and put to subscribers at prices quite reasonable. The books will contain about 500 large royal 8vo. pages each.

Title Page.—"The Law, the Covenants; and the Sabbath. Also an Epitome of the Great Salvation; and an Appendix including various other subjects, in brief.

The law of Moses and law of Christ are compared and contrasted, and the relation of both to the old and new covenants is treated at some length. The Sabbath question is carefully and lengthily examined, and presented and discussed in a somewhat new light.

The work also includes the consideration of Sunday, conditional immortality, the gospel, return of the Jews, the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, punishment of the wicked, the state of the dead, the new birth, the one faith, the one hope, the image of God, nature of Christ, the name, religion, morality, Christianity, etc.

THE SUN.

NEW YORK, 1884.

About sixty million copies of The Sun have gone out of our establishment during the past twelve months.

If you were to paste and to read all the columns of all The Sun's printed and sold last year you would get a continuous strip of interesting information, common sense wisdom, sound doctrine, and fun all long enough to reach from Printing House square to the top of Mount Copernicus in the moon, then back to Printing House square, and then three-quarters of the way back to the moon again.

But The Sun is written for the inhabitants of the earth; this same strip of intelligence would girdle the globe twenty-seven or twenty-eight times.

If every buyer of a copy of The Sun during the past year had spent only one hour over it, and if his wife or his grandfather has spent another hour, this newspaper in 1883 has afforded the human race thirteen thousand years of steady reading, night and day.

It is only by these calculations like these that you can form any idea of the circulation of the most popular of American newspapers, or of its influence on the opinions and actions of American men and women.

The Sun is, and will continue to be, a newspaper which tells the truth without fear of consequences, which gets at the facts no matter how much the process costs, and which presents the news of all the world without waste of words and in the most readable shape.

If you know The Sun, you like it already, and you will read it with accustomed diligence and profit during what is sure to be the most interesting year in its history. If you do not yet know The Sun, it is high time to get into the condition.

CALLED ASIDE.

"I have somewhat to say unto thee."

Called aside!
From the glad workings of the busy life,
From the world's ceaseless stir of care and strife,
Into the shade and stillness by the heavenly Guide,
For a brief space thou hast been called aside.

Lonely hours
Thou hast spent, weary on a couch of pain,
Watching the golden sunshine and the falling rain;
Hours, whose end length only to him was known,
Who trod a sadder pathway, dark and lone.

Laid aside!
May not the little cup of suffering be
A loving one of blessing given to thee?
The cross of chastening sent thee from above
By him who bore the cross, whose name is Love.

Called aside!
Hast thou no memories of that "little while?"
No sweet remembrance of thy Father's smile?
No hidden thoughts that wrapped thee in their fold,
Of him who did such light and grace unfold?

Called aside,
Perhaps into a desert garden dim,
And yet not lone, when thou hast been with him,
And heard his voice in sweetest accents say,
"Child, will thou not with me this still hour stay?"

Called aside!
In hidden paths with Christ thy Lord to tread,
Deeper to drink at the sweet Fountain-head;
Closer in fellowship with him to roam,
Nearer, perchance, to feel thy heavenly home.

Called aside!
O, knowledge deeper grows with him alone,
In secret oft his deeper love is shown.
And lonely, in many an hour of dark distress,
Some rare, sweet lesson of his tenderness.

Called aside!
We thank thee for the stillness and the shade;
We thank thee for the hidden paths thy love hath made,
And, for that we have wept and watched with thee,
We think thee for our dark Gethsemane.

Called aside!
O, restful thought!—he doeth all things well—
O, blessed sense, with Christ alone to dwell!
So, in the shadow of thy cross to bide,
We thank thee, Lord, to have been called aside.

The Four Great Dispensations; or, a Prophetico-Historical View of the Work of Redemption.

THE MOSAIC DISPENSATION.

"What then is the law? It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise hath been made. . . So that the law hath been our tutor to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith." Gal. iii. 19, 24.

It has been already shown that during the patriarchal dispensation, extending from Eden to Sinai, a period of about 2500 years, the door of mercy was open to man, the way of salvation diligently taught, and the work of preparation for the Messiah's first advent continuously carried on. The Mosaic dispensation was itself a system of tutorage for the first advent,—"the law hath been our tutor to bring us unto Christ," and during that dispensation preparation for the first coming of Christ was made chiefly in the following ways:

I. By promises and prophecies descriptive of him, such as,

1. That he was to be the son of God, and born of the family of David. The Father said, "I will raise unto David a righteous Branch and a King shall reign and prosper. . . . . And this is his name whereby he shall be called, The Lord Our Righteousness." Jer. xxiii. 5, 6. To David he promised, "I will set up thy seed after thee, which shall proceed out of thy bowels, and I will establish his kingdom. . . . I will be his Father and he shall be my Son." 2 Sam. vii. 12, 14. In perfect agreement with this, Gabriel said to Mary, "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David." Luke i. 32.

2. That he was to be born of a virgin. "Behold, a virgin (rather, 'the virgin,' as הָעַלְמָה signifies) shall conceive and bear a Son, and shall call his name Immanuel." Isa. vii. 14. This showed that his birth was to be an extraordinary miracle, the immediate work of God, such as a son of a virgin is. He was before called "the seed of the woman," by way of distinction, for he was not to be born in the ordinary way of generation. Gen. iii. 14. The same Almighty One who miraculously brought Adam and Eve into existence could, of course, accomplish this also. Matt. i. 31.

3. That he was to be born in Bethlehem. "Thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be Ruler in Israel." Micah v. 2.

4. That he was to be distinguished by peculiar grace and wisdom, and the descent of the Holy Spirit upon him. "There shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a Branch shall grow out of his roots; and the spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord." Isa. xi. 1, 2. Seven gifts of the Spirit are here specified, to imply that the perfection of them were to be in him. Thus the "Branch" in this prophecy is identified with the glorified Redeemer "that hath the seven spirits of God," or the Holy Spirit in its sevenfold or perfect fulness of power. Rev. iii. 1; v. 6.

"Behold my servant whom I uphold; mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth; I have put my Spirit upon him." Isa. xlii. 1. How beautifully this corresponds to that scene on the banks of the Jordan, "Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water: and, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him: and lo a voice from heaven, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Matt. iii. 16, 17.

5. That he was to be a prophet, and preach the word of the Lord. Moses testified Israel, "The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me." Deut. xviii. 18. And Isaiah spake of him as saying, "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me: because he hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek." Isa. lxi. 1.

6. That he was to be hated and persecuted without a cause. "They that hate me without a cause are more than the hairs of my head." Psa. lxix. 4. "He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief; and we hid as it were our faces from him; he was despised and we esteemed him not." Isa. liii. 3. Pilate, before whom he was tried and who passed sentence of death on him, said, "I am innocent of the blood of this just person. . . . I find in him no fault at all." Matt. xxvii. 24; Jno. xviii. 38.

7. That he was to ride humbly on a colt into Jerusalem. Zec. ix. 9.

8. That he was to be conspired against by Jews and Gentiles. "Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together against the Lord and against his anointed." Psa. ii. 1, 2. The church in Jerusalem, commenting on this, said, "Of a truth against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel were gathered together." Acts iv. 27.

9. That he was to be sold for thirty pieces of silver. "They weighed for my price thirty pieces of silver." Zech. xi. 12.

10. That he was to be temporarily forsaken by his disciples. When he was betrayed that prophecy was fulfilled which had said, "Smite the Shepherd and the sheep shall be scattered." Zech. xiii. 7.

11. That he was to be put to death without a cause. "He was oppressed, and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth." Isa. liii. 7.

12. That he was to be scourged and spit upon. "I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair: I hid not my face from shame and spitting." Isa. l. 6.

13. That he was to die not by the Jewish method of stoning, but the Roman method of crucifixion. This was indicated by the words, "All my bones are out of joint," "They pierced my hands and feet" and "They shall look upon me whom they have pierced." Psa. xxii. 14, 16; Zech. xii. 10. Before this could be accomplished the Romans had to obtain the political ascendency and the death-power in Judea.

14. That he was to be patient under his sufferings. "He was oppressed, and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth." Isa. liii. 7.

15. That he was to be mocked by his enemies. "All they that see me laugh me to scorn: they shoot out the lip, they shake the head." Psa. xxii. 7.

16. That he was to appear and die in the time of the second temple, and within 500 years after it was built. The Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger of the covenant whom ye delight in." Mal. iii. 1. "From the going forth of the commandment to restore and rebuild Jerusalem unto the Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks and three-score and two weeks." Dan. ix. 25. In these 69 weeks a day is put for a year, according to the prophetic style. And therefore multiplying the number of weeks by the number of days in a week (69 by 7), we have 483 as the exact number of years "from the going forth of the commandment to restore and rebuild Jerusalem unto the Messiah the Prince."

17. That his death was to be sacrificial, and without precedent, for birds and beasts were the only bleeding sacrifices that had been accepted before. "After three score and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off but not for himself." Dan. ix. 26. "He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities." Isa. liii. 5. Hence, Paul says, "Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures." 1 Cor. xv. 3. Such a sacrifice was essential to the work of redemption, "for it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins." Heb. x. 4.

18. That he was to rise again before seeing corruption. "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption." Psa. xvi. 10

19. That he was to be not only the great sacrifice, but also the great High Priest, Intercessor, or Mediator. "He bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors." Isa. liii. 12.

20. That he was to show the light of salvation to Gentiles as well as Jews. "I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation unto the end of the earth." Isa. xlix. 6; and xlii. 6, 7; xl. 10. Hence, the aged Simeon, well instructed in the law and the prophets, took the infant Savior in his arms and said, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word: for mine eyes have seen thy salvation, which thou hast prepared before the face of all people; a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel." Luke ii. 29–32. And the Savior himself, after rising from the dead, instructed the apostles, "That repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem." Luke xxiv. 47.

21. That he was to ascend to the right hand of the Father and remain there an appointed season. "Thou wilt shew me the path of life: in thy presence is fulness of joy." Psa. xvi. 11. "The Lord (Jehovah) said unto my Lord (Adoni) sit thou at my right hand until I make thine enemies thy footstool." Psa. cx. 1. Thus "the heavens must receive him until the times of restoration of all things, whereof God spake by the mouth of his holy prophets which have been since the world began." Acts iii. 21, R. V. In the words, "The Lord said unto my Lord," there is much instruction, for they show that though the Messiah was the Son of David, he was also the Son of God, and, therefore, David's Lord, having a divine as well as a human nature. Here the cavilling Pharisees were refuted. Matt. xxii. 41–46. These words also discriminate, as the type in the O. T. shows, between the "Lord" who speaks and the "Lord" who is spoken to, the former being Jehovah, and the latter Adoni, in the Hebrew of this Psalm; although it is to be observed that when translated into the Greek of the [illegible] the same word (Kurios) is used for both. It is also to be observed that in the Hebrew the Father's name (Jehovah) is several times applied to the Son.

22. That this same Jesus who was to ascend into heaven will return, not in suffering humility, however, but in awful majesty and conquering power. "The Lord at thy right hand shall strike through kings in the day of his wrath." Psa. cx. 5. "Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence: a fire shall devour before him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about him." Psa. l. 3. Compare these words of the apostle, "The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God and obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." 2 Thess. i. 7, 8.

23. That he will be attended by a multitude of holy beings. "The Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with thee." Zech. xiv. 5.

24. That he will gather his saints together unto him, but will destroy his enemies. "He shall call to the heavens from above, and to the earth, that he may judge his people. Gather my saints together unto me." Psa. l. 4, 5. "They shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels; and I will spare them, as a man spareth his own son that serveth him." Mal. iii. 17. "A fire goeth before him, and burneth up his enemies round about." Psa. xcvii. 3.

25. That he will descend to the Mount of Olives, from which he ascended. "His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives which is before Jerusalem on the east." Zech. xiv. 4.

26. That he will reign in Jerusalem, on the throne of David. "The moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously." Isa. xxiv. 23. "Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even forever." Isa. ix. 7.

27. That he will rule the restored nation of Israel. "Thou Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be Ruler in Israel." Micah v. 2.

28. That he will execute judgment and justice in the earth, and be called "The Lord our Righteousness," which title in Hebrew is Jehovah-tsidkenu. "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely: and this is his name whereby he shall be called, The Lord our Righteousness." Jer. xxiii. 5, 6. On this prophecy the celebrated Commentary of Jamieson, Fausset and Brown, very truthfully says, "The accomplishment must be still future, when both Judah and Israel in their own land shall dwell safely under a Christocracy, far more privileged than even the old theocracy."

29. That he will inherit as his subjects, not Israel only but the world of nations, and will possess the entire earth itself on which they dwell. "I shall give thee the heathen (Hebrew, goyim, nations) for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." Psa. ii. 8. "His dominion shall be from sea even to sea, and from the river even to the ends of the earth." Zech. ix. 10.

30. That under him the redeemed will reign as subordinate princes. "The saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom forever, even for ever and ever." "The kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." Dan. vii. 18, 27. ("The people of the saints" means the saints themselves, just as, by the same Hebraism, "the people of the children of Israel" means the children of Israel. See Ex. i. 9; Acts iv. 27.) "A King shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment." Isa. xxxii. 1. J. F. & B., already quoted, have caught the true meaning here also, for they define these "princes" as "referring to all in authority under Christ in the coming kingdom on earth, e. g., the apostles, etc., Luke xxii. 30; 1 Cor. vi. 2; 2 Tim. ii. 12; Rev. ii. 26, 27; iii. 21."

31. That all nations shall serve him, and his kingdom shall never be destroyed. "There was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." Dan. vii. 14. "And the Lord shall be King over all the earth: in that day there shall be one Lord, and his name one." Zech. xiv. 9.

These, and similar prophecies of the patriarchal age, are wonderful and instructive testimonies which, like so many rays of light, meet and centre in none but Jesus, and prove him to be indeed "the Christ the Son of the living God." In "testifying beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glories that should follow," 1 Peter i. 11, they portrayed his person, work, and doctrine, so that when he came "preaching the gospel of the kingdom," Matt. ix. 35, he called upon the people to "believe on him as the Scripture hath said." Jno. vii. 38. Of course, he meant the prophetic Scripture, for at that time the portion of the Bible called the New Testament had not been written, and even when written it said nothing to contradict, but rather to confirm the prophecies. Acts xxvi. 22; 2 Peter iii. 2; Luke xxiv. 44; Rom. xv. 8. Now this appeal to "the Scripture" shows that we are not to frame a Christ according to our fancy, or wilfulness, or stubbornness. It is idolatry to worship what we have framed, whether framed by our fancy or our fingers. "Stubbornness (Heb. שֵׁרִי, wilfulness) is as iniquity and idolatry," for those who "serve idols" are in reality, serving their own wilfulness by rejecting the laws and doctrines of the Lord, and enslaving themselves to laws and doctrines framed not by the lifeless idols of wood and stone, but by their own fancy, wilfulness, or "carnal mind." 1 Sam. xv. 23; Rom. viii. 7. That wilfulness or stubbornness in man which will not submit to "the Scriptures," but dethrones the human will in place of God's will, is the essence and foundation of all idolatry. Therefore our only safe way is to believe on Christ as," or in perfect harmony with what "the Scripture hath said" concerning him. And certainly it would be "wresting" or torturing that Scripture to interpret literally all that it says of his sufferings, and figuratively all that it says of his glories. If you believe that in his humility he was personally born in a literal Bethlehem on earth, why not believe also that in his glory he will be personally enthroned in a literal Jerusalem on earth? If you believe he condescended personally to suffer here, is it unreasonable to believe that he will condescend personally to reign here?

II. The Redeemer's first coming was also prepared for under the law by the continuance of those bleeding sacrifices which were types of the atonement he was to make.

The system of sacrifices was brought to perfection under this dispensation. Their observance was not left to the irregularities of the patriarchal age, but was arranged by legal precision, provided for by an appointed priesthood, a temple, and all the needful surroundings. The priests, in regular order, were required to offer sacrifices at the temple daily, and, besides this, three special seasons of offering were to be observed yearly by the nation—"in the feast of unleavened bread, and in the feast of weeks, and in the feast of tabernacles." Deut. xvi. 16. While attending these feasts at Jerusalem their homes were miraculously protected from hostile invasions, but after they crucified the Messiah this protection was withdrawn, and multitudes were besieged in Jerusalem while keeping the feast of unleavened bread, "their table becoming a snare unto them." Ex. xxxiv. 24; Rom. xi. 9. Even "the place" of the temple and sacrificial offerings was chosen by the Lord himself, and called "his habitation." Deut xii. 5, 11; Psa. lxxviii. 68. Thus in gathering up all sacrifices into one place, and under one high priest who entered "alone" into the Holy of Holies, was strongly foreshadowed the "one sacrifice" offered by the "one Mediator" who has entered "into heaven itself now to appear in the presence of God for us." Heb. ix. 24.

III. Also in still further teaching the gospel doctrine of justification by faith, preparation was made for the Messiah's coming and ministry.

This doctrine was inculcated in the Mosaic age not only by the "good reports" which many obtained "through faith" (Heb. xi. 32–40) and by the illustrious achievements which they were enabled to accomplish; but also by such teaching as the following: "The Lord will save the righteous because they trust in him." Psa. xxxvii. 40. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee." Isa. xxvi. 3. "The just shall live by his faith." Hab. ii. 4.

IV. By continued rebukes of sin during this dispensation also, men were shown the need of the coming Savior and of the atonement he was to make.

The entire law, given with such awful majesty at Sinai, is a monument of God's displeasure against sin. Also the punishments of Israel in the wilderness and by captivities, teach the same lesson, and "were written for our admonition." 1 Cor. x. 11. The punishments of Nebuchadnezzar are also notable instances.

V. Renowned personal types of Christ were set forth under this dispensation, as preparatory for his coming.

He was to be a Prophet "like unto Moses," who typified him as prophet or teacher, as deliverer, and as mediator. To which we may add that in "refusing to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter," Moses refused such glory as the world offers; "choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt: for he had respect unto the recompense of reward." And so all the glory that Satan could offer was refused by the Lord Jesus, "who for the joy that was set before him" by the Father, "endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God." Mat. iv. 8–10; Heb. xi. 24–26; xii. 2.

Aaron as high priest of Israel going alone into the Holy of Holies to make atonement, foreshadowed the great "High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus," who has entered "heaven itself, there to appear in the presence of God for us." Lev. xvi. 17; Heb. ix. 7, 24.

David, whose name signifies beloved, was the head of a royal family, ruled the twelve tribes of Israel, waged successful wars against the enemies of God, and enthroned in Zion, reigned over kings. So Christ, the dearly Beloved, is the "Head of all principality and power," will assign thrones to subordinate kings, will rule the twelve tribes of Israel, will conquer his foes, and reign in Zion as King of kings and Lord of lords.

Solomon, whose name signifies peaceable, typified the true Prince of peace in his millennial reign over converted Israel and the subdued nations.

Jonah thrown into the sea but rescued after being three days and nights in the great fish, typified the resurrection of Christ after being three days and nights "in the heart of the earth."

Thus we see that in both dispensations the greatest human lights were but shadows of the divine and "true Light of the world." Jno. i. 9; viii. 12.

VI. Preparation during the Mosaic dispensation was made for the Messiah's first advent by overruling the affairs of nations with reference to his coming.

The Lord "maketh the wrath of man praise him, and restraineth the remainder of wrath." Psa. lxxvii. 10. And so by great revolution and wars among the Gentiles during this period, the Jews with their Scriptures, their synagogue services, and their protests against idolatry, were stirred in among them somewhat as salt is stirred in meal that is about to be baked. By this preparation was greatly facilitated (when Christ came) the proclamation of the gospel among all nations by the apostles who were themselves Jews.

VII. Preparation for his coming was also carried on by the enlargement and preservation of the Scriptures which testified of him by the protection of the nation to whom they were committed.

It is one of the chief honors of Israel that "unto them were committed the oracles of God." And the Lord constantly guarded that nation that they might guard his words and institutions of worship, and that no hindrance might occur to the fulfillment of the promises concerning the nation, tribe, family, and city, in which Christ was to be born. That nation was, till Christ came, the divinely appointed librarian of the sacred books, the living casket in which was deposited that priceless gem—the word of God.

But the close of the patriarchal age found the world in a deplorable state: Gentiles "given over to a reprobate mind" (Rom. i. 28), and Israel beginning to "defile themselves with the idols of Egypt," in which land they had become slaves. Ezek. xx. 7, 8. And it seems they did not even feel free to offer the proper sacrifices there, for some of the animals they would offer were worshipped by their Egyptian masters. Ex. viii. 26. Besides the Egyptians were seeking to obliterate the chosen family by killing all the male children, and this would have imperiled the sacred records heralding Messiah's approach.

Hence, the need of a new dispensation under which that large family should be nationalized by a separate constitution and home of their own. As God, in over-watchful care, saved the believing household from the Deluge, and Israel from Haman's massacre, so now he saved the chosen family from extermination in Egypt, gave them a constitution at Sinai, and settled them in Canaan. This great Exodus from Egypt had been foretold to Abraham centuries before. Gen. xv. 14. Strict provisions were made in their constitution for the preservation of the oracles of God. As the most sacred archives of the nation, "the book of the law" was to be laid up in the side of the ark of the covenant, which ark was to be placed in the most Holy Place of the sanctuary, and that sanctuary vigilantly defended by the nation. Deut. xxxi. 26. At the end of every seven years, "in the feast of tabernacles," that book was to be read to the men, women, and children, and the strangers among them. Deut. xxxi. 10–13. (Many in this so-called "Christian nation" of this 19th century have not read so much of the Bible as that in seven years). The king was to have a copy, and "read therein all the days of his life." Deut. xvii. 19. The people were to lay up that law in their hearts, and teach it diligently to their children. No man, high or low, was to feel himself above the necessity of reading the Bible, for that book was at once their political constitution and their rule of faith. Deut. xi. 18, 19. Copies of "the law and the prophets" were greatly multiplied, being made with scrupulous care and sent off to be read at the Sabbath service in meeting houses called synagogues, which were early established in the land. Psa. lxxiv. 8; Acts xv. 21; xiii. 15, 27. Contemplating their condition at that time, in contrast with the benighted heathen around them, one might well exclaim, "Happy are thou, O Israel: who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord." . . . "How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel! As the valleys are they spread forth, as gardens by the river's side, as the trees of lign aloes which the Lord hath planted, and as cedar trees beside the waters." Deut. xxxiii. 29; Num. xxiv. 5, 6.

Not only were copies of the Scriptures made in Hebrew, but a translation—the Septuagint—was made about 270 B. C., into Greek, which copious and highly polished language had, by Alexander's conquests, become spread over a vast area of the world. The Lord foresaw that the Jews would reject the Messiah, and thus, in his merciful Providence, began opening avenues and depositories for preserving his word when they should, as it were, be "put out of the stewardship."

VIII. By showing that man cannot obtain salvation through the law, preparation was made for the coming of Christ, and for the atonement he was to make.

A long trial of nearly fifteen hundred years proved for all eternity that righteousness is obtainable only by the grace of God in Christ Jesus, and not by the works of the law. That law was a straightedge exhibiting man's crookedness and inability to conform himself to such a straightedge. Hence, we are driven to Christ as our only refuge and hope. So "the law hath been our tutor to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith"... "for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified." Gal. ii. 16; iii. 24; Rom. iii. 20.

IX. By showing also that neither can man discover righteousness by the researches of human philosophy, preparation was made for the reception of the coming Redeemer, and the system of righteousness which he proclaimed.

While it was being demonstrated among Jews that man cannot obtain righteousness by the law, it was being demonstrated among Gentiles, even of the highest culture, that neither can he discover it by the utmost powers of human wisdom or philosophy. (Even the modern theories of atoms, protoplasms, and ovolutions, are but the patchwork of old exploded paganism). So then, after that "the world through its wisdom knew not God," they were better prepared to appreciate the gospel which the Savior sent unto them. Thus, to the greater glory of Christ, all the world—Jews and Gentiles—were proved guilty before God, and utterly helpless without Christ the great Redeemer. 1 Cor. i. 21, R. V.; Rom. iii. 19.

X. By showing that human power, at its highest estate, is unfit to govern, is hostile to Christ, and worthy of extinction, preparation was made for the first advent and for welcoming "the glad tidings" then proclaimed that Christ intends to establish a perpetual and divine government here, and to reign as "King over all the earth."

The fourth empire described in prophecy was greater and worse than the three that preceded. Its extent is shown by its decree that "all the world should be taxed," its iniquity by its crucifying the Son of God. Under the coming kingdom of Christ "all nations shall be blessed" (Gal. iii. 8; Jer. iii. 17; Zech. xiv. 16–21), but they were far from being blessed under the ruler seated in the city of seven hills. Jewish society was in danger of being carried away by Pharisaic hypocrisy and tradition which "made void the commandments of God;" and Gentile society was festering and reeking with the abominations described in the first chapter of Romans. Under such a state of things mankind could vividly appreciate "the glad tidings" of a coming kingdom that for a thousand years will bless all nations, and ultimately—in its completed triumph—cause the will of God to "be done on earth, as it is in heaven." Mat. vi. 10; xxiv. 14.

Thus in viewing the glorious work of redemption as carried on during the two former dispensations, we have pointed out some of the great things that were done preparatory to the first coming of Christ, the atonement he was to make, and the preaching of his gospel in all the world.

[CORRECTIONS.—In my article on the patriarchal dispensation, for the words, "the sacrificial sufferings of Christ were prophetically described as the bruising of the serpent's head," read, "the sacrificial sufferings and ultimate triumphs of Christ were prophetically described as the bruising of his heel and the bruising of the serpent's head." And for, "Thus only did the principle of justification by faith begin to be revealed," read, "Thus early did the principle of justification by faith begin to be revealed."]

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Editor Restitution:

I send you enclosed translations of two more "oracular" passages, one from the Old and the other from the New Covenant. I thus give them in juxtaposition to show the harmony of the teaching when the thought of the original is really brought out. There are so many variations from the commonly accepted translations and they so materially affect some idolatrously cherished doctrines of so-called orthodoxy, that it would require too much space, I fear, should I attempt to give any adequate exposition or exegesis of the two passages, and I must trust to the reader's love of the truth "to compare Scripture with Scripture" for himself and "see whether these things are so." I have purposely sacrificed smoothness of diction in an attempt to convey the thought of the original as exactly as possible.

In the passage from Romans our Universalist brethren will see the fallacy of the argument they have commonly advanced as taken from this chapter, the fallacy appearing in the old mistranslation of one word δικαιοσις as though it was the same in meaning as δικαιωμα, the first meaning the process or way of justification, the last the result of the process or justification itself. The fallacy referred to also hinges perhaps upon the mistranslation of the word χαρισμα as though it were the same in meaning as the word δωρον or δωρημα, whereas these words all have a different meaning, and are all used in this chapter with their different specific meanings as a part of this wonderful argument of God by the mouth of his bond-servant Paul. The first means a gracious offer indicating the attitude of God toward man in his offer of salvation through the Christ. The next means, it (general term for gift or present) indicating that the provision of salvation on God's part as an absolute sovereign was a "free gift" of his love and mercy. The last means "beneficence" and indicates the true character of God as the Giver of givers.

1. Gracious offer. Attitude of God in Christ.

2. Gift. What he offers in Christ.

3. The character of the Giver in Christ.

In the passage from Esaias, 10th verse, "O, our life (natural) (addressed to Christ's corporate body the church) if ye give for sin, he (the Christ) will see a long-lived seed," the reader will see that the doctrine asserted here is precisely the same that is asserted by Christ himself in the "Sermon on the Mount." Self-sacrifice, namely, in the way of testimony even to the laying down of this natural life if required; and still further as Paul puts it, "our old man," meaning this same "natural life" "put off," "mortified," "laid down," "dead," etc. The prophet in this verse answers the query he raises in the 8th verse, "who will tell his generation?" Again in the 9th verse God is talking about something of far greater import than the burying of the body of the Christ in the tomb of the rich man of Arimathea, I think the reader will perceive.

Again a full understanding of this chapter throws a flood of light upon "the doctrine of perfection" so-called. The reader will see that the prophet speaks of several "perfections" as belonging to the Christ, his first perfection of which he himself speaks in this way "Go tell that fox Herod, lo I go my way today and tomorrow, and the third day I shall have been perfected" here spoken of by the prophet in this way "The Lord purposeth to take him away from the toil of his (their) natural life, to show him light."

Students of the doctrine of the atonement will be interested I think in the translation of this chapter also. But time and space forbid further comment on my part.

CHAS. GARDNER.

53d ESAIAS.

1. O Lord who hath believed our report, and to whom hath the arm of the Lord been revealed?

2. We have declared him to be as it were a little child in his sight, as it were a root in a thirsty earth. He hath no outward show nor glory. And we have seen (perceived with the eye of faith) him, and he hath no outward show nor beauty.

3. But his outward appearance is without honor and a failure when compared with the sons of men, he being a man in affliction and one who knoweth what it is to bear weakness. Because his (God's) face hath been averted, he hath been dishonored and not accounted (esteemed worthy).

4. This one beareth our sins and suffereth birth-pangs for us, and we have accounted him to be in toil and affliction and calamity.

5. But he hath been wounded because of our sins, and hath become weak because of our transgressions. Chastening for our peace is upon him, and with his stripe have we been healed.

6. We all like sheep have been led astray, man in his way hath been led astray; and the Lord hath given him (the Christ) up unto our sins.

7. And he because he hath suffered calamity hath not opened his mouth; as it were a sheep hath he been led to slaughter, and as it were a lamb dumb before the shearer, even so hath he not opened his mouth.

8. In his humiliation, his legal trial hath been taken away from him; his generation who will tell? Because his life is being taken away from the earth. On account of the transgressions of my royal people hath he been led unto death.

9. And I (God) will give the wicked as the price of his burial and the rich as the price of his death. Because he did not commit transgression nor practice deceit with his mouth.

10. And the Lord purposeth to have him purified in affliction. If ye for sin shall have given (or another text, O our soul, he will see, etc.), your soul (the individual organic natural life) will see a long-lived seed; and the Lord purposeth to take him away from the toil of his life (our natural life).

11. To show him light and mould him in understanding, to justify a just one who serveth as a bond-servant many well, and he will carry up (or bear) their sins.

12. Therefore will he inherit many and divide spoils with the strong, as the price of whom his natural life (our soul) hath been given up unto death; and he hath been accounted among the transgressors, and hath carried up (or borne, the same word as Hebrews ix. 28) the sins of many, and because of their transgressions hath he been given up.

ROMANS V.

1. Having been justified therefore on account of faith, we have peace in relation to God through our Lord Jesus Christ,

2. Through whom also we have had our introduction in that faith into this grace (favor) in which we stand, and boast in hope of the glory of God.

3. And not only this, but we also boast in our tribulations, knowing that our tribulation worketh out patient endurance;

4. And our patient endurance approved worth, and our approved value hope.

5. And our hope doth not bring shame because the love of God is being poured out in our hearts through holy spirit that hath been given us.

6. For this we were yet weak at an appointed time Christ was condemned to die for irreverent ones.

7. Now scarcely for a just one (God meant) will anyone submit himself to death penalty; for the good one (God again) though perchance some one may venture to accept the death penalty.

8. But God joins along with his own love towards us (the fact) that while we were yet sinners Christ was condemned to die for us.

9. How much more then, since we have been justified in his blood shall we have been saved through him from the wrath.

10. For if when enemies we were changed back (reconciled in this sense not a reciprocal change, we being the ones changed. God the same today, yesterday and forever) through the death of his Son, how much more having been changed back (legal restoration to favor is meant of course), shall we have been saved in his life.

11. And not only this, but we also are boasting in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have obtained the restoration.

12. Therefore as through one man sin (of error) entered into the cosmos, and through that sin death, even in this way death came by heredity unto all men, on account of which (law of heredity) they all had sinned.

13. For until law sin was in the cosmos. But sin is not accounted where there is no law.

14. Moreover death reigned as king from Adam until Moses, even over those who had not sinned in the likeness of Adam's evasion, who is a type of the one destined to be.

15. Moreover not as the stumbling step, so also the gracious offer. For if by the stumbling step of the one the majority (or the many) were condemned to die, how much more hath the grace of God and the beneficence in the grace of the one man Jesus Christ abounded unto the majority (or the many).

16. And not as through one person who sinned is the gift. For the verdict was from one (evasion) unto condemnation, but the gracious offer is from many evasions unto justification.

17. For if by the stumbling step of one, death reigned as king through that one, how much more will those who obtain the abundance of the grace and the beneficence of that righteous reign as kings through that one Jesus Christ.

18. Surely then as through one stumbling step it was unto all men unto condemnation, so also is it through one act of justification, unto all men a way of justification unto life.

19. For even as through the disobedience of the one man the majority (the many) were constituted (legal term) sinners, so also through the obedience of the one the majority will have been constituted just.

20. And the law entered in alongside that the error (stumbling step) might abound. But where the sin hath abounded, the grace hath much more abounded.

21. That even as sin hath reigned as king in the death, so also the grace might reign as king through righteousness unto life eternal through Jesus Christ our Lord.

A PLEA FOR UNITY.

Why is this not as good a time as any to propose measures for more united purpose and action? Particularly do I speak of those who acknowledge the Lord Jesus as the great life-giver, and are living in hope and firm assurance of his glorious personal second coming. It must be admitted that amongst the little bodies of believers scattered over the land, there is a great lack of harmony, both in themselves and with each other. There is surely some remedy for this, although it would be absolute folly to expect anything approaching submission to any system resembling popish authority, among a people who have long enjoyed freedom of thought and investigation. Still there is an authority to whom we all can or should submit—the Lord Christ.

The application of his injunction for unity, with a powerful determined purpose and wise counsel would bring about a vastly improved condition of affairs among his professed followers. A few words upon what I conceive to be the main causes of discord.

1. The placing of tests upon fellowship which nowhere have the authority of Christ or his apostles.

2. The personal ambition of men who delight in drawing followers after them; and

3. The too frequent lack of charity and proper consideration for each other.

If these three impeachments are reflected upon, doubtless it will be conceded that nearly if not quite all our division and inharmoniousness have resulted therefrom. For the first of these charges, is it not too true that some have championed certain views—be they true or false—and refused to hold fellowship with others simply because they cannot see eye to eye with them? Never let us ignore any revelation which our God has been pleased to grant us, but put all in their proper places, and make nothing a test of faith except what has been plainly marked out as such by the word of God.

As for the second charge, if some were more anxious about holding up Christ and asking men to follow him, and less concerned whether they themselves and their views were duly honored or not, they would bring more credit on their Christianity than in making sects and parties. Sink all personal pride and ambition, but hold up for the admiration of men and brethren the meekness, the love, the power of Jesus.

And now for the third charge. Why will professed followers of the meek and lowly One permit themselves to be carried away by strife and hate? These are not fruits of the Spirit, but the promptings of poor, sinful flesh. Can a true Christian hate his brother? Nay, is he permitted to hate even his enemy? The Lord's commandment to love one another and to do good and pray for our enemies, is sufficient answer.

Let us heed what the Apostle Paul has left as our guide in the matter under consideration: "Now I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions (margin, schisms) among you; but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment." 1 Cor. i. 10. And again the language of Jude. 3: "Earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints." These two passages are favorite ones with many who create divisions. They say, "We must separate ourselves from all who have not submitted to the faith. How can you expect us to fellowship with error?" Don't fellowship with error; but if possible live at peace with him who labors under error. Reject the error but love the individual. Jude said "contend earnestly for the faith"—but he did not advise us to fight each other. "But," the schismatic says, "to contend for the faith we must first ourselves have the faith, and then unite ourselves with those who likewise have the faith, for Paul declares we should all speak the same thing, and be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment; and because these other folks do not speak what we speak, nor think what we think, nor judge as we judge; therefore to obey the apostolic injunction we have put them out of our church." Did the apostle ever suppose that men, even though Christians, would all think and act alike? Never! Read the following verses, and we discover he was rebuking Christians in the church for being followers of men, calling themselves after their names—"I am of Paul," "I am of Apollos," "I am of Cephas" (Peter), while others said "I am of Christ." I, I understand anything aright, it is that we should never own that "we are of Christ and Christ only." Then would we see display on the parts of the enemies of the cross. When we cease to be mere followers of men and their doctrines, even if their views be correct, just so soon will union be feasible. If Brother So-and-so has the correct understanding of this or that doctrine, don't follow him, but follow Christ. Give the Lord the glory. The doctrine is not Brother So-and-so's, but Christ's. If it was wrong to follow such holy men as Paul, Peter, and Apollos, who were gifted by the Holy Spirit with power, having authority as apostles of Christ, how much more wrong it must be to follow men in our day who are just like ourselves, and with no more authority. But such we know to our bitter sorrow is the case. I know not of a single division but what is the result of a stubborn determination on the part of one or more to compel others to a like understanding with themselves. Oftentimes it may be that the views of these brethren are the true ones, and when such is the case it would be well if all could agree with them in understanding. But the very nature of the case shows us this cannot be. Now we all see through a glass darkly. Now we know but in part. Some see clearer than others, some know more than others. Yet we should all speak the same thing, "We are of Christ," and be of one mind to follow him, and of one judgment "to love one another." "Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate; be not wise in your own conceits." Rom. xii. 16.

But how should we act toward those who cannot see eye to eye with us? Turn them away? "Him that is weak in the faith receive ye, but not to doubtful disputations." Rom. xiv. 1. Nourish and cherish him as you would your sick child at home. With the same affection feed him with "the Bread of Life," as we would supply the wants of the invalid. If we want men to grasp truths of Scripture, and find they are not as apt as we could desire, don't get impatient and call them "Gentiles, children of the devil," etc. Jesus may have done so, but then he could read the heart—we can not.

When we find those who need light, treat them "with all lowliness and meekness, with long suffering, forbearing one another in love." Eph. iv. 2. That we "speaking the truth in love may grow up in him in all things who is the head, Christ." Eph. iv. 15. We are all learners. None have mastered the whole truth, none have yet attained to a full understanding of the faith. Those whom we deem destitute in one particular, are often our superiors in another phase of Christian experience. The one needs the other. They can learn from us, and we from them. There is but "one faith," and we "should build one another up in the faith;" Jude 20; ever keeping our eyes upon "Jesus, the author and finisher of faith," and long for that time to arrive "when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away." 1 Cor. xiii. 10.

Let us esteem that for the present our brethren are like ourselves, in the school of Christ, under such teachers and experiences as our Master has granted, "till we all come in the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ," Eph. iv. 13.

Brethren in Christ, will we give heed? Or will we be at variance one with another? Oh! let us be Christians, not merely in name, but in deed and in truth. Let us hear from you on this subject.

JOHN DONALDSON.

"THERE'S A WIDENESS IN GOD'S MERCY LIKE THE WIDENESS OF THE SEA."

What a great relief it is to know the truth of God concerning our race! What a burden is lifted from the philanthropic soul when we consider the wideness of God's mercy, especially from those of us who have been brought up to consider the great Despot of the universe in a very unfavorable light, as full of wrath and indignation, and only propitiated by penitential tears, and pleading, and sacrifice, and blood! What a fearful misrepresentation of our Father in heaven! How we ought to stand up for his name, condemn such calumny on every occasion, and show forth the love and mercy he has manifested to us through his Son—to us, but not to us only, surely not!

Oh, how narrow is the human mind, how limited the range of human benevolence, how prone we are to limit the circle of God's mercy to the all-important us, us and ourselves! We always did do it—I expect we always will do it until the knowledge of the Lord covers the earth as the waters cover the great deep. Abraham was a noble and notable exception to this general rule. He was not happy to see even wicked Sodom turned down to hell, but his convicted offspring inherited little of none of their father's tender and noble nature. They (the Jews) wanted to retain the love of God only to their own dear selves, and take out, as it were, royal letters patent so as to retain the monopoly to them and to their heirs forever. It took a good deal of persuasion to convince even the apostles of Christ that God was the "God of the whole earth." They evidently imagined that what was not Jewish was nothing in the Divine estimation, and he either to be pooh-poohed or frowned down as appertaining to the world, the flesh and the devil. But it did come at last, as truth always will come in the long run, and when it came it was clear and bright, and filled the wondering Peter with astonishment, as he exclaimed; "Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation he that feareth him and worketh righteousness is accepted of him." How very few people seem to grip this idea! and yet it is palpably true, and if there is any truth plainly established by Bible testimony it is this one.

There are many in our day, who, like the Judaizers of old, would fain gospelize everything in the Bible to the absolute destruction of the spirit of the Book. With such, a man must walk up to a certain standard of gospel light and truth (each individual setting the standard according to his own judgment, of course), and when that standard is attained, that mark reached, and all else adjusted by the square and level, then the man is pronounced "saivable" with all due ecclesiastical decorum.

This error has evidently been derived from Rome, who, in her zeal to forward the cause of "the church," which she supposed was the only hope of escape from divine wrath (for she knew not of the divine mercy), undertook to benefit our unfortunate race by bringing them within the holy pale by "hook or by crook," and if they would not come in, pull them in, and push them in, but in they must be got at all hazards. Protestantism is certainly an improvement upon the system of praying souls out of hell, but it is doubtful if much of the spirit of Peter's exclamation of surprise has dawned upon her beclouded mind. Recently, however, the dawn of intelligence seems to be breaking in on some Christian hearts that are opening like rose-buds to drink in the sunshine of God's eternal love.

The object of the gospel is not to save the world—that is reserved for the Messiah in his personal coming and reign—but it is preached primarily to take out a "people for the name" of God and his Christ. As a secondary measure it stands as a witness, and separates, where it reaches, between those that accept it and those that reject it; who belong to the oneolars and who belong to the other, however, I have long ago given up trying to pass an opinion on, but I think it safe to say that its presence and its power testifies to God who are for and against him in a more special manner than is indicated by his natural laws spoken of in Rom. i. 19, 20.

We might say in the words of Jesus—"If it had not come, they had had no sin, but now their sin remaineth;" and I have yet to come in my reading of the Scriptures to the first intimation of a second probation. "He that rejecteth him and his words is rejected." That is an established maxim of God's Christ; and "he that disbelieveth is condemned."

But who disbelieves the gospel? Who rejects Jesus of Nazareth? Now don't pass an opinion on that question hitherto. Think over it for six months or so; and moreover, dear brother, apply it, for instance, to those who are very dear to you, whom you loved because of their virtue and their high principles, and notice how your judgment mollifies and soothes towards them. Remember your father, maybe, who, long, long years ago, used to read the Bible with you on his knee, or your old mother who taught you to lisp your early prayer, but who died before the bright light of truth dawned on you and those around you. Think of that sister, perhaps, who died with the comfort of some of the sweet promises of life, and trusting in Jesus, but whose ideas were as mixed as yours were then. Oh, yes! you have an excuse for them! Well, now, remember that other people have sisters, as well as yourself, and fathers and mothers, and sons and daughters, and God is the God of all of us; and as he can best take in the whole situation, don't you think we had best compromise on him, so to speak? I am satisfied to leave it there, even at the risk of being considered "not very intelligent."

But I have only spoken of those who have been brought within the sphere of gospel light in its greater or less manifestation, and we all know that such have ever been a very small proportion of earth's myriads.

Does not God judge the rest? "It is appointed unto all men once to die, and after death the judgment." What criterion of judgment will be used for them—what standard of measurement? Certainly not the gospel, as that would not be just, at least as far as the letter of it is concerned, as they never heard of it; therefore "God will bring every work into judgment, and every secret thing whether it be good or whether it be evil." Thus we see that second probation is unnecessary to the living God, because he knows the righteous from the wicked, and can distinguish between him that serveth him, and him that serveth him not.

Though Abraham was chosen alone in his day, in order to establish the word and promise of God, yet he was not the only God-fearing man of his day, Lot and Melchisedec being in his time. During the time of Israel as a nation we read of Gentiles who had no law but the law of their own consciences and yet showed the works of the law written in their hearts, and Paul testifies clearly that they will be justified in the day when God judges the secrets of men, and that "glory, honor and peace will be to every man that worketh good, to the Jew first and after to the Gentile."

The contemplation of these things fills the soul with pleasure even to rapture. Ought we not to publish the great truth of God's love that passeth all understanding? Is it true that the people reject the doctrine? That they turn a deaf ear to the truth? That they delight in error? That good, honorable citizens are only decent for the sake of respectability, and what they can make in dollars and cents, and that they go to church on Sunday merely to exhibit their raiment? Granted that there are numberless instances of such people, yet he must be either a bigot or a bitter cynic whose judgment sweeps all into this category; and I am free to add that my experience has been that wholesale pronouncers of others in error, were the hardest to enlighten, and took the longest time to gather what little light they do possess, and therefore because their fellows will not listen to dogmatic assertion and sometimes worse, then they withdraw, Jonah-like, within their own little faded gourd, and piously wait for the only one thing they suppose is in order now, namely, fire out of heaven to consume their sin-cursed Ninevehs and prove them right. For my part I have not found that the Bible-reading community reject the truth when it is presented to them in the spirit of Christ; no, not even at the rough-and-tumble way that I try to do it, for which I have sometimes been so gravely reproved. In fact I have found that even the community that does not read the Bible are attracted in a wistful sort of way to the truths we teach; and speak of them and even argue for them in our absence without "letting on" to us. Of course they do not accept all the truth at once. I did not, neither do I know of any one who did, but it grew, and it grows. What a glorious privilege to hold the seed, and scatter it, and cultivate it sometimes, and look upon the ripening. God grant that we may be in at the harvesting.

J. F. GILLETTY.

The Directors of Girard College, Philadelphia, are puzzled over an ancient sarcophagus which the Board of City Trusts, while examining the foundations of the main building recently, discovered in a damp, dark passageway. It is of granite, seven feet long, three feet wide and three feet high, seems to have been made in Egypt at some remote period and is in excellent preservation, except that a long crack mars the lid. None of the members of the board could remember having ever seen it before, until finally an old gentleman dimly recalled an impression that it was the tomb of an Egyptian monarch and had been presented to the college as a receptal for the remains of Stephen Girard. An inquiry has been instituted, and if the sarcophagus is proved to have any historical interest it will hereafter occupy a more conspicuous position.

Plymouth, Indiana, Dec. 19, 1883.

☞ Examine the label on your paper and see if your subscription has expired. Do not wait till it is past due, but attend to it AT ONCE. RENEW TO-DAY.

As a token of friendship, as a Christmas present, as a New Year's gift, as a missionary to some one in home or in foreign lands, send THE RESTITUTION prepaid for 1884. It is the course we shall take for ourself.

We have a large number of communications on hand at the present time, and our worthy contributors must be patient and not feel disappointed nor aggrieved if some articles do not immediately appear.

PART I. of the article sent us by Mr. E. White, entitled, "Everlasting Life; What is it? And how may' men gain it?" may be found in our columns this week. We commend the careful perusal of this part and of those to follow to our readers. It is, as we noticed last week, from the pen of a missionary in India, Mr. W. A. Hobbs.

We have a letter from Mrs. Davis, dated Nov. 13, 1883, at Jerusalem, written for our Youth's Column, which we propose to give next week. She says in a postscript to the editor, "We have had a great rain, and it is now very warm like June, and my neighbors are planting their gardens, the farmers are sowing their grain, and it looks quite like spring." Will give the letter entire next week.

THE condition of the poor in London is perfectly dreadful as we learn from a pamphlet sent by Brother H. Hayes. Some in our own country are in great need. We have a very plaintive letter from Sister Matilda A. Lovewell, Pleasanton, Kan. She is a widow in poor health with dependent and destitute children as she writes us. More on this subject anon.

ARKANSAS LETTER.

Well, weary ones in all the world; in woods and fields, and lonely places, weary with work and worn with anxieties, and heavy with disappointments! We are coming to a wonderful time! There are omens in earth and heaven, and even though any of the worldly-wise should esteem it childish, yet in omens there is hope. Our Lord foresaw and foretold omens, and bade us lift up our heads and be glad. Now as the year 1883 wanes like a moon to a poor little speck and shred, let us think what a year of catastrophe and warning.

Ah, me! how we ought to be thankful for such a hope as the coming of our high and divine Master—our most lovely and noble friend! And I may just say that before all on earth—by his goodness—I prefer him. He is such a man, such a character; he has such a history and such a heart; he has such greatness and gentle majesty, such depth and such truth, such wonderfulness in all things. There is something of power to interest, to attract; seriousness, nobleness, great and sweet congeniality, so that in him must be the chief and peerless companionship. In him is the cure for all our maladies. In him is rest for our troubled and rent and burdened minds.

And why should we not think of that light of his appearing—that dawn in the sky, that daybreak of morning, which is the grandest magic of anticipation? Ah! have we no right to hope for that glory out of heaven? Do not the sunsets of fire, and the mornings of exquisite ruddiness that have startled so many hundred thousand people by their peculiar glory, say something of the Lord who is to come from a world of unutterable brightness? What lesson do these signs in heaven teach? Shall we merely join in the current chat of curious speculation? Or, shall we be joyfully quickened to look for one certain, promised Friend?

Shall we hear the earth tremble with earthquakes, and see the sea leaping and raging with dreadful fury—and think there is no meaning in the frenzy of nature? Shall all the catastrophe of eleven woful months have no lesson for reasoning men? Shall it be all passed by and canceled as a mere fortuity? Shall we be of those who blindly plod on, ignoring the time; the turmoil, and the rack of nature; the revels of storm, the mad antics of elements, the very phenomena pointed out by our Prophet—shall we be of these? How can so many live unmoved, unaffected, untaught, unbelieving and unlooking—when if signs and seasons, portents and omens, have any indication and interpretation, we may at least think we have ground of hope for a King to come, traversing the overhead interspace, and introducing in himself by the will of God, a power equal to the world's need, and chief and first of all the need of waiting saints.

I often wake at night and think. Burdens of care have never ceased to be felt, and still I feel weak and unprofitable. And I think of death as in itself no luxury—though rest were a luxury. There is no dream any more in my mind of an upward bound, by the elasticity of entity that flies free at death. Nay, death is every whit an end of life, as it is a cessation of organic function and action. And who really does want to die? Rather who does not want to see and feel the power and joy of a coming Christ, who who shall take us, and with a word do what he will—with a word do wonders, with his zeal, his goodness, his omnipotence, change all, help all, save all his love-elected and trial-tried friends? I say I lie awake and think. And all refuge fails me, every resource retires, every expedient is paltry, and every vision is empty but one. The coming of the veteran, the able one, the wonderful one—that is something to look out for, and long for. Here is a force of inspiration, an incentive to hope, a refuge and a rest. Here is comfort, and here I drive my pilgrim tent-stake. Here and now I say I find my true morning-star. This is compass needle, clock-tick, and heart-beat of hope and life, and yet I come short.

The days roll on. What a world of passions and purposes, strifes and struggles! Here comes the great daily newspaper with its columns and columns of rumors and reports, its bulletins and telegrams, its paragraphs, letters, editorials, and wonderful bulk of talk about all matters on earth but barely one—and that is the very foremost thing of all. This great compendium, this great, light, tale-telling miracle in type, this nineteenth century summary, this thing that talks in a whisper and travels with wings, with all its narratives and compositions, its reasoning and philosophy, its reports of mysteries and miseries, of the whole whirl of life on earth—has no word, no treatise, no premonition, no sign, sight, signal, sound or hint of the greatest and best of all, the kingdom and coming, the power and glory, the mission and miracle of our blessed and mighty Head, Messiah, second Adam, and Lord of earth, first, highest and best. Not a word. And so of all the newspaper world, with here and there a voice brave enough to be not counted in this Babylon, and so made an exception.

Well we may be anticipative. As we have seen, yet more we may expect to see of the gracious gifts of God to signify to us the nearness and appearing of that Man Beloved. Not that we desire calamities. Not that we wish one more hour of suffering. Not that we would willingly surrender one more victim to the incensed and insatiate sea, or to agonies of fire, or to force that, in nature, or strange inventions of man, rends and pulverizes creatures that breathe, or buries them in abysses. But yet such things must be for they are in the irreversible course of things. And whatever we see or hear, that speaks of a time and a Man that shall come to abolish evil, has this service and signification, to-wit: the evil doubled or trebled will but hasten his footstep who shall destroy evil. So we look on—made alert by signs in heaven and earth, in the sun, moon and stars, by fiery dyes that redden east and west, by atmospheric frenzies, by gales and tides, and great excesses in elemental energy, and disorders that declare this to be a critical and transition time. So it is, and so let it be. If there be omen, well may omen serve to quicken faith and strengthen expectation. Our great witness monument in Egypt, immovable amid perturbance, yet speaks. It becomes a prophet, a companion, a beacon of strength for us.

What will another year, or another hundred days, bring forth? Who can tell? Who dare say what marvel may not be now impending that will startle unthinking millions more than any wonder of eighteen centuries past! We may well be sober and vigilant, with keen observation, uniting that sedateness and composure, which has its fountain and foundation in God. What a thought to think—that day shall come as a snare, as a snare on the world! The Lord grant us understanding, quiet, boldness, comfort, quickening, and readiness for whatever and all he has in store for us. What he does, and what he has, and what he is, by these things we live. Without him we are nothing. And communion with him is now quite as much as ever right and acceptable and edifying. It is an affair of every man, personal, private and vital, a secret and unceasing mind-state and mind-work, and life-work. Breath and thought are by him and with him. Nay, we may take our steps literally in him. When we do even little things, we do them by him. We kiss his name in secret. We take off the covering of our heads, even, and walk thus before him in secret, in reverence, worshiping God. We give him our hearts. We praise him for his goodness. We speak to Jesus to thank the Father for us, and that in addition to our own thanks. May God go on to do wonderfully and gloriously.

I have just noticed in a great daily these words: "Days of darkness and fiery heavens quite naturally suggest the crack of doom."

C. COLEBROOK.

To C. C.

Dear precious brother: "A fellow helper to the truth" may possibly suggest a barrier to the prolonged outline argument you announce.

1. Like causes end in like results. A second gospel age for the disobedient might fail to restore them as surely as this has; then a third would be in order on that line of argument; and then where would be the restitution? the anti-type of David's throne and kingdom at Christ's coming? or the manifold promises then due?

2. "The figure, shadow, pattern, and example of good things to come" furnish the elements and order of "the kingdom." Deut. xiii. 9. "Thou shalt surely kill him!" This is oft affirmed, and thus "the evil was put away," by killing out its cause!

3. Did any one ever sow the chaff of the harvest for a new crop of wheat? Matt. iii. 12.

4. Do "the barren and burned up branches of the vine"—John xv. 6—answer to set out and start a new vineyard? No, no—never!

5. "The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptation, and to reserve the unjust to the day of judgment to be punished, cut off, rooted out of the earth!" 2 Peter ii. 9; Prov. 5. 21, 22; Matt. xxv. 46.

Now, beloved, as every one of these points in the "rock" of revelation is permanent to all mere argument, we should adhere to God's word and trust to nothing based on assumed premises. Hence I ask what can argument as such avail except for evil?

"God's ways are equal," consistent in type with its antitype, in word and its fulfilment.

In all my 63 years of intercourse with Christian students, no one has ever seemed to succeed finally in any theoretic argument for truth on an assumed basis. No indeed! "God has magnified his word, above all his name!" Psa. cxxxviii. 2.

The believer of this age "hath life!" The unbeliever "hath not life!" John iii. 18–36; v. 24–29.

The amplitude of grace is given us. Rom. xv. 8–13; Eph. ii. 5–7; iii. 21; Rev. xx. 3–7; xxi. 1–5; Psa. lxxii. 18–20. With unabated love. Yours for truth, J. B. COOK.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A despatch from Cairo says: A detachment of the Egyptian army was annihilated on Sunday, Dec. 2. The troops, chiefly negroes and Bashi-Bazouks, were marching with most of their Remingtons packed on camels, when suddenly over 5,000 Bedouins attacked the detachment. About 600 troops managed to form a square—the blacks on three faces, the Bashi-Bazouks on the fourth. The fight lasted only about twenty minutes, the Bedouins crying, "Join us and kill the Christian dogs from Cairo." All the Bashi-Bazouks were killed. Many of the blacks threw up their hands, shouting, "Alelkum salam! Peace be to you, true Mussulmans!" and then went over to the Arabs. The moral effect of this new victory of El Mahdi's forces is spreading like wildfire, his emissaries and dervishes appearing already in Upper Egypt and Assouan—the usual halting place for Cook's Nile tourists—and preaching holy war. The whole country is in a blaze. The rank and file of the Egyptian army at a favorable moment is likely to declare for the False Prophet, who is now regarded by the entire population as the true Messiah of Islam. The sultan of Turkey offered to send an expedition to put down the revolt, but he was peremptorily informed by France that he would not be allowed to interfere.

A riotous attack on the gospel meetings in Ireland occurred Dec. 2. Major Whittle was conducting meetings in Wexford when a mob attacked the theater in which the services was being held, and attempted to burn the building. The mob took full possession of the town, broke the windows of a Protestant church, and those of nearly all the houses in the place occupied by Protestants. The dresses of ladies who attended service at the church and theater were torn off, and the gentlemen accompanying them were stoned, and several of them injured severely. The mob paraded the streets for several hours, singing, "God save Ireland!" The mob made a bonfire of all the Bibles and hymn books that could be found. One Protestant gentleman was attacked and carried down to the harbor, the intention of his assailants being to drown him; but some respectable Catholics interfered and saved him. Another Protestant was chased through the streets, and finally sought refuge at the police barracks, where he was told that the police were unable to protect him. It seems that even Americans cannot safely preach the gospel in Ireland. The shipload of food and the immense sums of money sent from America to relieve Irish distress and to save the people from starvation count for nothing as claims on the people for gratitude.

THE FALSE PROPHET.

The eyes of the Christian as well as the political world may well be fixed on Egypt. Far away from the civilized world as the contending forces in the Soudan may be, they are making history and carving out the destinies of mankind. It is not the annihilation of a few thousand, more or less, of Egyptian soldiers. Hundreds and thousands may take the places of the slain and share their fate. We just now have news that another thousand has been cut off. And there is no resisting force to hinder the descent of the invader, if he leads his motley hordes to the Nile and follows the valley to the sea.

The only power of resistance is in England, or France, or both. And neither of them is in a position to make it politically expedient to take the protectorate of Egypt and assume the burden and responsibility of a fresh war in the East. But to this complexion has it come at last. And if Egypt is delivered from impending dangers and saved from anarchy and desolation it must be by the intervention of foreign powers, who will find their justification in the rights of mankind, and the principles of common humanity. It was indeed regarded as an atrocious proposal which the czar of Russia made when he used the famous saying, "Turkey is a sick man." Then his suggestion was that Turkey being in the last stages of mortal sickness should be divided among the three great powers—England, France and Russia. The czar would come down to Constantinople; England would take possession of Syria and Palestine and open a highway to its Indian possessions, and France would hold Egypt. And it was a sublime conception. It had as much righteousness in it as there is in the title by which the Turk holds his millions of Christians under his feet in a land which he obtained only by the sword.

If the arm of Turkish despotism were broken, and freedom of religion and intercourse between the East and the West were established, the enlightenment of the world would be advanced with amazing rapidity. We do not say that it is the duty of any nation or of all nations to rise up to this work of emancipation. But if the invasion of Egypt by the False Prophet, this modern Mahomet, should make necessary the interposition of England and France to preserve their vast interests in Egypt, and that event should involve them in trouble with the Turkish Government, making it necessary for the safety of the East that the Turk should be shorn of his power, we would see in that grand result a sign in the East that foretells the coming of him whose right it is to reign. The Mahommetan power is to be overthrown. No government resting on such a basis as that, can be other than the enemy of religious freedom and progress, and in the march of truth and right, kingdoms that set themselves against the King of kings will pass away. Thus the sudden appearance of the False Prophet with a conquering army, coming down out of the desert like a tiger on his prey, may be the first great act in the drama that will soon attract the eyes of mankind, and reveal stupendous scenes in the history of human redemption from superstition, fanaticism, despotism and ignorance, establishing in their place the reign of order, knowledge and the one true religion.

We are confident that God is directing these events for the furtherance of his own kingdom, and that he will make the wrath of man to praise him. We read in his prophecies intimations of such events as seem to be looming up in the Eastern sky. And as Christian observers of the signs of the times, we would keep an eye on the False Prophet and the powers now watching him. We are wondering whereunto this thing will grow.—N. Y. Observer.

Shall commence (D. V.) a series of meetings at Dundee, Ind., on Friday night, Dec. 21st, to continue a week or longer. D. T. HALSTEAD.

Youth's Column.

Strive to do Good.

Oh, why should we strive in this earth life of ours
For aught save the good and the true?
So dealing the moments, so soon comes the night,
So many the duties to do.

Why strive to possess the rich treasures of wealth,
Or gain the world's proudest renown?
The gold gives no peace to the heart in distress,
And hid is the thorn in the crown.

Why wish for a life of contentment and ease,
When life may be rich in good deeds?
That life is completest which seeks to relieve
The burden of lives in their needs.

Then strive to do manifold works of good cheer,
And strengthen the hearts that you can:
The noblest, most God-like work we can do
Is service to our fellow-man.

Speak Pleasantly.

The habit of speaking in pleasant tones to the sensitive hearts within our care is of the utmost importance. If we would have them learn to speak gently and kindly to all, we must teach them by precept and example in their early years, while their minds are so elastic as to be led to pattern after the influence which surrounds them.

I will relate a little incident of my own experience. I was unusually busy one morning, preparing for a company dinner. My little son of four years was amusing himself with his playthings about the room. He, too, seemed hard at work, building bridges, block-houses, and churches. He was continually coming to me and asking questions, and requiring assistance. After a little time I noticed he had left his play, and was under the table, sobbing as if his heart would break.

I said, "Georgie, dear, what is the matter?"

No reply.

When I repeated the question, the answer came between broken sobs, "You didn't speak pleasant to me."

"Well," said I, "don't cry; come and tell me about it."

So he came to me; I took him upon my lap and asked him to tell me just what I had said. Years have passed since then, and I have forgotten all but the impression it made. A few pleasant words, the tears kissed away, and he was comforted and happy, and soon at play again; but I had learned a lesson never to be forgotten.

He is now grown up, and I would no more think of speaking unpleasantly or unkindly to him than I would to company who might be visiting me. On the other hand, a rude, selfish, or unkind word never passes his lips. His attentions toward me are always most respectful, kind and loving. If we would gain respect and esteem from our children we must also speak to them in a kind and courteous manner. As we teach, so they will learn.

The Tribute of a Tear.

In 1847, Gulia Grisi and Jenny Lind were singing in London, but at different places. Each star struggling to outshine the other, and those who on evening went into ecstasies over Grisi's "Norma," were the next evening enraptured with Lind's "Casta Diva."

Such was the rivalry that it was not to be expected that they would sing together in a public concert. But Queen Victoria, thinking it a shame that two singers so eminent should be separated by a petty jealousy, requested both to appear at a Court concert. Of course, they complied with the request.

The Queen cordially welcomed them, and expressed her pleasure at seeing them together for the first time. She then gave the signal for the concert to begin.

As Jenny Lind was the younger of the two, it had been arranged that she should sing first. With perfect confidence in her power she stepped forward and began; but chancing to glance at Grisi, she saw the Southron's malignant gaze fastened upon her.

The fierceness of her look almost paralyzed the singer. Her courage left her, her voice trembled, and everything before her eyes darkened. She became so faint that she nearly fell.

By the utmost exertion of her will, however, she succeeded in finishing the aria. The painful silence that followed its conclusion—a silence never noticeable where those present are embarrassed—convinced her that she had made a failure. The conviction was confirmed by the triumphant expression on Grisi's countenance.

Despite the semi-torpidity of her senses, she realized that the failure meant lost glory, the destruction of her happiness, and the mortification and grief of her parents and friends.

Suddenly something—it seemed like a voice from heaven—whispered, "Sing one of the old songs in your mother-tongue."

She caught at the idea as an inspiration which had been flashed into her mind between the termination of the vocal part of the aria and the accompanist's final chords.

She, unnoticed by the company, walked to the piano, and took the vacated seat. For a few seconds she suffered her fingers to wander over the keys in a low prelude, then she began to sing.

Her selection was a little prayer which, in the long ago, she had loved above all other songs in her childhood's repertoire. She had not thought of it for years.

As she sang, she was no longer in the presence of royalty, but in her fatherland surrounded by those who listened not to criticise.

Not one of those before her understood the words of the "prayer," but the plaintiveness of the melody and the inspired tone of the pure, sweet voice, brought the moisture to every eye. There was the silence of admiring wonder.

When, having finished the "prayer," she lifted her mild blue eyes to her rival, whose flaming orbs had so disconcerted her, she found no fierce expression on her countenance, but instead a tear diamonding the long black eyelashes.

A moment after, with the impulsiveness characterizing the children of the tropics, Grisi rushed to Jenny Lind's side, placed her arms around the girl's neck and kissed her, regardless of the lookers-on.

A Paris correspondent of the Chicago Evening Journal says: The French people do not desire war; they lament that, under the republic, as under royalty, and the empire, their government cannot keep them out of hot water. Besides the shadow of Germany that falls across France, and the possible upheavings in Algeria of Mussulman fanaticism make the French feel all these are quite sufficient without being involved with Celestials, Malagasies and Congoians. A war with China en regle, would raise difficulties with Europe and the United States that the wisest heads feel pained when reflecting thereon.

German bankers hold heavy mortgages on the customs receipts of the Chinese open ports. France has no depots of provisions or coals for her ships in the far East; her commerce may be swept away if China issues lettres de marque, and a large expedition of soldiers must disturb the home military organization, planned, not for either little or great foreign wars. People talk familiarly of a general war next spring as the only real solution for the times now so much out of joint. The aurora borealis that has "streamed like a meteor in the troubled air," the last few evenings, is evidence "strong as proofs of holy writ" for many easy-going souls. More serious is the fact that business people are resorting to reefs and taking in sail, as if the storm signals had given the sublime warning.

The Mahdi's advance in Egypt does not please the French, as it implies henceforth the indefinite occupation of Egypt by the English. The former certainly would find a pretext for a flight into Egypt after the departure of the last Highlander, and would willingly give up Tonquin, Madagascar, and the Congo, for liberty to squat on the Nile.

Recently we sent out in our paper printed slips, to be used in sending renewals to us. On these slips was a space to write Name, Post Office and State. Many persons in writing leave off some part of their address, and the object of these slips was to get full address by giving a space for each part. Some receive slips whose subscriptions do not expire for months, and have looked upon them as notices that their time was out, but they are only intended to be a convenience to our patrons.

Several complaints have been made of late of money sent and lost. We will now say that we cannot be responsible for money sent loose in letters. Send by Bank Draft, Post Office Order or Registered Letter, and it may be at our risk; otherwise the sender takes his own risk. Please do not send Bank Checks, as we often have trouble in collecting them. Parties who are obliged to send postage stamps will please buy the one or two cent denominations.

Sententious.

When prayer delights thee least, then learn to say,
Soul, now is greatest need that thou should'st pray.

The man who lives in vain, lives worse than in vain. He who lives to no purpose, lives to a bad purpose.—Nevins.

It is a well-known psychological fact that the conscience of children is formed by the influences that surround them; and that their notions of good and evil are the result of the moral atmosphere they breathe.

As it is not the money that we make but the money that we keep which makes us rich, so it is not the souls that are gathered into the church, but the souls that continue in the grace of God that count in the kingdom.—H. L. Wayland, D. D.

When God has a great work for any one to do in the world, he usually gives him a peculiar training for it; and that training is just what no earthly friend would choose for him; and sometimes it is no long continued that there seems to be but little time left for work.

"Wherefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord." 1 Cor. xv. 58.

"Though scoffers ask, 'What is your gain?'
And mocking, say your work is vain,
These scoffers die and are forgot.
Work done for God, it dieth not."

When all the scoffings which surround the Bible are taken away, by which men have tried to prop themselves up, the world will begin to recognize its real glory. Kingdoms fall, institutions perish, civilizations change, human doctrines disappear; but the imperishable truths which pervade and sanctify the Bible, shall bear it up above the flood of change and the deluge of years.

"The day of the Lord, it cometh!
It comes as a thief in the night!
It comes when the world is dreaming,
Of safety, and peace, and light.
It cometh, the day of sackcloth,
Of darkness and storm and fire;
The day of the great avenging,
The day of the burning fire."

A buried village has been found by the Hon. Amado Chaves a mile from his home, near Socorro, New Mexico. He writes to the Santa Fe Review: "It is built of stone. The outer walls are three feet wide, and the city is large enough to have accommodated 8,000 souls. I have already cleared four rooms in the upper story and two on the first floor of one house. The dimension of the first-floor room just finished are 11x12 feet, while from floor to ceiling the distance is about fifteen feet. The village is almost square, and this building is situated at the northwest corner. The large room has a large door leading to the outside of the wall; but no windows whatever. In this room I found the skeleton of a girl. The hair is in a perfect state of preservation; it is fine, and of a chestnut color. I also found there a string of fine coral beads, one of torquoise beads, another of long ivory beads, and a ring set with a black stone, on top of which is a piece of torquoise. All the timbers of the roof are burned to a char. I have arrived at the door which appears to lead to inner rooms, and I am full of curiosity to open it, but the second floor is only supported by the stones and debris about, and should I attempt to remove these the upper story will tumble in and fill up the lower rooms, just cleaned out, with a mass of stone, charred timbers, and debris."

Some of the brightest illustrations of Christian heroism are to be found among those who have but recently come out of the darkness of heathenism. When certain converts at Ralietea offered to enter the newly-opened mission field in New Guinea, their friends endeavored to dissuade them saying, There are serpents there; there are wild beasts there, and there is pestilence there. Are there men there? was their answer. If there are men there we will go.

EVERLASTING LIFE; WHAT IS IT? AND HOW MAY MEN GAIN IT?

PART I.

During our Lord's ministry he often alluded to the condition and prospects of men after death; and the statements he made concerning them are joy-giving or fear-inspiring, according to the class of persons—saved or unsaved—of whom he spoke. In studying his utterances which relate to the future of the godly class of mankind, one is surprised to find how very generally—so generally that I might almost say uniformly—he speaks of the God-fearing man's inheritance in the world to come in just one and the same term or phrase. Christian people of the present day are in the habit of referring to their portion in the world to come as the heavenly Canaan; the inheritance in glory; being present with the Lord; the home in heaven; the inheritance of the saints in light; entering into rest; going to their reward, etc. I am not aware that any valid objection can exist to the use of such expressions,—for the apostles employed some of them,—still it is very noteworthy that the Lord Jesus himself never used them, but almost invariably referred to the future portion of godly men as inheriting "Life;" which Life more often than not he called the "Everlasting Life;" and restricted it to that portion of the human race who received him as the God-sent Savior, and honored him by a faithful life-service. On just two or three occasions he referred to the believer's reward as occupying a "prepared place in his Father's house," and "being with him where he should be;" but with these exceptions, the words in which Jesus Christ always referred to the gain of saints as the outcome of their faith in him, were "Life," or "Everlasting Life." In the gospel of St. John alone, our Lord no less than 37 times thus uses these terms,—20 times out of the 37 calling the saint's inheritance "Everlasting Life," and 17 times either "Life," or by some phrase that refers to something in intimate connection with "Life," such as "The Resurrection of Life;" "The Bread of Life;" or "The Light of Life."

The following texts may be regarded as representative ones in setting forth the holy Savior's utterances touching the "Life," and "Everlasting Life," etc., above referred to:—

"Ye will not come unto me that ye might have Life." John v. 40.

"I am come that they might have Life, and that they might have it abundantly." John x. 10.

"Labor not for the food which perisheth, but for the food which endureth unto the Everlasting Life, which the Son of man will give unto you." John vi. 27.

"He that believeth on the Son hath the Everlasting Life, and he that believeth not the Son shall not see the Life." John iii. 36.

"They that are accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead, are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection; neither can they die any more." Luke xx. 35.

"I am the bread of life; if any man eat of this bread he shall live for ever." John vi. 50, 51.

"He that followeth after me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." John viii. 12.

Seeing how uniformly the Lord Jesus, when referring to the inheritance of believers in him, described it by the words "Life" and "Everlasting Life," it is evident that he must have done it designedly; and the only design which I can conceive he had was, that these words set forth in precise terms the very blessing which by his sufferings and death he has procured for all who will make him their refuge.

This being so, if in the history of the world there was one occasion on which language must have been used in its simplest sense to denote truth and fact, it was in the language of the Son of God concerning the object and issues of Redemption. If Christ words are here figurative, where shall we look for plain language?

Although it does not follow that the apostles of our Lord, when referring to the great outcome of his life and death-work, would feel themselves shut up to the use of almost the only term which their Master was in the habit of using, it does follow that neither they, nor any of his followers in later ages should, by preference, use any other form of speech than that which he selected as the best for setting forth his meaning with exactness. And especially does it behove all who call Christ their Lord, to beware of attaching to the words "Life," and "Everlasting Life," any other meaning than the primary and natural meaning which belong to them, unless they are fully convinced, by the irresistable force of other considerations, that our Lord intended them to be understood by his church in a non-natural or figurative sense. To depart from this principle of interpretation is to make Christ's word's as riddles to weary souls. It leads, moreover, to endless systems of private interpretation, some of them running wilder and wilder, until we see the results of figurative interpretation as they appear in the teachings of Origen and Swedenborg.

It is most satisfying therefore to find, on reading the apostolic letters to the churches, that the various writers when speaking of the nature of the blessing purchased for believers through the death of the Redeemer, cling with considerable tenacity to the very phraseology which was ordinarily used by their Lord,—"Life," and "Everlasting Life."

A careful investigation of the book of the Acts of the Apostles, and the various epistles,—with the view of ascertaining the frequency with which the terms "Life," and "Everlasting Life" are used to set forth the effect of faith in Christ, shows the following result;—one or other of these words, in the exact sense in which our Lord appears to have used them, occur no less than fifty-five times.

| | |
|---|---|
| St. Luke in the Book of the Acts of the apostles, uses them .... | 6 |
| St. Paul, in his various Epistles . | 23 |
| St. Peter, in his two Epistles.... | 3 |
| St. James, ..... | 1 |
| St. John, in his First Epistle.... | 15 |
| St. Jude, ..... | 2 |
| Whole number of times used.... | 55 |

We see therefore that these very specific words "Life," and "Everlasting Life" were those which both our Lord and his apostles chiefly used when setting forth the ultimate gain of faith in the Redeemer.

Let us now advance to a consideration of the meaning to be attached to the words "Everlasting Life." I fail to see why there should be any more difficulty in determining the meaning of these two words than in determining the meaning of unspeakable joy, unalterable affection, inconceivable glory, or any other two words consisting of a noun and a qualifying adjective. But that a difficulty is felt by many in understanding those words in their natural sense is obvious, for they not only read them as though they stood in the text Everlasting Happiness instead of Everlasting Life, but they look surprised, and are almost ready to question a man's orthodoxy if he should contend that as the word Life means life and not happiness only, Everlasting Life, whatever else it signifies, must always carry the radical idea of endless existence as the basis of the happiness; so that its contrary is death, and destruction of body and soul in hell. The reason of this indisposition to let the words mean what they say is probably this, Think they, "The opposite of life is death." If we allow that when Jesus Christ and his apostles spoke of the gift of Everlasting Life, they mean the gift of immortality, that will be equivalent to affirming that man, as a race, is not an immortal race, immortality being a favor, bestowed upon some of the race only. If we were to admit this, we should be compelled to take all such words in the Bible as death, perishing, corruption, destruction, burning up, etc., in a literal sense. But to take these words according to their ordinary meaning would exceedingly disarrange our theology; for away would go not only our cherished notion of immortal man, but also the doctrine of everlasting suffering in hell; for if a man is not naturally immortal, it is evident that he cannot be punished for ever. Rather than admit all this, and be prepared to modify our belief accordingly, it is easier to believe that notwithstanding our Lord spoke so much in his discourses about life, what he really meant must have been not life in its ordinary acceptation, but happiness only; man not requiring the gift of everlasting life in its literal sense, he being already immortal."

Now if Jesus Christ had anywhere told us that when he spoke of "Life" he used the words in a figurative sense, we must of course understand them in a figurative sense, and seek for a word whose meaning expresses one or more of the leading ideas we associate with life; but if he has given no intimation that he used the word in any other than its ordinary meaning (as in the phrase, "O King, live for ever," and "Him that liveth for ever and ever") there is no reason, lying upon the surface, why we should not allow the words to bear their natural and ordinary meaning.

In seeking to ascertain the meaning of the word life, the question is not what life is, or is supposed to be, according to philosophic notions or scientific theories; but what common men regard life to be as falling within the range of their thoughts, impressions and experience. The Bible, except very occasionally or when speaking prophetically, uses words according to the sense in which they are popularly understood. This being so, whatever meaning would be given to the word life, if met with in a book of profane history, must also be given to it when we meet with it in sacred history, unless some good reason can be shown to the contrary.

The idea of life, as men apply that idea to their own nature, has for its basis the notion of Conscious Existence, produced and sustained in some unexplainable way by the presence of the spirit in the body and its action upon our corporeal organization. Occasionally, the idea of the blessedness of the God-given life becomes very prominent, but even then it always rests upon the foundation idea of the happy man being alive, as the absolute condition of his being able to be happy. Life is to happiness what water is to a swimmer; without it he could not possibly swim. A house is a house, and nothing but a house, though it may not have an article of furniture in it; and "Life" is simply being alive, without injecting into the meaning of the word life the idea of happiness at all. But since life without enjoyment is a pleasureless condition of existence, the special thing which makes life enjoyable, (happiness) is sometimes spoken of synecdochically—that is, an exaggerated form of speech in which a part is put for the whole—as being the life itself. For instance, we say "Wealth is influence," and "Knowledge is power." But we do not mean by these assertions that wealth and influence, or knowledge and power, are interchangeable terms; for some wealthy persons have very little influence, whilst others are powerful without the possession of much knowledge. All that is meant by this form of speech is that wealth usually carries influence, and that knowledge is ordinarily accompanied by power; and this fact being recognized, certain words are allowed, for the sake of point and conciseness of expression, to be used in a loose and non-natural sense. It is just so with the word life, and its satellite idea of happiness. Happiness is more or less associated in our mental ideas with the possession of life; the consequence is, that the word life has had pressed into it an idea which,—though it forms no part of its real meaning, is allowed to remain in connection with it; it being tacitly understood, however, that the occasional use of the word in its inferior and non-natural sense does not set aside the obligation of fixing its meaning 99 times out of 100 according to its original and current sense. Hence in the Bible, life always retains its radical idea of existence—though this existence is necessarily associated with the idea of happiness—but it never means happiness alone, apart from the idea of life. Keeping this fact in mind, if you prefix to the word "life" the word "everlasting," you get as the meaning of the united words an everlasting happy existence; in other words, a blissful immortality.—W. A. Hobbs.

THE JAVA EARTHQUAKES.

Boston, Dec. 6.—Capt. J. W. Barker of the bark Wm. H. Besse of Wareham arrived here this morning, 105 days from Manila, and tells the following story:

We sailed from Manila May 25, with a fair breeze and everything favorable for a speedy passage home, but, as they say in Cochin China, You can't tell from the sunshine in Kesho how the winds blow in Shanghai, we found that out before we reached Boston, as every sailor finds the same thing on any voyage. We were laden wholly with sugar. We sailed along through the Chinese sea—there are a great many islands there you know—until, when thirty days out, we were near the Straits of Sunda, which are between Java and Sumatra. Here we had heavy weather and in the night ran upon a rock which is not on the charts. We were damaged considerably in the hull, and had to put in at Batavia. We found it necessary to return to Manila which we did at once, and after a short delay we set sail once more for home. This explains how it came that we were near Java at the great earthquake there in the latter part of August.

We left Batavia again on Aug. 26. At sunrise the next morning, when we were distant from Besee Island about five miles, we saw a heavy bank rising from the westward. At the same time the barometer began to fall rapidly and vary in the most extraordinary manner. It fell to 29 deg. 40 min., and then suddenly bounced up to 30 deg. 40 min. This of course, meant danger, and something very unusual at that. The bank kept rising and growing more dense, and at last covered the whole sky and filled the atmosphere, and completely obscured the sun. As soon as the barometer began to make those strange variations, I ordered all hands on deck, and every sail was quickly furled. We let the port anchor go, and none too soon, for darkness shut in around us and heavy showers of sand and ashes began to fall. At the same time, the wind rose and blew steady and harder, until at noon we were in the midst of a perfect hurricane. All the elements seemed to have combined to make the strangest, most remarkable sight I ever witnessed.

You could hardly call it a sight, though, for it was darker than you can imagine. I've seen all kinds of nights and days, and have been about in what I thought was total darkness many a time, but I never knew what darkness was until the 27th of August last. It's no use trying to describe that time. The air seemed thick with blackness; the whistling wind took the breath away; the falling sand and ashes choked you, and settled into your clothing in a manner that was horribly suggestive of burial; the heat was intense and stifling and the sea, although the wind continued to blow a tempest, remained perfectly calm. The tide set strongly to the westward and we drove through the water at the rate of fourteen knots an hour. All this time we heard constantly heavy rumbling like distant thunder, but long continued; every now and then the darkness was lit up for a second by blinding flashes of lightning, and a nauseating smell of sulphur made breathing not only difficult, but disagreeable. It was enough to frighten any man. None of us had ever experienced anything like this before and the majority of the seamen said the world had come to an end. Why one of the officers—a sensible steady-going man—thought it was the day of judgment. I will remember that time. I suppose you do not know how on such an occasion the total darkness confuses a man. Now, every sailor knows his ship as you do your desk, and probably much better; every inch is familiar to him. We were turned round, and knew not where to stop. One of the seamen was on top of the house—on duty—and he stopped off from the roof and fell on the deck, striking on his head and receiving serious injuries. Well, this sort of thing continued for hours. When at last it cleared up we began to realize what had taken place. The shower of ashes kept up until we were hundred of miles away from the scene of the disturbance. On the 28th we entered the straits of Sunda and could plainly see the tremendous extent of the damage. Many an island was so changed in appearance and coastline as to be wholly unrecognizable, and we knew them only by their positions. Others must have entirely disappeared, sunk clean out of sight. The forests on Verlation and Langislands were completely obliterated, and the northwestern part of Krakatoa was gone. The sea was full of floating trees and other debris, and the surface of the water was covered with ashes. For 600 miles we seemed to be sailing through fields of lava. The decks and rigging were covered with ashes and fine sand to a depth of several inches. At times we entered extensive fields of cocoanuts, the numbers of which it is impossible to estimate. But the most remarkable and fearful thing of all was the sea of corpses. For nearly three days we came across body after body of persons who had lost their lives in the earthquake. One man alone was said to have counted sixty bodies in plain sight, and how many more there must have been within the straits, you can tell as well as I. Thousand must have perished.

It was a sight never to be forgotten.

We continued on our way, having a little tussle with the seas off Cape of Good Hope. After this the prospects seemed good again for a comfortable voyage home. The trades were favorable, but fate came down on us in a new storm. Sickness broke out among the sailors, and nearly everybody was down. On Oct. 23, in latitude 16 deg. 37 min. longitude 17 deg. 10 min. Erik Salousen died, and was buried in the waves. On Nov. 27, in latitude 35 deg. 05 min. longitude 74 deg. 28 min. just off Cape Hatteras, we fell in with a hurricane from the northeast, which piled up a very heavy sea. The storm lasted three days, but we had rough weather up to the time of our arrival in this port. In that storm the sea broke over the bark and swept everything off the deck, flooded the cabin, and tore away a part of the bulwarks. We had to throw over a considerable portion of our cargo. We were very shorthanded then, and when we got to Boston we had hardly half a dozen available seamen.

The Besse was not the only Boston vessel that saw the results of the earthquake. The Anahuac, Capt. W. H. Summers, arrived at this port from Calcutta a little in advance of the Besse. According to Capt. Summers, on Aug. 27, when the ship was lying becalmed in latitude 6 deg. 10 min. south, longitude 89 deg. 51 min east, or at a point several hundred miles from the disturbance, a loud report was heard from the eastward. Thinking that it was heavy ordnance, he ordered a man to the masthead to see if a ship was in sight. While he was aloft four more reports were heard in quick succession, which made the vessel quiver and tremble in every beam. It was then thought that it must be a heavy earthquake, and soon afterward the sun became obscured and it grew dark, although it had previously been very clear. The reports were heard at about noon. The next morning, the 28th, the decks were found to be covered with a fine white sand, and the sea filled with pumice stone. The shower continued more than two days, and was swept off the deck by shovelfuls. The Captain gathered a bottleful of it. He thought the phenomena were caused by the earth passing through a meteoric shower, and knew nothing of the earthquake until he called at St. Helena, where he was informed of some of the particulars. He met an English vessel which had been showered with sand, though her position was 600 miles away from the Anahuac at the time of the earthquake.

SELECTED MISCELLANY.

A SUGGESTIVE STATEMENT.

Two Jews, one recently converted to Christ, the other strongly opposed to and invented against his brother because of his renunciation of Judaism, were walking together in warm debate. Being much angered, the opponent of Christ said to his companion, "As for your Jesus of Nazareth, I think no more of him than of this stone that is in our path." Grieved but not disheartened, the disciple of Christ said, as he picked up the stone and held it in his hand, "And I, too, think of Jesus Christ as a stone; but to me, brother, he is the Foundation Stone laid in Zion the Elect Stone, the Tried Stone, the precious Corner Stone. But to you, my brother," he added in deep sorrow, "Jesus is a Stone of Stumbling and a Rock of Offence, that may fall in judgment upon you, even as I build upon Him in safety and mercy."

LUTHER'S VILIFIERS.

The Catholic attacks on Luther are not generally such as to inspire respect for the truth and fulness of those who make them. They are both malicious and mendacious. His character and personal purity are bitterly assailed. His writings are scrutinized for sentences which will admit of a bad construction, and then are torn from their connection and made to act as false witnesses against him. The worst reports of his personal enemies are accepted, without confirmation, as true. His wife is assailed, his father denounced as a murderer. Some of these writers display that malignant ingenuity of an Iago, and all against a man who was trained and educated in the Roman Catholic Church, and who would have been her greatest ornament if he could have reconciled his awakened conscience to tolerate her abuses and corruptions.

The vilifiers of Luther, whose life had so much that was sweet and pure and beautiful in it, deserve to have applied to them one of his pithy remarks about the scandal-mongers of his own day:

"They are exactly like hogs, who do not care for roses and violets in the garden, but only to stick their snout into the garbage."

One of the most remarkable women and quaintest characters of our time has just been removed from the world by the death, at Battle Creek, Mich., of "Sojourner Truth," the colored centenarian. As a lecturer she has been heard with rapt attention in almost every considerable town in the Republic, but the freedom she has enjoyed in intercourse with the prominent people of the last half-century, and the influence she exerted by her homely expression of opinion, founded mainly upon vigorous common sense, have made her an unique figure in the history of the nation. She was in what is usualy called middle age when she received her freedom by the act of 1817, emancipating the slaves of New York, and from that time until the proclamation of president Lincoln she was one of the most forcible advocates of abolition on the platform. Her interviews with Lincoln, into whose presence she was frequently admitted when then of note were denied, would furnish a pathetic chapter in the history of that great man, and a faithful biography of her would include something from the life of almost every leading public man of the century. Like the songs of her race, characters resembling hers are fading away, but the records of them will not cease to be an interesting feature of the history of their time.

BURNING THE SCRIPTURES IN SPAIN.

In 1876, a book was printed for the Protestant schools at Grasis, a suburb of Barcelona, with the title "A Simple Method of Teaching to Read and Reckon." Many copies were sent to London, but, through a mistake, one or two thousand were sent back to Spain. The owner claimed them at the custom house, but when, after much correspondence on the subject, an exorbitant duty was demanded, he left them where they were. They were to have been sold but the custom people said that a religious question was involved, and, therefore, they sought the advice of the Town Council. This body decided that the sale could not be authorized without a violation of the eleventh article of the Constitution (which grants the smallest amount of toleration to Protestants); consequently it appears that even arithmetic, even if it is not intended for Roman Catholics, is opposed to Roman Catholicism, the State religion. The book contains no doctrines of any particular sect. It is merely a reading book with lessons in arithmetic, and the passages for reading are the Holy Gospels, without note or comment. So, by order of the authorities, the Holy Gospels were publicly burned in Barcelona. Unfortunately, this fact will be proclaimed throughout Europe, for when the English consul presented himself at the custom house and offered to pay all costs, in order that the books might be sent back to England, he was told it was too late. The narration shows how religious toleration is understood here.—Barcelona Liberal.

Editor Restitution:

Last week was like the first of May in New York—everybody moves. It is the Turkish Mahram, and it keeps people, especially the porters, pretty busy. One thing I can say, the poor people here are ahead of New Yorkers in this—their household goods are very few, but quite enough if one is to move about every year. I find it very inconvenient to find my kettles, pans, flowers and paint pots mixed up in the most ridiculous manner, and I find myself saying, "When will that good time come when we shall sit under our own vine and fig tree."

The Arabs are the most resigned people in the world. They believe that all the good and all the evil is from Allah, and they respect Allah so much that they never murmur. I was this morning reminded of this as I sat by my window and heard the cheerful song of the peasant who was ploughing near by. He was thanking Allah for the prospect of a good crop. Last year the crops failed for want of rain. It was terrible dry and I see by the papers that it was also dry in America. Last Friday commenced the most terrific thunderstorm I ever saw. Thunder, lightning, and rain-torrents; and this lasted three days without cessation. I am told by the oldest inhabitant that such a rainfall never occurred at this time of the year. Today it is clear and warm. The anemones are in full bloom all over the ground. I picked a large bunch this afternoon. I think the color is the finest I ever saw. I am sorry to say, however, that they lose their rich tint in drying.

I hoped to send you before this a little sketch I am making for you—A street scene in Jerusalem—but owing to my long illness and other causes, it must be delayed. I have several orders for Christmas.

There are many rich Jews arriving here every week, and this fact has increased the price of lands, and also of house rents greatly, as these people will pay high prices. It is an actual fact that house rents have gone up to double what they were when I came here two years ago. If business increased at the same rate, we should soon have a very prosperous city. I must repeat what I have often said, that there is no climate in the world ahead of this. With proper houses, food and water, no one would die very young. There are very few deaths anyway. Contagious diseases, such as smallpox, measles, etc., are very light. People go about their business with smallpox at its height, and I have never yet seen a person pitted by this disease.

The article in THE RESTITUTION by Dr. Seiss was good; the people were much pleased to read it, as well as many other good things you publish.

I like my new home very much. I live outside the walls. The family I live with are Germans, and belong to the Hoffman colony. They are exceedingly thrifty and kind to strangers. I like them very much. By their industry this colony have built up a neat little village on the European plan. They have a good grist-mill and a fine school. The highest branches are taught here, and they receive pupils from abroad. The secret of their success is in unity of purpose. They help each other. There are no shirks among them. They are workers, and no one lays upon another the duty belonging to himself. I take great pleasure in watching their movements, as they are but a small part of humanity, and I see how much could be accomplished by a righteous people, where the rights of each one would be respected. May God hasten the day when love will rule the affairs of men. This will be heaven indeed.

May God bless and keep you, is my sincere prayer. A. E. DAVIS.

Explanation.

Brother Bond I condense what thoughts I write to the brethren so as to occupy as little space as possible and make myself understood, suggest leading thoughts and let others do the thinking. The kingdom of Great Britain is limited and local. It has dominions and possessions, the sun never sets on them. It is said they are not the kingdom but mere appendages. Take them all away and the kingdom remains intact. In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom. Of course it will not occupy their territory. Rule thou in the midst of thine enemies. Blessed are they that do his commandments that they may have right to the tree of life, etc. Sorcerer and such cannot enter and must die. The sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed. Open ye the gates that the righteous nation which keepeth the truth may enter in. Perhaps Peter will have the keys of the kingdom then.

CIRCULAR.

To the Students of Prophecy throughout the World:

The undersigned proposes to issue from the press, either in Chicago or in New York City, as circumstances may decide, the following works, to-wit:

I. The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. In the first division the nature of the Coming Age is fully discussed, as to its physical and moral character: 1. That the earth itself has a crowning age, in which it shall be perfectly adapted to be the residence of man in his highest type; 2. That man, in that resurrection state, will be under the endless reign of the Person(s) Messiah; 3. In establishing the proximity of that age, the prophecies of Ezekiel, Isaiah, Daniel, Zechariah, Christ, Paul, Peter, and the Apocalypse, are critically examined, relative to its rapid approach.

II. The second work will be devoted to the investigation of the various phases of the Eastern Question:—1. The Egyptian phase, 2. The British phase, 3. The Russian phase, 4. The Ottoman phase, 5. The Hebrew phase, 6. The American phase, 7. Lesser phases of the Eastern Question, 8. The location of each of the Great Powers in the coming contest, 9. All nations marshal under the banners of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. These powers are traced in history to the present time. All the great national issues are fully investigated.

If all that are interested in these great and most sublime topics will aid, they will be issued immediately. They will be printed and bound in a form that will do credit to the vastness of the subjects, and put to subscribers at prices quite reasonable. The books will contain about 600 large royal 8vo. pages each.

THE REIGN OF CHRIST.

JOHN L. WHITE.

Jesus shall reign from shore to shore,
To earth's end the wide world o'er.
All nations shall obey his word,
And ev'ry tongue confess their Lord.

The proud oppressor, 'neath whose might
The subject bows in humble plight,
Himself shall bow beneath the rod
Of the avenging Son of God.

No longer screened by unjust laws,
With none to plead their wicked cause,
The enemies of truth and right,
Shall fall before the Judge's sight.

The poor who have in sorest need
Enslaved themselves to human greed;
Will find in him a righteous friend—
A Judge who will the right defend.

Then equity, and truth, and right,
And mercy too, from Zion's height,
With law and love, to lands go forth,
To east and west, to south and north.

And at the mandate of his word
Shall warring nations sheath the sword,
And violence forever cease,
And men with man shall be at peace.

Then heathen tribes, made white, shall bring Themselves a loyal offering.
And kings of distant lands shall meet,
And pay their homage at his feet.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—Second Series. Number 38.

HAMATH AND THE NORTHERN BORDER OF ISRAEL.

"This shall be your north border. From the Great Sea ye shall point out for you Mount Hor; from Mount Hor ye shall point out unto the entrance of Hamath; and the goings forth of the border shall be to Zedad; and the border shall go on to Ziphron, and the goings out of it shall be at Hazar-enan: This shall be your north border." Num. xxxiv. 7-9.

"From Dan to Beersheba" was in olden days the popular expression for "all Palestine." "The throne of David was set over Israel from Dan even to Beersheba." 2 Sam. iii. 10. "Then king said to Joab, Go now through all the tribes of Israel, from Dan even to Beersheba, and number the people, that I may know the number of the people." xxiv. 2. The phrase has become a world's proverb; and yet I have reason to believe that it is often misunderstood by Biblical students; and I know that it formed the basis of one of the grossest blunders in Bishop Colenso's unfortunate book—that in which he compares the numbers of the Israelites with the extent of Canaan.

Dan and Beersheba were the northern and southern limits of the country allotted to the twelve tribes by Joshua and actually possessed by them. Two other landmarks are also mentioned by the sacred historian. "So Joshua took all that land...from the mount Halak that goeth up to Seir, even unto Baal-gad in the valley of Lebanon under mount Hermon." Josh. xi. 17. And again, "These are the kings which Israel smote....from Baal-Gad in the valley of Lebanon even unto mount Halak that goeth up to Seir, which Joshua gave unto the tribes of Israel for a possession." xii. 7. Mount Halak was in the parallel of Beersheba, and Baal-Gad is identical with Banias, four miles east of Dan. These then were the limits of what we may call "the land of possession." "The land of promise" was much larger. Its boundaries are defined in the words of the Lord to Abraham: "In the same day the Lord made a covenant with Abraham, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates." Gen. xv. 18. The promise was renewed to Israel in the desert: "I will set thy bounds from the Red Sea even unto the sea of the Philistines, and from the desert (of Sinai) unto the river" (Euphrates). This wide territory, extending from Egypt on the south to the banks of the Euphrates on the north, was promised upon conditions; the people were on their part to be faithful and obedient to their God. "If thou shalt indeed obey his voice, and do all that I speak, then ;...mine angel shall go before thee and bring thee," etc. Exodus xxiii. 22-31. Israel did not fulfill the conditions, and therefore the whole land was not given to them; "And the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, and he said, Because that this people hath transgressed my covenant which I commanded their fathers, and have not hearkened unto my voice, I also will not henceforth drive out from before them of the nations which Joshua left when he died," etc. Judges ii, 20-23; compare Josh. xxiii. 12-16.

These facts were unknown to Bishop Colenso; or, if known, they were unfairly overlooked, and hence the force of one of his most telling but most sophistical objections to the truth of the Divine Record.

Before the death of Moses a distinct revelation was given to him of the boundaries of the country which Israel was to occupy. It is a singular fact that these were different both from those in the Abrahamic covenant and those of "the land of possession." On the south the border line reached from Kadesh to the river of Egypt; Num. xxxiv. 4, 5; while on the north it is thus described: "This shall be your north border; from the Great Sea ye shall point out for you Mount Hor; from Mount Hor ye shall point out unto the entrance of Hamath; and the goings forth of the border shall be to Zedad; and the border shall go on to Ziphron, and the goings out of it shall be at Hazar-enan." Verses 7-9. Dan, as has been stated, was the northern limit of "the land of possession." Hamath is one hundred and twenty miles north of Dan. The ranges of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, the valley of Cœle-Syria, and the plain of Hamath, lie between them. This fact explains Josh. xiii. After the division of the country "from Dan to Beersheba" among the tribes by Joshua, a large part of the territory promised to Moses still remained, and is minutely described. The section lying on the north is as follows: "The land of the Giblites, and all Lebanon toward the sunrising (Anti-Lebanon), from Baal-gad under Mount Hermon, unto the entering into Hamath; all the inhabitants of the hill country from Lebanon unto Misrephothmaim, and all the Sidonians." Verses 5, 6.

It will thus be seen that the country given in covenant to Abraham extended from the river of Egypt to the entrance of Hamath; while the phrase "from Dan to Beersheba" only embraced the territory actually divided by Joshua among the tribes.

"A land of promise" is still in store for the ancient people of God. Ezekiel in prophetic vision gives its boundaries, which correspond at all points except the east with those of Moses. It is only with the north that I have to do at present; and Ezekiel defines it as follows: "This shall be the border of the land toward the north side, from the Great Sea, the way of Hethlon, as men go to Zedad; Hamath, Berothah, Sibraim, which is between the border of Damascus and the border of Hamath; Hazer-hatticon, which is by the coast of Hauran. And the border from the sea shall be Hazar-enan." xlvii. 15-17.

These northern marches do not lie in the usual route of travellers. Comparatively little has been written about them. Yet among them were laid the scenes of some of the most tragic events of Jewish history. In addition to holy and historic interest, therefore, a visit to the leading places may have the charm of novelty.

HAMATH.

Hamath is a quaint old city. If one could fancy Pompeii restored, and repeopled with the men and women whose mouldering bones are now being dug up from its ruins, it would not present a greater contrast to the modern cities of the west than Hamath. For thirty centuries or more, life has been at a stand-still there. Everything is patriarchal—costume, manners, salutations, occupations. The venerable elders, who, with turbaned heads, flowing beards, and flowing robes, sit daily in the gates, might pass for the elders of the children of Heth who bargained with Abraham in the gates of Kirjath-arba; and the Arab sheikhs, who over and anon pass in and out, armed with sword and spear, are no unworthy representatives of the fiery Ishmael. There is no town in the world in which primeval life can be seen in such purity as in Hamath. The people glory in it. No greater insult could be offered to them than to contrast Hamath with the cities of the infidel.

The site of Hamath is picturesque. It stands in the deep glen of the Orontes, whose broad rapid stream divides it through the center. The banks are lined with poplars, and the queer houses rise like terraces along the steep slopes. Four bridges span the stream, and connect the two quarters of the city. The remains of antiquity are nearly all gone; the citadel is a vast mound of rubbish; the mosques are falling to ruin, and the private houses, though in a few cases splendidly decorated within, are shapeless piles of mud and timber.

But the great curiosities of Hamath are its Persian wheels, numbers of which are ranged along the river side, turned by the current, and raise water to supply the mosques, houses and gardens. Like everything else, they are old and crazy; and as they turn lazily round they creak and groan, now in deep bass, now in shrill treble, and now in horrid concert of jarring sounds. In the still summer evening, when the shadows fall upon the river banks, hiding the rippling water and the laboring wheels, and when silence reigns over the streets and houses of the old city, these strange sounds swell up from the gathering gloom, and echo through the valley, as if the spirits of evil had broken from their prison-house and were filling the air with shriek and wail.

Hamath takes rank among the oldest cities of the world, having been founded by the youngest son of Canaan, some four thousand years ago. Gen. x. 18. It was already the capital of a kingdom at the exodus. During the warlike rule of David it was forced to yield allegiance to Israel; 2 Sam. viii. 9; but at a later period Hamath had attained to such power that Amos distinguished it by the name of "great;" vi. 2; and the Assyrian monarch spoke of its conquest as among the most celebrated of his achievements. 2 Kings xviii. 34. When the kingdom of the Seleucidæ was established in Northern Syria the name Hamath was changed to Epiphania, in honor of Antiochus Epiphanes, but on the overthrow of Greek power the Greek name disappeared; and we have to this day the old Hebrew appellation retained in its Arabic form Hamah.

Hamah has still thirty thousand inhabitants. It has for many centuries been the residence of a remnant of the old Mohammedan aristocracy—a race now distinguished for poverty, pride, and fanaticism. They are the determined enemies of all change alike in religion, art, and social life. The age of Mohammed is their golden age; and the literature of the Koran the only literature worthy of the name. Wherever one meets with or sees them strutting through the dingy streets, sitting in the gates, or at their devotions in the mosque, he is immediately reminded of the Pharisee's prayer, "God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are."

I once met a distinguished member of this proud race at the house of a learned and liberal Moslem friend in Damascus. The conversation turned on the progress of art and science in Western Europe. Railways, steam engines, printing presses, the electric telegraph, and many other triumphs of modern discovery. He listened with perfect calmness and indifference; and as he haughtily stroked his beard he now and again muttered a few words, among which I could detect the not very complimentary kafirin ("infidels"). A beautiful copy of the Koran, a gem of the Leipzig press, was put into his hand. He opened it. "It is printed," he exclaimed, throwing it from him and wiping his fingers as if the very touch was pollution.

I drew his attention to the comparative state of England and the East both in ancient and modern times. I showed him that there must be something wrong in the latter—some grievous defect in its government, and in its faith—when such a fatal check was put upon the advance of art and civilization. His reply was singularly characteristic of the state of feeling among all orthodox Mohammedans. It explains, also, as I believe, the true source of Turkish misrule. "The Franks," said he, "possess the wisdom and the power of jinns (evil spirits); but Allah has reserved for us alone the true religion. Lillah el-mejd, glory be to God!"—J. L. Porter.

ENTERING INTO REST.

We read in Heb. iv. 2, that the gospel (good news) was preached to the Israelites in the wilderness.

What gospel could that have been? Was it the gospel of the grace of God in Christ Jesus? Evidently not. The rest into which they failed to enter was the land of Canaan; and the good news (gospel) which they heard, but did not believe, was the promise of entering into possession of that rest. "They could not enter in because of unbelief." Let us not fall after the same example of unbelief."

After Joshua had led them into that typical rest, God spoke of another day, saying in (the book of) David, "They shall not enter into my rest." There remaineth, therefore, still an entering into rest for the people of God. This is the great rest of which that was but the type. The people who enter into it are the rest people of God, of whom the Israelites were typical.

But what is this real rest? We who have believed do enter into that rest. R. V. It is a present possession to the believer.

If Joshua had led them into that rest, God would not afterward have said, "They shall not enter into my rest." It would be absurd to say that "after so long a time," even from the time they entered the land until David wrote the Psalms.

The writer of the book of Hebrews also uses another line of reasoning, drawn from another type or shadow, viz., the seventh day. He says: "For he speaks in a certain place on this wise: And God rested on the seventh day from all his works; and in this place again, They shall not enter into my rest."

The meaning of the word Sabbath is cessation, or to cease; and he that has entered into his (God's) rest has ceased from his own works as God did from his. Verse 10. The Sabbath or seventh day is here seen to be a type or shadow of that rest which we enter into when we cease from the works of the law as a means of salvation, or as a religious duty.

A promise having been left us of entering into God's rest, let us fear lest any of us should seem to have come short of (entering into) it. R. V. It would seem from this that any person who is still keeping the old Jewish law of ordinances as a religious service has not entered into God's rest. He has not ceased from his own works as God did from his, so he has come short of entering into God's rest. He is still touching, tasting, handling the elements of the worldly sanctuary and service.

We often hear people speak of the "weak and beggarly elements of the world," meaning sinful pleasures; but Paul calls the ordinances of the Jewish service "elements of the world." All these—meats, drinks, divers washings, Sabbath day, etc.,—belonged to the old covenant of works, and "perished with the using." The law covenant and all pertaining to it waxed old and vanished away when the new covenant of grace came into force.

Surely there must be a great deal of misapplication of Scripture by well meaning people. Brethren, let us free ourselves from the thralldom of popery and her teachings as rapidly as we can.

Under the old law the Israelites must be circumcised. This we see to be but a shadow, for under the teaching of the new covenant the people were urged not to be circumcised, because the substance having come, who continued making shadow gave evidence that they either ignored or did not understand the relation the shadow bore to the substance. Careful observers will notice that the commandments contained in the decalogue are none of them spoken of by the New Testament writers as being shadows except the seventh day or Sabbath. That one is clearly made out by Paul to be a shadow of our rest from the works of the law—rest in Christ.

In conclusion we would say that those who urge the sanctity of the seventh day or any other day as a religious service, do not see the use of the shadow, nor the relation it bears to our rest from such works.

JOHN HUDSON.

BIBLE TRUTH.

In attempting to write upon a theme of such magnitude, touching as it does our future destiny, I feel my insufficiency for the task, and the necessity of relying solely on what the Lord in his goodness has been pleased to reveal to the children of men. "Revealed things belong to us and to our children; secret things to God," will be our motto; and "Speak, Lord, thy servant heareth," our attitude. Surely, the safest, and in fact the only way to arrive at the truth, is to keep in mind that whatever is truth, so far as the plan of salvation is concerned, is this: that if the idea is not in the Bible it is because the words are not there to express the idea. For instance, every new truth, or new discovery, requires a new name or a new phrase to express it. Thus the steamboat, the railroad, the telegraph, the telephone, are all inventions of man that have been discovered since the Bible was given to man, and consequently are not mentioned in the Bible.

Equally true is it that the doctrine of the inherent immortality of man, deathless spirit, never-dying soul, death that never dies, endless life in misery, or eternal torment, is not found in the Bible and consequently the doctrine is not taught there, but is the invention and doctrine of men and must eventually perish with them.

On the other hand, when we upon the Bible and read for ourselves, we learn that the man that the Scriptures reveal was made of dust; that he became a living soul, or, as the apostle expresses it, the first man, Adam, was made a living soul. The Creator said to the creature man that if he violated the law given him he should surely die. Man transgressed; and what was meant by dying is clearly revealed in the sequel in the following words: "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return."

If any of you think as the writer was taught to think when a boy, that Adam was threatened with two more deaths, a spiritual and an eternal, we reply that he was threatened only with death. "It is appointed unto man once to die," saith the Scriptures, not three times. More than this, it is a principle founded in justice, that a lawgiver may give more than he promises to his subjects, but never, in keeping with wisdom and mercy, can he inflict on his subjects more than is plainly revealed in the threatened penalty. The Bible says "sin is transgression of law," and that "the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." The soul that sins it shall die. The wicked shall not see life. God will preserve the life of all his saints, but all the wicked will be destroyed.

The Bible asks the question, "What shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel?" and answers by saying their end is destruction. But if we put the same question to the popular preachers of our time, their answer would be, "God will preserve their lives in hell forever,"—a positive contradiction to the words of the Savior, "They shall not see life," and to the words of the Psalmist, "God will preserve the lives of his saints, but all the wicked will he destroy."

How absurd the thought that an all-wise being would, in the beginning, make man immortal, which, as all admit, means exemption from death, and then in the very first law he gives him threaten him with death, which in the very nature of things could never be executed. And so it would appear, after all, that the devil was right when he said that the Lord knew that in the day that man ate of the tree of knowledge of good and evil he would not surely die, and that the Savior was mistaken when he said the devil was a liar from the beginning.

How much better it would be to believe what is written! Then we see beauty, harmony, and wisdom worthy of a God having attributes of love, wisdom, and power—love for the greatest possible good of his creatures, wisdom to devise the best plan, and power to execute it. The Bible says the creature was made subject to vanity and subject to hope. Man was free to choose for himself, to choose life or death—to obey was to live, to disobey was to die. To form a character in harmony with God's revealed words is to inherit eternal life or immortality, and to disobey, or to form a character in opposition to God's revealed word, is to inherit the wages of sin, which is death. Taking this plain and simple view of the Bible doctrine of man's origin and destiny, we can see the evil was only designed to be temporary to work out permanent good, and that an all-wise Creator will never permit in his universe sin and immortality to mingle or dwell together. God's order is first natural, afterwards the spiritual.

MISSIONARY FUND.

We, as a people, have never had any system for missionary work. It is very desirable that a plan be adopted through which all can contribute to both home and foreign missionary work. To this end, the Publication Association has concluded to establish a missionary fund, to which all may contribute. The plan is this. Any one can send to THE RESTITUTION such amount as they may desire to contribute, and have the paper sent to such person or persons as they may name. Or they can send the money and leave Brother Chaplin to use it in sending the papers to such persons as he may think best. The Free-Will offerings sent out many missionaries, in the shape of RESTITUTIONS. These missionaries went into the families of persons who were hungry for the truths of the glorious gospel, and I have no doubt will be as bread cast upon the waters. When we sit down at our firesides, with our families gathered around, and take up THE RESTITUTION and read the encouraging reports from brethren residing in different parts of the world, the glorious promises made by God to his children, the signs of the times indicating the near approach of the time when our dear Redeemer will return again to this earth, bringing with him the reward of the saints, do we not feel that we would like to be the instrument of gladdening the hearts of others by putting THE RESTITUTION into their hands that they might read and understand these beautiful truths, and learn the road that leads to everlasting life, that the angel in heaven may rejoice over one more sinner who has repented, and rather be added to our crown?

This is not a vain undertaking. We know that every dollar spent will bring in, some thirty, some sixty, and some a hundred fold. It is more blessed to give than to receive.

Oh! let us remember the words of Christ: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

How we admire Paul's effort to convert King Agrippa! There are millions of souls in the world just as valuable as Agrippa and who would more readily accept and enjoy the truth. Then let us work while this day, for the night cometh wherein no man can work. Our time is short, and what we do must be done quickly. Do not put it off until next year or next month. We may never see next year. Now is the accepted time. The harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few.

The law of Moses and law of Christ are compared and contrasted, and the relation of both to the old and new covenants is treated at some length. The Sabbath question is carefully and lengthily examined, and presented and discussed in a somewhat new light.

The work also includes the consideration of Sunday, conditional immortality, the gospel, return of the Jews, the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, punishment of the wicked, the state of the dead, the new birth, the one faith, the one hope, the image of God, nature of Christ, the name, religion, morality, Christianity, etc.

THE SUN.

NEW YORK, 1884.

"About sixty million copies of The Sun have gone out of our establishment during the past twelve months.

"If you were to paste end to end all the columns of all The Suns printed and sold last year you would get a continuous strip of interesting information, common sense wisdom, sound doctrine, and jests will long enough to reach from Printing House square, the birthplace of The Sun, to the top of Mount Copernicus in the moon, then back to Printing House square, and then three-quarters of the way back to the moon again.

"If The Sun is written for the inhabitants of the earth; this same strip of intelligence would girdle the globe twenty-seven or twenty-eight times.

"If every buyer of a copy of The Sun during the past year had spent only one hour over it, and if his wife or his grandfather has spent another hour, this newspaper in two has afforded the human race thirteen thousand years of steady reading, night and day.

"It is only by little calculations like these that you can form any idea of the circulation of the most popular of American newspapers, or of its influence on the opinions and actions of American men and women.

"The people, and will continue to be, a newspaper which tells the truth without fear of consequences, which gets at the facts no matter how much the process costs, and which presents the news of all the world without waste of words and in the most readable shape.

"If you know The Sun, you like it already, and you will read it with accustomed diligence and profit during what is here to be the most interesting year in its history. If you do not yet know The Sun, it is high time to get into the sunshine.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the doctrine of restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortalized saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

RUSSIAN PHASE OF THE EASTERN QUESTION—No. 45.

Gog. Having noticed the original location of the sons of Japheth, that they settled those countries now constituting a part of Scythia and Siberia, which form eastern or Asiatic Russia, we shall here name a few ideas relative to their king of the last days. Gog—"Gog (the prince) of the land of Magog, the prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal." "Gog was the common name of their kings, as Pharoah was of the kings of Egypt."—Boothroyd.

Michaelis compares the word Gog with Kan, or Chak, the general names of kings among the ancient Turks, Moguls, Tartars, Calmucks and Chinese. Gog is evidently the royal commander of the great northern army. The prophet addresses Gog as a despotic prince; one that has the most absolute control of his subjects. As this noted character will appear in his proper position in the approaching conflict on the mountains of Israel, we shall take leave of him till we trace the gradual increase of his power.

A few thoughts relative to the occupancy of the field, now forming the territory of the great northern empire, from the time of its first settlement by the sons of Japheth and their posterity to the birth of the Russian, will be necessary to a proper appreciation of his character and the divine mission of his mighty empire.

How was that great field occupied from the days of Japheth to the rise and supremacy of the Pharoahs? How during the many centuries of Babylonian, Medo-Persian, and Greco-Macedonian rule? These questions involve much that is interesting, yet somewhat obscure. The history of the tenantry of this great hoar field during these four dominations is unwritten. Could its seas, its lakes, marshes and rivers; its mountains, valleys, plains and deserts pen minutely their modes of life and action through the night and day dreams of those traditional ages, no records would be perused with greater interest, since they would contain the original histories of all the nations of Europe, and the western world.

Asia is called the cradle of the human race. Man, however, is supposed to have been formed in south western Asia. It is certain that Adam was created out of the Garden of Eden; north of it perhaps; how far north is simply conjecture. We can reckon, however, two very remarkable national lines: the younger one in Germany, in Europe; the other, and by many centuries the senior, in Central Asia. The one in Asia is very generally conceded to be the mother hive, though some ethnologists hold to a trinity of original centers.

What now concerns us is to locate the center of the Aryan family of nations, called Indo-European or Indo-Germanic. There are now two centers, an eastern and a western. Centers wide apart: the one including all the European nationalities, except the Turks, Magyars of Fins and Lapps; the other including the inhabitants of Armenia, of Asia.

From the analogy existing between the modern Hindoo Sanscrit, Zend (the ancient Persian) the Greek, Latin, the mother of Italian, French, Spanish, Portuguese, and Wallachian, Celtic, Gothic, or Germanic or Tutonic including English and Scandinavian, and the Slavonic, including Russic, and part of Austria, we conclude that those nations have one common origin. They are sister languages. Neither one can claim to be the parent. They are the daughters of one mother. What is the mother language? What is the mother nation? These are problems yet to be solved. The earth's original formation can be traced in her strata. Removing the strata, the aqueous deposits, we can say, such was the original earth. These strata are later growths, each containing its appropriate fauna and flora. We thus gain, by an examination of the fossils of each strata, a history of the earth's formation. Its fossils are the record of earth's formation. So we, by the tracing of languages gain a knowledge of man's past history.

"Now languages are to the ethnologist what strata are in geology; dead languages are his fossils, and petrifactions. By skillful interpretation of their indications, aided by the light of other available monuments, he is able to spell out, with more or less probability, the ethnical records of the past, and thus obtain a glimpse here and there into the gray cloud that rests over the dawn of the ages."

These languages, having a common origin, seem to have their focus in central Asia, east of the Caspian sea, and north of the chain of mountains called Hindu Kush, and Paropamisus. Such appears to be the located home of this mother language, and, consequently of the mother nation that used it. There she dwelt alone, anterior to all European history, or before the Siberian deserts had received any human footprint. The first colony that entered Europe from that radiating center we may call Lapps, the second Kimmerians or Kelts, the third were the Scythians, Goths or Germans, the fourth and last were the Slavonians. The Lapps did not radiate from the Aryan center, but from a more northern point, perhaps the Mongolian, or Japhetian. From the Aryan center the radiations were principally east and west.

At a point that dates back of authentic profane history, this mother family broke up, part passing through Hindu Kush into the valley of the Ganges; while the rest settled in Persia and became the Medes and Persians of history.

Whence the name Aryan? In the Sanscrit writings of early date, the Hindus called themselves Aryans: "and the name is preserved in the classic Arii, a tribe of ancient Persia. Aria, the modern Herat and Ariana, the name of a district comprehending the greater part of ancient Persia, and extended by some so as to embrace Bactriana, Ariana or Aryana is evidently an old Persian word, preserved in the modern native name of Persia, Airan or Iran. Arya, in Sanscrit, signifies "excellent," "honorable" being allied probably to the Greek ari (aios) the best. Others connect it with the root ar (Lat. arari, to plough), as if to distinguish a people who were tillers (terræ) of earth, from the purely nomadic Turanian or Turks.

Of this assumed Aryan mother-nation Max Müller says of the undivided Aryan family: "It should be observed that most of the terms connected with those and warfare differ in each of the Aryan dialects, while words connected with more peaceful occupations belong generally to the common heirloom of the Aryan language. The proper appreciation of this fact, in its general bearing will show how a similar remark made by Niebuhr, with regard to Greek and Latin, requires a very different explanation from that which that great scholar, from his more restricted point of view, was able to give it. It will show that all the Aryan nations had led a long life of peace before they separated, and that their language acquired individuality and nationality as each colony started in search of new homes—new generations forming new terms connected with the warlike and adventurous life of their onward migrations.

Hence it is that not only Greek and Latin, but all Aryan languages have their peaceful words in common, and hence it is that they all differ so strangely in their warlike expressions. Thus the domestic animals are generally known by the same name in England and in India; while the wild beasts have different names even in Greek and Latin. They were a pastoral people and cultivated their lands, made cloth, and used the various metals.

The Aryan family has sent its colonies into the field of Asiatic and European Russia. They spread at an early date through the southern provinces of Asiatic Russia. The Turanian family of languages is chief of Asiatic Russia. It includes all the languages spoken in Europe and in Asia, not included in the Aryan and Shemitic families, except the Chinese and its congenate dialects.

The Shemitic family of languages is the third great family of languages spoken by tenants occupying the Russian field. And here let it be distinctly observed: that the character of the Russian empire is involved very intimately in the history of the tribal elements of this field from the days that the sons of Japheth first entered its Asiatic territory, B. C. 100, to A. D. 872, when by the drawing of the national curtain, the Russian first appeared upon the stage of human action; since from these tribal elements it derives the distinctive features of its character, moral, social and national.

We shall examine these tribal elements under the following general heads:

1. Under the patriarchs, to the rise of the Babylonian empire.
2. During the Babylonian empire.
3. Under the Medo-Persian empire.
4. Under the Greco-Macedonian monarchy.
5. Under the pure Roman dynasty.
6. Under the Romano-German dynasty till the Russian himself became an actor in the theatre of empires.

This course of investigation will allow us to trace the various families as they enter and occupy the various portions of this great field of northern Asia and Europe, till the elements that form Russian character and Russian domination, are fully gathered and ready for a perfect development. It will be seen by this elementary investigation, that the Russian is an extraordinary man, in the possession of an extraordinary empire—that he is a man in whose veins flows the life-giving blood of one hundred tribal nations speaking forty different languages.

1. Russian field, its occupants from its division under the sons of Japheth to the rise of the Babylonian empire. What people occupied Russian Asia and Europe during this early and protracted age? We might as well call this period the patriarchal age, since they occupied its middle division. For the history of this period we must look to sacred history since no profane, historian whose work survives, comes down to us lived near the days of Moses.

Herodotus, of Halicarnassus, father of Grecian history, was contemporary with Nehemiah. Herodotus wrote a sketch of ancient nations. Among these we find the Scythians. No very distinct idea of the locality of Scythia can be gathered from the author, only that the Scythians described by him were dwelling in south eastern Europe, and were a people that in many particulars resembled the Israelites.

Anacharsis, a Scythian philosopher, lived in the days of Ezekiel, B. C. 574, 140 years after the beginning of the captivity of the ten tribes; hence about the close of our first historical period of the Russian field. Who were these Scythians? What part of this Russian territory did they occupy? Scythian, by the Greeks, was a nomad, a tramp; one that moved from place to place, in quest of food, or for purposes of plunder.

We have before us an ancient map of Asiatic Russia, or Siberia, from Siber, one of its ancient towns. On that map we find, in the southern part of Siberia, an immense tract called Scythia within Imaus, and Scythia beyond Imaus. It includes the modern Turkestan, divided into eastern and western by Mount Imaus, or the modern Hindu Kush. The Persians call it Turan, it being north of Iran.

It is remarkable that Iran and Turan should have contained the two great national hives, the Iryan and the Turanian, whose languages are so widely diffused among the northern and western nations of the earth.

There were, at a more recent date, two Scythias; the ancient Scythia including Turkestan, and the unknown regions north of that territory now called Siberia. In after years a colony from the mother country went westward, and, for a time settled in south eastern Europe, between the Don and Danube, taking their mother name of Scythia. These were the Scythians described by Justin, a notice of which will appear under a more recent historic date.

FIRST CHAPTER OF GENESIS.

1. In authority God made (was the cause of) the heavens and the earth.

2. And the earth was invisible and not fitted up, and there was darkness upon the abyss; and God's spirit moved itself upon the water.

3. And God said, let there come to be light and there came to be light.

4. And God saw that the light was (was) good. And God made a distinction between the light and the darkness.

5. And God called the light day, and the darkness he called night. And there came to be an evening and there came to be a morning, one day.

6. And God said let there come to be a canopy in the midst of the water, and let it be that which divideth between water and water. And it came to be so.

7. And God made (caused) the canopy; and God made a separation between the water that was under the canopy, and the water that was above the canopy.

8. And God called the canopy heavens (ouranos). And God saw that it was (was) good. And there came to be an evening and there came to be a morning, a second day.

9. And God said let the water that is under the heavens be gathered together into one synagogue (sunagogee) and let the dry appear; and it came to be so. And the water that was made under the heavens was gathered together into their synagogues (meeting places), and the dry did appear.

10. And God called the dry, land (or earth), and the standing together of the waters he called seas. And God saw that it was good.

11. And God said let the land bud herbage of grass, sowing seed according to genus and according to species; and fruit tree bearing fruit, whose seed shall be in it according to genus upon the land; and it came to be so.

12. And the [illegible] herbage of grass, [illegible] genus and according to species, and fruit tree bearing fruit whose seed was in it upon the land (earth ge).

13. And God saw that it was good. And there became (or came to be) an evening and there became a morning, a third day.

14. And God said may there have come to be light-bearers in the canopy of the heavens for illumination upon the earth, to distinguish between the day and the night. And let them stand for signs, and for seasons (or appointed times) and for days and for years.

15. And let them stand for illumination in the canopy of the heavens, so as to shine upon the earth. And it came to be so.

16. And God made (caused to be) the two great light-bearers, the great light-bearer for authorities (Latin principia) for the day, and the lesser light-bearer for authorities (principia) for the night and the stars.

17. And God placed them in the canopy of the heavens so as to shine upon the earth,

18. And rule over the day and the night, and distinguish between light and darkness. And God saw that it was good.

19. And there came to be an evening and there came to be a morning, a fourth day.

20. And God said let the waters load forth creeping things of living (opuia) organisms, and flying things that fly upon the earth throughout the canopy of the heavens, and it came to be so.

21. And God made (caused to be) the great whales, and every organism (soul) of living, creeping things, which the waters led out according to their genera, and every flying thing genus by genus; and God saw that it was good.

22. And God blessed them saying, Increase and multiply, and fill the waters in the seas, and may the flying things have multiplied upon the earth (or land).

23. And there came to be an evening and there came to be a morning, a fifth day.

24. And God said let the earth lead forth living organism (soul) genus by genus, four-footed and creeping things, and wild beasts of the earth, genus by genus. And it came to be so.

25. And God made the wild beasts of the earth genus by genus and the tame animals (domestic animals) according to their genera, and all the creeping things of the earth genus by genus; and God saw that they were good.

26. And God said let us make (cause to be) man according to our image and according to a likening process; and let them rule over the fishes of the sea and the flying things of the heavens, and the domestic animals and all the earth, and over all the creeping things that creep upon the earth.

27. And God made (caused to be) the man according to an image of a God (a disposer) made he him; male and female made he them.

28. And God blessed them saying, Increase and multiply and fill the earth, and lord it (or subject it as a lord) over it, and rule over the fishes of the sea and the flying things of the heavens, and over all the domestic animals, and over all the earth, and over all the creeping things that creep upon the earth.

29. And God said to, I have given unto you all sown grass (to sowath) seed, that is upon all the earth; and every tree that hath in itself fruit that soweth seed, yours shall it be to eat.

30. And unto all the wild beasts of the earth, and unto all the flying things of the heavens, and unto every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth, that hath in itself an organism (soul) of life, even all green grass to eat. And it came to be so.

31. And God saw all that he had made (caused to be). And lo! they were very good (kala). And there came to be an evening and there came to be a morning, a sixth day.

CHAPTER II.

1. And the heavens and the earth were consummated in unity and all the [illegible]

2. And God [illegible] on the sixth day [illegible]

And God [illegible] from all his works which he had made (caused).

3. And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it, because in it he ceased from all his works which he, God, had began to make.

4. This is the book of the origin of the heavens and the earth,

5. And every green thing of the field before that it had come to be upon the earth, and all the grass of the field before that it had sprung up. For God had not rained upon the earth, and there was no man to work it.

6. And a fountain went up out of the earth, and watered all the face of the earth.

7. And God moulded the man dust from the earth, and breathed into (or implanted in) his face a breath of (tes) life, and the man came to be a living organism (os ynyer psuxe).

8. And God planted (in the sense of grafted) a paradise in Edom at the east, and put there the man whom he had molded.

9. And moreover God caused to spring out from the earth every tree seasonable to see and good to eat, and the tree of the life in the midst of the paradise, and the tree that makes one know that he knows good and bad.

10. And a river goeth its way out of Edom to water the paradise. Therefrom it divideth into four heads (arxas) (our idiom would be branches).

11. Phison the name of the one, this being the one that encompasseth all the land of Evilat. There the gold is.

12. And the gold of that land is good; and there the anthracite and the precious stone is.

13. And the name of the second river is Geon, this being the one that encompasseth the land of Ethiopia.

14. And the third river is the Tigris this being the one that goeth its way in front of along opposite the Assyrians. And the fourth river is the Euphrates.

15. And the Lord God took the man whom he had molded and put him in the paradise of delight to work it and to watch to guard it.

16. And the Lord God directed Adam saying, from every tree that is in the paradise mayest thou eat in the way of food.

17. But from the tree of the comprehension of good and bad thou shalt not eat from it: and in the day that thou dost eat from it, thou wilt be condemned to death.

18. And the Lord God said, it is not good for man to be alone. Let us make for him a helper after his kind—ear' autw.

19. And God molded still further from the earth, all the wild beasts of the earth and the flying things of the heavens and led them unto Adam to see what he would call them; and whatever Adam called any living soul (psuxe) that was its name.

20. And Adam called names for all the tame beasts and for all the flying things of the heavens and for all the wild beasts of the field. But for Adam there was not found a helper like to him.

21. And God cast an ecstasy (ekstasin) upon Adam and he slept; and he took one of his ribs and filled up flesh in place of it.

22. And God built up the rib which he had taken from Adam, into a woman, and led her unto Adam.

23. And Adam said this now is a bone from my bones and flesh from out my flesh. She will have been called woman (ishe) (the derivation of this word ish and ere a ploughshare, so named because of its right-angled-triangle shape suggesting the numerical typical signification of factorship, the side of a triangle being a factor—this factor having a special signification in a right-angled triangle, which exactly fits the conditions here, the woman from the man, the side or factor taken away from the triangle, the man or triangle incomplete without its restoration, but when built up into a new right-angled triangle and then restored to its place, we have a new unity in a triangle double the size of the first which is one half of the whole square formed by the union of the last Adam with his bride or the square formed by the [illegible] triangles) [illegible] will forsake [illegible] mother and will have cleaved unto his wife; and they two will be for (es) one flesh.

Brevities.

There is no grander or better field to show our love to God and man than that which lies before every Christian. Here we can show the extent of our love. Here we can exercise our charity. Here we can show our sympathies in a thousand ways. We need not look for a better field in which we may achieve honor and renown, for there is no fame so lasting as that which is won on the field of Christ.

A GOOD PRICE FOR A 1663 BIBLE.

The Cooke library sale, which was continued at Clinton Hall yesterday, was well attended. One of the curiosities was John Eliot's Indian Bible. This is one of the copies having the dedication of King Charles, of which twenty copies only were said to be printed. It bears the date of 1663. After some brisk bidding the volume was knocked off for $1,250, $350 more than the original cost to Mr. Cooke.—N. Y. Tribune, Dec. 6.

The historical church doors upon which Luther nailed his famous ninety-five theses at Wittenberg in 1517 are now to be seen at the chief entrance to the Church of St. Bartholomew, at Berlin. Wittenberg was bombarded during the Seven-Years' War, and, the church being almost levelled with the ground, the doors were badly damaged. They were however, patched up and restored to their places when the church was rebuilt; but as they suffered a good deal from the effects of the weather, they were in time removed for safety to the Berlin Museum, where they remained until King Frederick V. presented them to the Church of St. Bartholomew upon its completion. For the original doors, which are popularly known in Germany as the "Gates of the Reformation," new ones of bronze engraved with Luther's theses have been substituted at Wittenberg. These were given to the castle church in 1858 by king Frederick William IV., and are the finest things of their kind in Europe.

MISSIONARY FUND.

We, as a people, have never had any system for missionary work. It is very desirable that a plan be adopted through which all can contribute to both home and foreign missionary work. To this end, the Publication Association has concluded to establish a missionary fund, to which all may contribute. The plan is this: Any one can send to THE RESTITUTION such amount as they may desire to contribute, and have the paper sent to such person or persons as they may name. Or they can send the money and leave Brother Chaplin to use it in sending the papers to such persons as he may think best. The Free-Will offerings sent out many missionaries, in the shape of RESTITUTIONS. These missionaries went into the families of persons who were hungry for the truths of the glorious gospel, and I have no doubt will be as bread cast upon the waters. When we sit down at our firesides, with our families gathered around, and take up THE RESTITUTION and read the encouraging reports from brethren residing in different parts of the world, the glorious promises made by God to his children, the signs of the times indicating the near approach of the time when our dear Redeemer will return again to this earth, bringing with him the reward of the saints, do we not feel that we would like to be the instrument of gladdening the hearts of others by putting THE RESTITUTION into their hands that they might read and understand these beautiful truths, and learn the road that leads to everlasting life, that the angels in heaven may rejoice over one more sinner who hath repented, and another star added to our crown?

This is not a vain undertaking. We know that every dollar spent will bring in, some thirty, some, sixty, and some any hundred fold. It is more blessed to give than to receive.

Oh! let us remember the words of Christ, "[illegible] it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.

How we admire Paul's effort to convert King Agrippa! There are millions of souls in the world just as valuable as Agrippa and who would more readily accept and obey the truth. Then let us work while it is day, for the night cometh wherein no man can work. Our time is short, and what we do must be done quickly. Do not put it off until next year or next month. We may never see next year. Now is the accepted time. The harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few.

R. S. DWIGGINS, Pres.

Several complaints have been made of late of money sent and lost. We will now say that we cannot be responsible for money sent loose in letters. Send by Bank Draft, Post Office Order or Registered Letter, and it may be at our risk; otherwise the sender takes his own risk. Please do not send Bank Checks, as we often have trouble in collecting them. Parties who are obliged to send postage stamps will please buy the one or two cent denominations.

As the twilight hints the flower and colors the rock—as it alternately sparkles in the dew-drops and shines in the broad ocean—so the true religious spirit should be present in the humblest bargain, the lowliest word of kindness, as much as in the great songs of Hebrew bards and the profound teachings of St. Paul, those ancient headlands of Christian thought.

What you say or do while you are angry is a truer measure of your inner self than what you say or do while you retain your self-control. And again, the treatment which you receive from another person who is angry shows better than anything else the true estimate of you by that person.

The mission of the gospel is not to men's heads but to their hearts. Let us never forget that the gospel itself, though the wisdom of God and the power of God, will always seem foolishness to those whose intellects are intoxicated by vanity and conceit.

Send us the name of a friend who would be likely to be interested in THE RESTITUTION and we will send him a sample copy.

Plymouth, Indiana, Dec. 26, 1883.

☞ Examine the label on your paper and see if your subscription has expired. Do not wait till it is past due, but attend to it AT ONCE. RENEW TO-DAY.

OWING to the number of communications on hand, some must be deferred to the future.

AT this time of general festivity and rejoicing let our brethren in every locality remember the poor.

THE January number, being No. 1 Vol. 78, of the Phrenological Journal, is on our desk. Without being specific, it is due the publishers to say that the well-merited popularity of their periodical will suffer no abatement from a careful perusal of this first number for the coming new year 1884.

THIS number is our last for the solemnly eventful year 1883. The year 1884 may be more strangely eventful. Of the past we may devoutly say: "Hitherto the Lord hath helped us." For the future we implore the divine blessing upon us our paper, and upon all our subscribers, patrons and friends.

WE have received Vick's Illustrated Floral Guide for the Spring of 1884. The paper and printing are most commendable for the unsullied beauty of the one, and the well-defined neatness and accuracy of the other. The elegantly colored frontispiece is truly a gem. To all lovers of floral beauty, and to the cultivators of garden vegetables we heartily commend this annual. Send 10 cents to James Vick, Rochester, N. Y., and get a marvel of beauty and completeness in return.

WITH the present number we commence giving a local time table for Plymouth, as a station on that division of the Pennsylvania Company's Railway, known as the Pittsburgh, Ft. Wayne & Chicago Railway. As we have passed over the entire line from Chicago to New York, we can speak advisedly of this grand thoroughfare in terms of unqualified praise as a first class road in every respect. As we are crowded for room at this time, we defer a fuller and more definite notice to another number.

PROBATION FOR THE DEAD.

I have been very much interested in reading the late articles in THE RESTITUTION by Bro. Colegrove, Brooks and others, on the subject of a future probation for the dead or the so-called "fair chance theory."

I recognize the fact that the Christian mind must be progressive, and always willing to accept truth in whatever form it may present itself, even though it does overthrow some cherished opinion long entertained. But this does not obligate him to receive everything that is offered as truth. "Prove all things and hold fast that which is good" is the Bible rule. We must bear in mind that there are two ways of progressing, a right way and a wrong way, towards truth and away from it. Truth itself cannot progress. Truth is eternal. It changes not. From everlasting to everlasting it is the same. When once truth is acquired on any subject all further progress is at an end. When we have found truth we have struck bed rock and can lay our foundation of faith thereon and build upon it with full assurance that our foundation is strong and will never need re-examination.

Knowing these things we must be very careful how we accept new doctrines. Hear them of course, respectfully, remembering that we were once in ignorance of some very plain truths which seem so bright and clear to us now that we wonder at our former lack of understanding. Had we shut our ears then, forbidding all research, rested satisfied that we had acquired all truth we should not now be resting in the light of God's truth. But "be not wafted about by every wind of doctrine" but "search the Scriptures to see if those things be so."

If this new doctrine is upheld by the Scriptures, if we can read therein in plain language that the misguided dead shall come forth at the resurrection to probation, then let us accept it without question. But if on the other hand we find it resting on a few obscure texts wrested from their context and supported by a vast amount of human opinion and reasoning, while plain testimony is arrayed against it, reject it at once. God's word must be the sole arbiter in settling questions of this nature.

I have always entertained the belief that when a man dies his eternal destiny is sealed. If he has lived a sincere Christian life, "By a patient continuance in well doing seeking for glory, honor and immortality" he will receive at the resurrection, eternal life. If, on the contrary, having become a servant of Christ by being baptized into his name, he becomes wanton, "treading under foot the Son of God and counting the blood of the new covenant wherewith he was sanctified an unholy thing," for him there is a "sorer punishment than those that dispised Moses law." "It had been better for them not to know the way of righteousness than after they have known it to depart from the holy commandment." These will come forth to the resurrection of condemnation to receive that "sorer punishment," which they certainly do not receive in this life, and to die the second death. As says our Savior, Luke xii. 46, he "will cut him off and appoint him his portion with the unbelievers."

The third class comprising the unbelievers and disbelievers will remain in the grave forever without a resurrection. These are the ungodly, those who know not God, the wicked, the heathen nations. The class of whom Paul speaks, 2 Cor. iv. 3, from whom the gospel is hid, and who on this account are lost.

But if our gospel is hid it is hid from them that are lost. In whom the God of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel shine upon them. The many also are going the broad way which leads to destruction, in contrast to the few that are saved. Those "who have sinned without law" and shall "perish without law," Acts ii. 12. Those who know not God and obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, "who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of His power." 2 Thess. i. 8. Those who reinstate the servants of sin instead of obeying from the heart that form of doctrine which has delivered us, the end of which things is death. Rom. vi. 16-23. Those who are in the flesh, who cannot please God, who live after the flesh, and shall die. Rom. viii. 8-13. Those who remain and die in the same condition we were in before we embraced the gospel "without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world." Eph. ii. 12. Also read verses 1-3.

That class to whom the "preaching of the cross is foolishness," who perish, 1 Cor. i. 18. The rich men who trust [illegible] of the living God; also [illegible] and the maidens [illegible] and be drunken," [illegible] unbelievers." Not in the grave, deep, still feed on them."

"The grave being a habitation for every one of them" (margin his "soul eeares forever." Psa. xlix. Those who are found by death in a similar state as those task-masters of Egypt, who lorded it over Israel in the days of their servitude, of whom Isaiah says, "They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise: therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them and caused all remembrance of them to be forgotten," Isa. xxvi. 14, whom Paul calls "Vessels of wrath fitted for destruction," or like the kings and wise men, the rulers and armies of Babylon of whom Jeremiah says, "I will make drunk her princes and her wise men, her captains and her rulers and her mighty men, and they shall sleep a perpetual sleep and not awake, says the king whose name is the Lord of hosts." Jer. li. 57. The heathen "who shall be as though they had not been." Obadiah 16.

If this belief which I now entertain is not true no one will be quicker to abandon it than I. It seems to me now to rest on a good foundation, God's word, as partially indicated above, seems strongly in its favor. Before I can abandon it I must be satisfied that it is untrue and these texts upon which it rests satisfactorily interpreted or shown to mean some thing else. Some of these texts we have used time and again with great force against the doctrines of the immortality of the soul, and hell fire. It seems to me that they can be used with equal effect against this new doctrine of—as Bro. Colegrove expresses it—"resurrectionary hope and blessing for those who have died in unbelief."

In searching God's word for evidences of the new theory, I have been thus far utterly unable to find any direct testimony to support it, that is I can find no positive statements or promises that this class shall have "resurrectionary hope and blessing," or future probation, or a future chance after death to learn and obey the gospel. I may be mistaken, but it seems to me the doctrine rests too much on inferences drawn from obscure texts, and on human reasoning and opinion. It seems to me the whole general tenor of the Scripture teaching is against it. The Scriptures represent man as dying, perishing, and to save himself he must take hold on the Savior, seize the gospel rope and cling to it faithfully until the end. Otherwise he must perish. "He that hath the Son hath life, he that hath not the Son hath not life, but the wrath of God abideth on him."

To be in accord with this doctrine this should read, "he that hath not the Son hath resurrectionary hope and blessing." The doctrine makes discord in the harmony of Bible teaching by teaching that we can be saved without taking hold of this rope. Yea, it were better not to hear of this gospel rope for if we remain in ignorance we make sure of resurrectionary hope and blessing.

They tell us that those who have heard the gospel and refused to believe, the disbelievers, will not have another chance, their fate is sealed. Did it ever occur to you preachers what terrible messengers of condemnation you are, for where one soul accepts the teaching a thousand disbelieve, so that to save one soul you damn a thousand, cut them off from this essentially better chance. For how can your feeble words compare in convincing power with the mighty eloquence of the King of kings and his immortal saints, the kings and priests of that age. Besides now we walk by faith, then by sight. We had better by far fold our hands and let the world remain in ignorance. They would insure them of resurrectionary hope and blessing, or as another fair chance writer has it, "will be delivered into the glorious liberty of the sons of God."

The Scriptures represent only a few as being saved, while the many are going through a wide gate and down a broad way which leads to destruction. Fair chance teachers that all will be saved. The two are not in harmony. There must be a mistake somewhere. Peter says, 1 Pet. iv. 17, "And if the righteous scarcely be saved where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear." The new doctrine says the ungodly at least will be saved also. I know it teaches that they receive another kind of salvation different from the saints. But I do not see how destruction, lost, to perish, condemnation, everlasting destruction, etc., can be construed into any kind of salvation, much less resurrectionary hope and blessing, and the glorious liberty of the sons of God.

The Savior says, Luke xi., of that servant who shall say, "The Lord delayeth his coming, and shall begin to [illegible] servants and the maidens [illegible] and be drunken," [illegible] unbelievers." Not a very bad portion if the new doctrine is true.

Brother Colegrove says, "We understand perfectly that much if not nearly all of this injustice has arisen from a mistaken interpretation of Scriptures, and accordingly we recognize the need of a re-examination." Presumably the injustice referred to, is the doctrine of leaving "those who once lived and failed of gospel faith" in the congregation. These men are dead, they are unconscious, they are not suffering the torments of hell, neither are they prisoners behind the bars, as one fair chance writer expresses it. They are simply dust and ashes. Is it possible to be unjust to dust and ashes? If it is unjust to leave them there, it was unjust to put them there. If there is any injustice in the matter it is not to the dust and ashes which know nothing, cannot hear, see or feel, in refusing to reconstruct out of it a human being, but to the living sensitive human beings in causing them through suffering to become dust and ashes. And it would be a glorious wrong if this terrible penalty of suffering and dying were imposed upon them because their remote ancestor Adam transgressed God's command, they themselves being guiltless.

FROM JERUSALEM.

JERUSALEM, Nov. 13, 1883.

Editor Restitution:

I send a little sketch for the children which I hope will interest some of your little readers, and as I like to write for the little ones, I shall try to send all the news and items of interest to them.

We have had a great rain, and it is now very warm, like June, and my neighbors are planting their gardens, farmers are sowing grain and it looks quite like spring.

Our mail is eight days behind time, and has not yet arrived. We think there has been a great storm at sea, or some accident to detain the steamer. We are all very anxious to get the news. We hear the Sultan refused to grant a firman to the surveying party, and we hardly know what to think about it here. But I suppose you know more in America about these matters than we do.

May God bless you in my prayer.

A. E. DAVIS.

[To the above we add some extracts from a long letter written for, and printed in the Age-to-Come Herald for December. As the letter was too long to give entire, we selected out those parts we thought of most interest to our readers.—ED. RESTITUTION.]

Oct. 2. Our trials sometimes bring us into circumstances where we can learn who our friends are and realize their value in time of need. Situated as I am, I prize true friendship; and as I look over the list of those who have proved to be friends to me here, I feel almost proud of them. God has been good to me in this respect; and may the blessings of his everlasting covenant be theirs to enjoy.

There is much said here about the contemplated canal from the Mediterranean to the Jordan valley; also new projects for railroads. Something will probably be done at the very time it should be in respect to such matters. Of course all such works will tell greatly in favor of the restoration of this heavenly country.

The Syrian fever has raged some this year, owing to the drouth, I think, as nothing of the kind appeared last year. It is not dangerous, however, with proper treatment.

An engineer from Constantinople has arrived to superintend the rebuilding of the Jaffa road. A beautiful carriage road has already been constructed from Jerusalem to Hebron, a distance of some eighteen or twenty miles. If these were railroads instead of carriage roads, we should consider it greater progress, which would be more satisfactory to the desires of our hearts; but the Great Superintendent is doing here how to carry on the work of restoration, and bring it to a more glorious completion than if carried out according to the wishes of finite mortals. So we thank God for the carriage roads and patiently wait for, though still earnestly desiring, the railroads.

That Jerusalem and the Holy Land have come nigh to awake from the predestinated slumber of ages, cannot be successfully nor consistently disputed. If this awakening requires more of an effort on the part of man than had been supposed, it will only show the sublimity of God's great plan and work to fill this earth with his knowledge and glory through the agency of man, as well as of angels and spirits. The consistency of such a plan is shown in the fact that this great knowledge and glory is designed for man's eternal rest, peace, and happiness.

I am told by the Jews that one hundred families of rich Jews have it now applied on to the government to land at Jaffa; also that an agent is sent from Odessa to buy gardens. If these reports are true, or half true, it would seem that the rich Jews are also waking up. The refugees and immigrants have heretofore mostly been poor people; and the poor will continue to come, of course, until the elect Israelites are all gathered home; for Jews, even are not all rich, and still more of the ten tribes in proportion to the whole number of Israelites, are evidently poor. The prophecies show that all classes of the scattered nation will come, and under quite different circumstances, too—some with songs of joy and some weeping.

Here are sleeping all around me the most eminent saints of the Most High God. It is a great consolation to know this. And there is great delight in believing that they will not sleep forever. Those holy men of old are yet to walk among these hills, robed in eternal beauty, with a more majestic step and look than of old. Abraham, who tented through this land as a stranger, will yet find in the same land the goldencity for which he by faith looked.

Oct. 22. The weather is delightfully cool, and the moon just splendid for sleep.

This is the last night of the "Feast of Tabernacles." I have just returned from the synagogue. I think there were nearly three thousand people present. There are thirty synagogues in Jerusalem. The Jews seemed to be very happy. These scenes strikingly bring to the mind the days long since past, when great multitudes assembled to keep these heaven-ordained institutions of the old covenant of works. Think of the great men, the wise men, the prophets, priests and kings, and even our dear Savior Himself, all so faithfully attending to the ceremonies of these feasts. Three times in the year all the male population of the nation were to appear before the Lord. What assemblages these must have been!

Yesterday I enjoyed a most charming walk to Gethsemane. I have an order to paint a sketch of the garden. How little I thought in years gone by, when reading of the garden where Christ sweat as it were, great drops of blood, that I should have the privilege of visiting the place so soon, and of painting the sacred spot. I have often heard people say, while rejoicing in anticipation of future glory, "If the hope is so precious and dear, what will it be to be there?" I am not in such a heaven as they were anticipating, neither am I in the city of gold; but I am here, where Christ witnessed a good profession before Pontius Pilate; where he preached his last sermons; where he ate the last supper with his disciples, until he shall drink new wine with them in the new kingdom of God, which will also be here; where he offered his last agonizing prayers; where he was forsaken of all, even of his disciples, the brave though rash Peter denying that he knew him, and that, too, in his presence; and where Jesus paid it all by the ignominious death upon the cross; and if the satisfaction of being here now, where so much pertaining to man's salvation has been accomplished, what must be the unspeakable joy when the result of all these sufferings shall be realized? here, in the same place; the very same Jesus who paid it all; the same Peter who denied him; the same John who leaned upon his bosom; the same city that rejected him, now saying, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord," and crowning him King of Israel, and King of all kings. What must it be to be here then? I am glad to be here now; and hope to be here then. "Fly swifter round, ye wheels of time, and bring the welcome day."

And the wheels of time do fly swiftly round. I have lived here two years, in two hired houses, and it seems not more than two months. In ten days I am to move again, outside of the walls of the old city, into the new Jerusalem. Our good consul takes this house for the American consulate. So here I am, first living outside of the walls, and then inside, and now about to move outside again, but do not leave the Holy City. How sweet it will be to have a house of my own, and "move no more;" "neither be afflicted any more."

Oct. 23. We hear that the cholera has broken out again in Egypt, and another quarantine has been established. It has been very hot for a few days, but it is now raining hard. There has been one continuous flame of lightning for an hour and a half, but no thunder! Two days more and I move to my new home, and the consul moves in here. I hope God will let this good man and his amiable wife remain here long. He is interested for the welfare of his subjects as no American consul has been before.

I am full of work, and wish I had some one to help me. I have an offer to open a regular foreign commerce in rollers, towers, etc. I will decide when I get into my new home, which I think I shall like very much. It is in a healthier locality than within the walls of the city.

We learn that Russia is making extensive war preparations and think, in fact we hope, that it will not end in smoke. The Scripture must be fulfilled—the great time of trouble must come, and the sooner the better.

It is also reported here that the new electric light is to be brought this week from Europe.

The missionaries have bought a village, five hours from Jerusalem, for the refugee Jews. They will send forty-eight families to settle there. God's mills grind slow, but sure. Israel is being planted in their own land, never to be pulled up again. "I will plant them," says the Lord, "upon their own land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land which I have given them, saith the Lord thy God." Amos ix. 15.

Nov. 1. My goods are all moved to my little cosy German house. How good God is to provide.

It is still raining, and I am all dressed to go to a big wedding in a very aristocratic family. I received my invitation in the German language. The father of the bridegroom is at the head of the Mt. Zion school, and father of the bride is the proprietor of the Mediterranean hotel.

ALICE E. DAVIS.

Recently we sent out in our paper printed slips, to be used in sending renewals to us. On these slips was a space to write Name, Post Office and State. Many persons in writing, leave off some part of their address, and the object of these slips was to get full address by giving a space for each part. Some received slips whose subscriptions do not expire for months, and have looked upon them as notices that their time was out, but they are only intended to be a convenience to our patrons.

KINGS POINT, Mo.

Editor Restitution:

You know not the joy and comfort this loved paper has been to me during the year about to close. Some dear one has furnished it to me free, this year and last. May the Lord reward them in his heavenly kingdom.

The nice, warm weather we have had has given me respite, but only for a short time. Bronchial consumption is wearing me out, slowly but surely. I have not been able to earn $5 in the last eight months. This is probably the last I shall be able to write for our dear paper. My only hope for immortality is in the resurrection. I am trying to be ready to sleep in Jesus, that when he comes I may appear with him in glory. But my sleep will be short. Soon the trump will sound, and the sleeping saints will come forth to an endless life in the kingdom of God and of Christ.

Dear friends, I can hardly say good by, but I will. Perhaps the next you will hear of me, will be my obituary in THE RESTITUTION.

JONAH PEIRCE.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Dec. 14.

Editor Restitution:

When I last wrote you, I then said I would soon again write you: and in this I wish to redeem my promise, as "a promise broken is an untruth told." I have no desire to be classed thus. And here I am reminded of an apostolic injunction, "swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath." And if only this was ever before us, how many crooked steps, and other crooked ways we would be saved.

The question presents itself right here, Is it it in the power of a man to direct his own steps, is he as much a "free agent" as he has supposed himself to be? And particularly may this question present itself to those who have not only taken hold on Christ, but who have been apprehended by him; called to service; bear the yoke; not of the law, but of Christ. "Take my yoke upon you, learn of me." I wonder sometimes how many of us, even those of us who have long worn the harness, fully estimate our relationships, and live correspondingly! May not this manifest dereliction come from a too confident trust in creature self, thus virtually ignoring the guiding power of him in whom we live, move, and have our being, and who is not far from every one of us? If the thought expressed by Hagar in her wandering experience—"Thou God seest me"—and also the proverb—"The ways of man are before the eyes of the Lord, and he pondereth all his goings"—I say if these thoughts had the hold upon us they should, we would be more apt to "watch unto prayer," i. e., in our prayers we are not as slow to speak as we should be; and often, feelingly, ask for guidance and preparation of heart, and deliverance, and support under trial; and having said all this and more too, we turn around, and forget what we have asked for, and go on believing we are fully able to direct our own steps, while in our prayers we have said, "Oh, Lord, direct my thoughts; guide my feet; be a present help in time of need; save me from worldly-mindedness; a loving of this present world which is evil; give me an enlarged view of thy character as shown in the person of my dear Lord," and so on to the end of the chapter. Alas! how often do we find those who ask the most, do the least; and when approached and asked to help along the "blessed cause" by contribution for the support of the preached word, or for the dissemination of light-bearing tracts, or support of a weekly paper laden with choice thoughts, made so by wise selection on the part of the editor—such persons will tell you they have no faith in such means, and show their faith, and want of it, by their works, or want of work. "Go work in my vineyard," was not put in the Book without a significance, and as "wisdom is justified of all her children," what, dear brethren, is our position? Are we her children? If so, then we love her ways, and they are peace—not vain jangling, an everlasting struggle for mastery, forgetting that one is your Master—Christ.

If—and oh how much hangs on that little word! If we are not our own whose are we? If we are sayers and not doers, what then? "Know ye not," said the apostle, "ye are not your own; ye are bought with a price." What then, are we at liberty even to use our body as we please? can we live godly, righteously, in this present world, professing to be looking for the realization of the blessed hope, and at the same time have full swing in the enjoyment of the things that perish with their using?

Now, while I am fully aware our Lord never established any system called monasticism; neither do I believe he ever gave countenance thereto. On the contrary, his prayer was, "I pray not that thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from the evil." Yes, this is it; he, knowing as he did, "what was in man," knew his readiness to depart from the living God, and Christ prayed. Yes, Christ Jesus prayed for his believing people. And when I read John xvii., and look abroad and at home, I ask, Is this prayer being answered? and if so, am I blind that I cannot see afar off, or near at home? And I again ask, What is the matter? Has "love of the truth," as it is termed, shut up bowels of compassion? Has this "love of the truth" made us draw lines of disfellowship, and virtually say, My doxy is orthodoxy?

Let us advocate sound words that cannot be gainsaid. Stick close to the word. "Let God be true." And as we have not followed cunningly devised fables in believing "all things written in the law of Moses, and in the Psalms and Prophets," let us beware how we call any man rabbi, and unknowing, it may be, fall into this pit which has swallowed many an one. All of which is submitted in love.

EL MAHDI'S MOVEMENTS.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Dec. 19.—Reports from the Soudan state that El Mahdi, with his forces is moving in a westerly direction from El Obeid.

OLIPHANT SKETCHES.—Second Series. Number 39.

THE LAND OF HAMATH.

Emerging from the glen, in which the city stands, we find ourselves in an open undulating plain, bleak and bare. A patch of grain here, a shepherd and his flock yonder, and a party of Arab horsemen hovering on the horizon, are the only objects that break the monotony of the dreary ride across it. The little excitement of danger one almost feels to be a relief here. Shade there is none, and green grass, except it happen to be the spring season, is nowhere seen. The Orontes is hid in its deep bed some miles to the eastward.

Three hours sharp riding along the line of an old Roman highway brings us again to the brow of a ravine, and looking down the steep, rugged bank, we see the yellow river shooting along far below, between rows of willows that stoop to kiss its murmuring waters. A bridge of ten arches, and bearing the marks of Roman, Saracen, and Turkish architects, spans the channel. Crossing it and clambering up the southern bank, we stand amid the ruins of Arethusa, an ancient episcopal city. Traces of walls, and gates, and streets and churches, and fields surrounding them are here, all now ruined and forsaken.

After wandering for a time among the ruins I discovered a poor gipsy crouching in terror beneath a shattered wall. He was the only living being in Arethusa, and his tale was sad enough. The day before he was rich and happy, the head of a numerous family and of an attached tribe. Now he was alone, and a beggar. The tents of his people had been pitched on the banks of the Orontes; their camels and goats were feeding on the plain. A troop of Anezeh came suddenly upon them and swept them all away, camels, goats, tents, women, children. He with his two sons escaped by plunging into the river and swimming across. His sons were on the track of the plunderers, and he was lurking here in the hope of being able during the night to effect the release of his family, and perhaps also to recover his flocks or a sufficient equivalent. Property is as insecure still on the borders of the Arabian desert as it was in the days of Job. Job i. 14, 15.

About three miles east of Arethusa is the little village of Zifrun, probably identical with Ziphron, which Moses mentions as one of the border cities of "the promised land." Num. xxxiv. 9.

I was anxious to visit the village, so as to make a full survey of the northern "marshes;" but the Anezeh were reported to be encamped near it, and the whole plain was scoured by their horsemen. My servants and guide refused to accompany me. They even refused to travel to Hums by the east bank of the river, for they said the Arabs would see and plunder us. There is a path along the west bank, but it is very long and very bad, and I determined not to take it whatever might happen. Seeing that arguments were vain, and that the sun was getting low, I spurred my horse and dashed away along the direct route. My servants reluctantly followed. We met only two Anezeh cavaliers, and they thought it prudent to let us pass. The mucrrin was calling the "faithful" to evening prayers when we entered the gate of Emesa.

EMESA.

The Arab Hums, and Roman Emesa, has little of historical or antiquarian interest to attract the traveller. It is a clean, compact, bustling town of twenty thousand inhabitants, surrounded by old walls barely sufficient to repel a sudden foray of Bedawin. It was celebrated in classic times for a magnificent temple dedicated to the Syrian sungod, whose priests were princes of the land. One of them became Roman emperor, and is usually called by the name of his deity, Elagabalus. Emesa was unknown in history before the days of Strabo; but it is just possible that it may be identical with the Biblical Zobah, which was situated between Hamath and Damascus, 1 Kings xi. 23; 1 Chron. xviii. 8; and which King David conquered when endeavoring to gain for Israel the whole land embraced in the Abrahamic covenant. Such I take to be the meaning of 2 Sam. viii. 3: "David smote also Hadadezer, son of Rehob, king of Zobah, as he went to recover his border at the river Euphrates." Compare Gen. xv. 18.

Not a vestige of Roman Emesa is now visible except a few marble and granite columns scattered about the streets, and built up in the modern walls. The mound on which the citadel, and probably also the temple, once stood, is like an immense rubbish heap, and reminds one of the mounds of Nineveh and Babylon. Like them it might richly repay the labor of excavation. There are many other similar mounds on the neighboring plain. This measures a quarter of a mile in circuit, and upwards of a hundred feet in height. From its summit I got a commanding view of the "land of Hamath." It is a vast plain, stretching on the east and north to the horizon, and shut in on the south and west by mountain ridges. It embraces a circuit not less than fifty miles in diameter; and through it from north to south winds the Orontes. A short distance west of Emesa is Bahr Khadeh, a lake eight miles long, partly, if not entirely artificial, formed by the great dam drawn across the bed of the river. The water thus raised is conducted by canals to the gardens and orchards of the town.

What a noble plain must this have been in the days of Syria's prosperity! Teeming with an industrious population; studded with towns and villages whose sites are now marked by shapeless mounds. A rich soil, abundant water, a genial clime—"all the gifts that heaven and earth impart"—are here. But they are all wasted. The land or Hamath is desolate; the cities of Zobah are forsaken.

"THE ENTRANCE OF HAMATH."

Standing on the top of the ruined citadel, I saw on the western side of the plain a great opening or pass through the mountains. On its southern side the ridge of Lebanon rises abruptly to a height of ten thousand feet; and on its northern, the lower ridge of Bargylus terminates in a bluff promontory. Between the two lies the only opening from the land of Hamath to the coast of the Mediterranean. This is unquestionably "the entrance of Hamath," mentioned repeatedly by the sacred writers as one of the landmarks on the northern border. "This," said Moses, "shall be your north border. From the great sea ye shall point out for you Mount Hor. From Mount Hor ye shall point out your border unto the entrance of Hamath." Num. xxxiv. 7, 8.

Afterwards, both went sailing along the Syrian coast, and when standing on the plain of Phœnicia, I saw, with still more distinctness, this remarkable pass. I saw then how graphic was the description of Moses. He states that the western border of the land was "the great sea." Then he adds, "From the great sea (the Mediterranean) ye shall point out for you Mount Hor." The Hebrew is Hôr-hahar, "the mountain of the mountain;" that is, emphatically, "the great mountain." It was there before me—the majestic northern peak of Lebanon, the loftiest mountain in Syria; its glittering crown encircled by a halo of silvery clouds.

"From Mount Hor ye shall point out your border unto the entrance of Hamath," that is "the entrance" from the great sea. There is but one, and it cannot be mistaken. That pass between Lebanon and Bargylus is the only opening from the coast into the land of Hamath. I have been told that to this day it is called by the people of Tripoly Bab Hamah, "the door of Hamath."

From "the entrance" the border line was drawn northeast toward the city of Hamath; then south-east by Ziphron, Zedad, and Hazar-enan. Num. xxxiv. 8, 9. Ziphron we have already seen in the distance; and we shall now visit the other two.—J. L. Porter.

EVERLASTING LIFE; WHAT IS IT? AND HOW MAY MEN GAIN IT?

PART II.

The word translated "Everlasting Life," however, (as some people do) as simply a figure of speech meaning Everlasting Happiness, and to teach ignorant persons that Everlasting Life and Everlasting Happiness are one and the same thing—because the immortality of every man is already presupposed as a natural endowment—is a gross perversion of the real meaning of words; and consequently, gives a colorable pretext for charging upon such persons that they handle the word of God deceitfully. Such an attempt to tone down the meaning of the word "life" probably would never have been thought of, had not the notion that God created human beings an immortal race, necessitated the giving a figurative meaning to the words Everlasting Life, because their creed forbade acceptance in a literal sense of such terms as Perishing, Destruction, Second Death, &c., when applied by Holy Scripture to the wicked amongst men.

Now, if "Everlasting Life" means a continuity of existence in a glorified immortal body (after the Resurrection to Life) for the believer in Christ only, —as contrasted with our Lord's reference to perishing, in the case of the unsaved—one can see at a glance why the Savior so persistently used these specific words:—but if all men are by nature immortal, then his almost exclusive use of the words "Life," and "Eternal Life," in relation to the "gift of God," is both obscure and unappreciable. If that which he so frequently held out as a privilege to men of faith was already the heritage, be it for weal or woe, of the whole human race, it would seem that the words Everlasting Happiness would have expressed his meaning much more clearly; but the fact remains that no less than 37 times he called the blessing he had to give "Life," and not once did he speak of it as Happiness. Surely it is much more rational to believe that Jesus Christ intended what he so repeatedly said, than to make him say what the words do not mean—just that men may hug the unwarrantable notion that all the abominable and spiritually-loathsome members of our race are stamped with the seal of Immortality.

However, let us proceed to enquire whether the Lord Jesus Christ really meant what the words "Everlasting Life" naturally express; or whether the general teaching of the Bible in relation to the Immortality of the whole race is so abundant and decisive, that we are in consequence thereof shut up to the necessity of attaching a figurative meaning to the words. If the Bible positively declares that God has created all men to continue in being for ever, we must, of course reverently receive the doctrine, and admit that the words Everlasting Life really do not refer to Life at all, but rather to a pleasing feature of Life, viz., Happiness;—but if the Bible does not declare that God created all men with natures that are indissoluble, and especially if it does declare that some men will not continue for ever, the doctrine of inherent Immortality sinks at once to mere traditional dogma, no more worthy of veneration than other dogmas which for a time have borne rule in the world, and then perished because they were not of the truth.

That millions of men (especially in Europe and America) assume Immortality to be either a Birthright or a Birthgift appertaining to all the human family, I am well aware; but what proof can be given that this tremendous assumption has a rock-foundation to rest upon? Whenever I have asked men to lay bare the basis on which their asseverations of Immortality rest, either they could not find the basis, and remained speechless, or referred to something which was no proof of Immortality at all; which shows how little they have ever thought about the matter. True, some men have longings for an endless existence,—on earth, as long as they can possibly stay, and after that, in heaven—and others hastily conclude that they must be Immortal because the capabilities of human spirits are seen to be so much greater than the capabilities of those spirits which belong to animals; but in determining a matter of such high importance as this, mere longings and conjectures cannot be allowed to have much weight or value. We must have a much stronger foundation than this on which to rest so mighty a conception. Turning away from all conflicting human opinion and statements, what saith the word of God? Unconditional Immortality, Conditional Immortality, or No Immortality, at all, must be decided upon according to its teachings alone; for Science and Reason cannot help us here. The subject is too high for them; consequently their verdicts are not worth the paper on which they are recorded.

Well, what is the doctrine of the Holy Scriptures? They allude to the spirit of man hundreds of times, and if man's spirit is naturally immortal, surely some of the Prophets and Apostles will tell us so. I should not be likely to refer several hundred times to the ocean without intimating that its waters are salt; may I not therefore confidently expect that if the human spirit is naturally ever-living, that I shall find this plainly stated in some of the very numerous instances in which man's spirit is referred to in the Holy Scriptures. On the other hand, if it is not naturally Immortal, there will not be any allusion to its natural Immortality—just as there is nothing said about man's Omniscience, for the simple reason that man is not omniscient.

Be it known then, as a matter of fact, that the Holy Scriptures say nothing concerning man's natural Immortality. Nay, so far from this, they speak of the ungodly portion of the race "perishing in their own corruption;" (2 Peter ii. 12)—of being "burnt up like chaff;" (Matt. iii. 12) —of being "punished with everlasting destruction;" (2 Thess. i. 9)—of undergoing a "second death;" (Rev. xxi. 8)—and of the fear men should have of God, because "He is able, after having killed the body, to destroy both body and spirit in hell" (Matt. x. 28). Indeed so far is the Bible from admitting that the children of men are possessed of inherent endless life, it calls them "mortal men;" describes them in the aggregate as the "small dust of the balance;" proclaims that "at their best estate they are altogether vanity;" and even applies to them such terms as 'worms,' 'grasshoppers,' and 'vipers,'—terms strangely at variance, one cannot help thinking, with the respect due to a mighty race of fourteen hundred millions of high beings, many of whom are fond of reminding us that they will "endure as long as God himself shall endure." Should it be said —as sometimes is said—that all these humiliating terms refer to men's bodies, and not to their spirits, I reply —God, when referring to man, is not in the habit of drawing fine distinctions touching his nature; he simply addresses him, or alludes to him, as man. No doubt it is reasoning to the feelings of one who imagines that he has a deathless spirit to be told that he is a "worm;"—that "if live after the flesh he shall —and that he is involved in "the bondage of corruption,"—but until a man is begotten to Immortality by the blessed process of Regeneration, who is he that he should dare to take God's words concerning a race under condemnation, and upon the strength of a proofless notion arbitrarily determining this word of God can only refer to my body; whilst that must be confined in its meaning to my spirit. Indeed, as if to discourage man's assumption of endless existence, the Holy Spirit moved St. Paul to write of God—"King of kings, and Lord of lords; he who only hath Immortality." (1 Tim. vi. 16.)

It is quite true that the Bible reveals, and very frequently alludes to, Immortality for men of faith and love; but that is a very different thing from race Immortality. The Everlasting Life spoken of in the Scriptures is a privileged Immortality, and is specifically declared to be a "free gift" bestowed upon believers only, on account of their connection with the Lord Jesus Christ by faith; (see Romans vi. 23) whilst the Lord Jesus himself distinctly announces that the object of his Incarnation was that men, through faith in him, might be preserved from perishing, and obtain "Everlasting Life." The Apostle John's words also bear directly upon this point. He says "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself; and this is the witness;—that God hath given to us (Christ-refuged ones) Everlasting Life, and this Life is in his Son. He that hath the Son, hath the Life; but he that hath not the Son hath not the Life." Again, "This is the promise that He himself promised us; even the Everlasting Life." (1st John, ii. 25.)

How this "Everlasting Life," which St. Paul calls a "free Gift" to believers in Christ Jesus; and which St. John calls "a promise" of God made to his saints, can be interpreted in any other sense than as teaching a Conditional Immortality—the survival of those who are fit to live—is to me a matter of no small wonder.

Having pointed out the natural and obvious meaning of the words "The Everlasting Life," I should like now to move on to a consideration of the enquiry—How can it be secured? but I quit the subject without taking some notice of the arguments by which race Immortality is generally supported, it might be said that I had fired my broadside and steamed away immediately, lest I should be demolished by a broadside in return. As I have not the slightest fear of any material damage that can be done to the ship I call in by the only kind of guns I have hitherto seen fired against it, —and I suppose there are no better ones on board or they would surely have been used—let us see what kind of shot their guns are loaded with. So far as my observation has extended, believers in race Immortality as opposed to believers in conditional Immortality, rest their belief of the doctrine on one or other of the following grounds;—1st, Man long for it; 2nd, God having created such a splendid piece of workmanship as the human spirit, they cannot conceive it to be at all probable that he would ever destroy it;—and 3rd The inference from certain passages of Holy Scripture that all human spirits must be Immortal.

As to the argument that longing for Immortality proves that man possess it, I think that it proves the opposite; for that which a man hath, why doth he yet long for? But, as a matter of fact, if we take the race as a race, it is simply not true that man longs for Immortality. A few philosophers may do so; wealthy men and others, unto whom the lines have fallen in pleasant places, may do so; and all true Christians do so; but after nearly forty years constant and close contract with men both in England and Bengal, I declare my conviction that the bulk of the human race do not long for endless life. Millions upon millions of orthodox Hindoos so far from longing for a perpetuation of individual life, regard life as a weary and unbearable condition, and long to get away from consciousness altogether, and be re-absorbed in the essence of God. And in European lands also, the large masses of the poor, and the overburdened in spirit from a thousand causes, who have but little happiness here, and who are conscious that their spiritual condition is such that it warrants no hope of any at all hereafter, do not long for Immortality. Conscious that they have not done what God expects from them; having no heart to do it; and yet fearful of the consequences of not having done it, the majority of this wretched class of our world's inhabitants, would gladly, if they could, end their being at death, and escape all the aftercome of the resurrection to judgment. And even if it could be proved that a large majority of the human race do exceedingly long for immortality, a much larger majority long for wealth, or for what wealth can give. If intense longing for a thing brings it within reach, why do not all the longers for wealth get wealth? That they do not, we well know. Why then should simple longers for immortality expect to obtain immortality? Of course all true Christians long for it; and they will get it; not, however, upon the ground that they longed for it, but because having fled for refuge to Jesus Christ, it was bestowed upon them as a boon; a mark of God's favor towards them because they laid "hold of the hope set before them in the gospel."—*W. The Royal Star.

MRS. F. L. BALLARD.

Long time the earth was deaf and heaven was dumb,
Nor voice nor speech was heard, but now was come
The fullness of the time, when the clearest Word
Should manifest to men the love of God.

The whole creation thrilled with strong desire;
The hearts of earnest men burned as with holy fire;
A solemn expectation brooded in the air,
A hush of hope, an eager waiting everywhere.

When suddenly in Eastern lands afar
A sign from heaven, a new and wondrous star
Shined forth, and shining thus, proclaimed the birth
Of a new light and joy to all the earth.

Grave magi wise in all Chaldean lore
Wondered, believed, and hastened to adore.
With reverent faith went forth to seek afar
The one true star heralded by royal star.

Divinely guided on their toilsome way
Led by the star at night, by faith each day,
They reach the palace of the careless king,
And seek his face with eager questioning.

Where is the King new come from heaven to earth?
A shining star proclaimed to us his birth;
We come, obedient, from far distant lands,
And bring him gifts and treasures in our hands.

The only answers that their questions meet
Are mocking words of crafty cold deceit.
They turn away with footsteps sad and slow,
When shining out with added brightness, lo!

They see the star, that lighted all their way,
Pass on and rest above the place where lay
A little child asleep upon its mother's breast;
Most tender ending to a weary quest.

Earth's wisdom worshipped heaven's innocence,
And offered gifts, myrrh, gold, and frankincense;
And sweeter treasure still to heaven's sight
Paid humble reverence, joined with pure delight.

The magi warned of God went on their homeward way:
Gone is the star that shone with dazzling ray
And hung in rapture over Bethlehem's plain.
The infant king is gone, but there remain

For us the light and joy and peace,
Of his dominion that shall still increase.
The "Bright and Morning Star" shines far and wide,
Jesus! we hail thee King this happy Christmas tide!

A man once took a piece of white cloth to a dyer, to have it dyed black. He was so pleased with the result, that, after a time, he went back to him with a piece of black cloth, and asked to have it dyed white. But the dyer answered; "A piece of cloth is like a man's reputation; it can be dyed black, but it cannot be made white again."

A Word to Little Girls.

Who is lovely? It is the little girl who drops sweet words, kind remarks, and pleasant smiles as she passes along; who has a kind word of sympathy for every girl or boy she meets in trouble, and a kind hand to help her companions out of difficulty; who never scolds, never contends, never teases her mother, nor seeks in any way to diminish, but always to increase her happiness. Would it not please you to pick up a string of pearls, drops of gold, diamonds, or precious stones which can never be lost. Take the hand of the friendless. Smile on the sad and dejected. Sympathize with those in trouble. Strive everywhere to diffuse around you sunshine and joy. If you do this, you will be sure to be beloved.

The Mother Blessed by her Little Child.

A lady who had charge of young persons not of kindred blood, became, on one occasion, perplexed with regard to her duty. She retired to her own room to meditate, and being grieved in spirit, laid her head upon a table, and wept bitterly. She scarcely perceived her little daughter, seated quietly in a corner. Unable longer to bear the sight of her mother's distress, she stole softly to her side, and taking her hand in both of her own, said:

"Mamma, once you taught me a pretty hymn:

'If ere you meet with trials,
Or troubles on the way,
Then cast your care on Jesus,
And don't forget to pray.'"

The counsel of the little monitor was taken, and relief came. The mother was repaid for rightly training her child by having her become her blessed teacher.

"Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings God hath ordained praise."

JERUSALEM, Nov. 13, 1883.

Dear Children:

I want to tell my little friends something about Jerusalem, the very city where our dear Savior suffered so much and was crucified. I can see this moment from my window the Vale of Ollion and its pools. There was once a scene of great joy enacted here when Solomon was anointed King of Israel. It was here that they brought him on David's mule. Here was he anointed amid the blowing of the trumpets and the cheers of the people, "God save King Solomon!" and here he was followed by the people who "piped with pipes, and rejoiced with great joy, so that the city rang and the earth rent with the sound of them." And often as I gaze from my window looking into the mazes of the future and speculate on the idea of such a scene again gladdening the Vale of Ollion when Jerusalem shall again become a royal city under an anointed King.

This morning I was called to my door to witness a funeral procession passing. There were four flags carried before, also large palm branches; then came the hired mourners singing a mournful dirge. Then came the corpse followed by a large train of men and boys, but no women. I suppose that some great sheik had died and made inquiry, but found that the man who had died was only the son of a sheik and simply a baker by profession.

I have told you in a former letter something of the useful camel, and promised to write about the donkey. There is very little to say about this little animal, except that he is as much used as the camel and his appearance always strikes me as the essence of modesty. Poor creature, it works uncomplainingly, and yet it is the most despised of all animals; children are allowed to play their tricks upon it, and it is abused by servants. This speaks very little for our appreciation of the gentle and useful. The name of the donkey in Arabic is himmar, camel is jemill, horse hassan, sheep hairoof. If we wish to buy mutton we ask, Fee mim hairoof, Have you mutton? The sun is shemps, the moon cummer, wind hawar. If I go out and meet a friend, she says, "When he rah, shimel hower?" In English this means "Where are you going, to swell the wind?"

I am sure my little friends would be charmed to see the fields literally covered with crocuses, pink and white, so very beautiful. I was out the other day picking a basketful of these lovely flowers, when two boys came up and said, "Halizona sitte." I could not imagine what they wanted, so I went up to them and found they had a bag full of snails which they wished me to buy. I replied, "Ana mush ak et hallzone." They evidently thought me a Greek lady, as it is now a fast by the Greeks and they cannot eat meat, and eat the snails instead. I shall bid you adieu for the present, and hope to chat with you often if the Lord will.

WORKERS IN ONE VINEYARD.

We are workers in one vineyard,
Some are strong, and some are weak:
But the calling of the Master
Is the common joy we seek.
Some must train the vine and prune it,
Some must stoop to dress the mould;
But the few can pluck the clusters
In the autumn's haze and gold.

We are builders, and the temple
Rises slowly day by day;
Some must lay the polished corners,
Some the brick of heavy clay.
Only one can place the cap-stone
On the summit grand and high,
While the shout of "Grace unto it,"
Rises to the vaulted sky.

We are fighting in the battle,
But we cannot all command:
Most of us must march as rankers,
Forward like a soldier band.
Fame is not the hero's blessing,
But the sense of duty done;
Life and treasure all are ventured
Ere the victory is won.

Golden prizes lie before us,
And the race is open now:
Not the swift alone are victors,
Wearing crowns upon their brow;
For the lame and halt ones running
Into both promised reach a goal;
O my poor and weary brother,
Thou shalt be a victor soul.

Let the blessed kingdom hasten,
When the will of God shall be
Exemplified the law and pleasure
Of his people glad and free.
Would we strive to be the greatest,
Let us then be servants all,
God has crowns and Jewels waiting
For the lowly and the small.

The Four Great Dispensations; or, a Prophetico-Historical View of the Work of Redemption.

THE GOSPEL DISPENSATION.

"When the fulness of the time came, God sent forth his Son, born of a woman, born under the law, that he might redeem them which were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons." Gal. iv. 4, 5, R. V.

The expression, "his Son" should rather be "his own Son," according to the emphatic force of the Greek ton huhyon heauton. And there is a richness of import in the contrast here between the Savior's sonship and ours,—he was a "born" Son, we are "adopted" sons.

At the birth of Christ both Jews and Gentiles were in the utmost need of "the times of reformation" which he was about to introduce. Among the Jews a Pharasaical tendency to hypocrisy and human tradition threatened to extinguish true religion, while over the Gentile mind, in spite of human philosophy, there brooded an ever-increasing darkness unrelieved by the slightest gleam of well-grounded hope concerning a future life. Thus the Gentile philosophers by their wisdom "knew not God," and the Jewish rabbins by their traditions were "making void his commandments." The great Redeemer's coming was not directly after the fall, but "in the fulness of time" required by prophecy, and when the deadly leprosy of sin spreading over the social, political, and moral world had fully demonstrated man's inability to save himself, and his desperate need of a Savior. Just at this crisis of the world's history, when all experiments had failed, and hope was giving place to black despair, "the Light of the world" commenced its shining.

The birth of our blessed Savior was an event the importance of which language is too poor to describe. Even among the Gentiles there was a widespread expectation that some illustrious personage was about to appear. Exactly according to the sure word of prophecy, the Son of God was born of the Shamitic division of mankind, of the race of Abraham, of the tribe of Judah, of the family of David, of a virgin of that family, and in the town of Bethlehem.

"And there were in the same country shepherds abiding in the field, keeping their flock by night. And, lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them: and they were sore afraid. And the angel said unto them, Fear not; for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Savior, which is Christ the Lord. And this shall be a sign unto you: Ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger. And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God, and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men. And it came to pass, as the angels were gone away from them into heaven, the shepherds said one to another, Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, and see this thing which is come to pass, which the Lord hath made known unto us." Luke ii. 8–15. Then also, shortly after the visit of the shepherds, "There came wise men from the east to Jerusalem, saying, Where is he that is born King of the Jews? for we have seen his star in the east, and are come to worship him." Mat. ii. 1, 2.

This inquiry "troubled" Herod, who [illegible] the Jewish people, and so, after a great assembly of the chief priests and scribes had informed him that Bethlehem was the town "where the Christ should be born," he said to the wise men, "Go and search diligently for the young child; and when ye have found him, bring me word again that I may come and worship him also." And having found the infant Savior, "They fell down and worshipped him; and when they had opened their treasures, they presented unto him gifts; gold, and frankincense, and myrrh. And being warned of God in a dream that they should not return to Herod, they departed into their own country another way. And when they were departed, behold the angel of the Lord appeareth to Joseph in a dream, saying, Arise, and take the young child and his mother, and flee into Egypt, and be thou there until I bring thee word; for Herod will seek the young child to destroy him. When he arose, he took the young child and his mother by night, and departed into Egypt." But when the bloody and deceitful Herod was dead, Joseph, under the divine guidance, returned from Egypt with the young child and his mother, and dwelt about seventy miles north of Jerusalem in a lovely mountain city called Nazareth, "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, He shall be called a Nazarene." His life, from the time of entering Nazareth until he was twelve years old, is very briefly described—"And the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom; and the grace of God was upon him." Luke ii. 40.

At twelve, however, we have this delightful fragment—a foreglean of his subsequent ministry among men: "And when he was twelve years old, they went up to Jerusalem, after the custom of the feast. And when they had fulfilled the days, as they returned, the child Jesus tarried behind in Jerusalem; and Joseph and his mother knew not of it. But they, supposing him to have been in the company, went a day's journey; and they sought him among their kinsfolk and acquaintance. And when they found him not, they turned back again to Jerusalem, seeking him. And it came to pass, that after three days they found him in the temple, sitting in the midst of the doctors, both hearing them and asking them questions. And all that heard him were astonished at his understanding and answers. And when they saw him they were amazed; and his mother said unto him, Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing. And he said unto them, How is it that ye sought me? wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business? And they understood not the saying which he spake unto them. And he went down with them, and came to Nazareth, and was subject unto them; and his mother kept all these sayings in her heart. And Jesus grew in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man." Luke ii. 42–52.

Thenceforth, for about eighteen years, we hear no more of that sacred life till the beginning of his public ministry.

John, of the family of Aaron, was the prophetic harbinger announcing that ministry, as Isaiah had said, "The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight." Mat. iii. 3; Isa. xl. 3. In the Hebrew of this quotation from Isaiah, the word "Lord" is "Jehovah." Compare this with Mal. iii. 1, where, in speaking of John, "the Lord (Jehovah) of hosts" said, "He shall prepare the way before me." This indicates that it was "Jehovah," as manifested in Christ, before whom John was to go as a herald to announce his approach and a pioneer to prepare his way. The Savior says, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father," and John says, "No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him." John i. 18; xiv. 9. There is complete harmony here, for the Son is the manifestation of the Father. And in what way, except in his own person, could the Father more perfectly manifest himself to us than in his only begotten Son who is "the effulgence of his glory, and the very image of his substance," and in whom "dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." Heb. i. 3; Col. ii. 9, R. V.

Shortly after John's ministry began, the blessed Savior himself appeared on the banks of the Jordan, having come from Nazareth to be baptised of John. And here by Father, Son, and Spirit, great honor is placed on the ordinance of baptism, out there under the canopy of heaven, for when the Son had come up out of the water, and while praying, the Holy Spirit descended upon him, and the Father, speaking from heaven, said, "Thou art my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased." Luke iii. 21, 22. Then, after coming victorious out of the temptation in the wilderness, the Lord Jesus began the great work of preaching "the gospel of the kingdom of God." Mat. ix. 35; Mark. i. 14; Luke xiii. 1. This is the only true and ecclesiastical gospel, for "this gospel of the kingdom is what the Lord Jesus himself preached in Palestine, and commanded the apostles to preach "in all the world," and a repeated curse is pronounced against either man or angel who shall dare to "preach any other gospel." Mat. xxiv. 14; Gal. i. 8, 9. Therefore, let those mistaken souls beware who go about founding societies, denominations, and "churches," on creeds that omit and stop short of "the gospel of the kingdom." If Moses had shattered the tables of the law into a thousand fragments, and as many Jews had seized each on one of those fragments and founded a sect upon it, claiming that it was the whole law, the claim would hardly have been more absurd than that of some in these days who, losing sight of that beautiful and complete system of truth called "the gospel of the kingdom," seize upon some isolated fragment of that system, such as "the advent is premillennial," or "immortality is conditional," or "baptism is immersion," or "baptism is for the remission of sins," and on each of these fragments, with zealous contention, found a separate society that claims to have that one "faith of the gospel" for which the Lord commanded us to strive. Phil. i. 27.

And now let us contemplate the wisdom, power, and sublimity of the great Redeemer's wonderful ministry, which was coupled with a life of spotless perfection that strikes us with sacred awe! Observe his poignant retorts, his lucid expositions of Scripture, his comprehensive statements of doctrine, his peerless parables! Hearers exclaimed, "Never man spake like this man." Crowds attended his preaching, "very attentive to hear him," and "wondering at the gracious words that fell from his lips," "the words of eternal life." The miraculous fact that prophecies uttered centuries before were fulfilled in him, proved his doctrine divine. But in addition to this he had the testimony of greater miracles than even Moses, or any of the other prophets had wrought, so that beholders exclaimed, "It was never so seen in Israel."

But foes were plotting against his life, and after about three and a half years from the beginning of his ministry, they succeeded in having him crucified. And so he died a sacrifice "for our sins." Mosaic sacrifices were fulfilled in their antitype, and the veil of the temple rent in twain.

Then, after three days, occurred the most wonderful event since the fall of man—the crucified Redeemer burst the bars of death, rose triumphant o'er the tomb, and seized eternal youth. It is almost impossible to exaggerate the importance of this event, for "if Christ hath not been raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins." 1 Cor. xv. 17, R. V. But his resurrection is attested "by many infallible proofs," while its denial rests upon such absurdities as that which the council of chief priests and elders put into the mouths of the Roman guard, "Say ye, His disciples came by night, and stole him away while we slept." If asleep, how could they know and how dare they depose that the disciples had stolen him away? Mat. xxviii. 13; Acts i. 3; x. 41; 1 Cor. xv. 4–8.

It should never be forgotten that the kingdom of God was the earliest and the latest theme of the Redeemer's teaching on earth, for after his resurrection he continued "appearing unto them by the space of forty days, and speaking the things concerning the kingdom of God." Acts i. 3, R. V. The Greek for "concerning the kingdom of God" is peri tees basileias tou Theou, and the same Greek phrase occurs again in describing what Philip and Paul preached. See Acts viii. 12; xix. 8. On the preaching of Paul in Ephesus, (Acts xix. 8), Matthew Henry makes this very significant and true remark, "He opened the Scriptures which spake of this, gave them a right notion of this kingdom, and showed them their mistakes about it." To which I would add that, thousands in these days need "a right notion" of that kingdom, and to be shown "their mistakes about it." Now, if Christ, Philip, and Paul, constantly preached "concerning the kingdom of God," did not all the apostles do the same, and should not we also?

At the end of forty days after the resurrection, occurred a most affecting, sublime and solemn scene. The risen Savior, having assembled his chosen apostles on the Mount of Olives, "lifted up his hands and blessed them. And it came to pass while he blessed them, he was parted from them, and carried up into heaven.....And while they looked stedfastly toward heaven as he went up, behold two men stood by them in white apparel; which also said, Ye men of Galilee why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Luke xxiv. 50, 51; Acts i. 10, 11.

And here, at the close of our Lord's ministry, where the church loses sight of him, I would pause to remark that many in modern times have undertaken to write "the life of Christ," and Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, have written that life in a style which for beauty, brevity, force, and comprehensiveness, never can be equaled by the pen of uninspired man.

About ten days after the ascension of our Lord the Holy Spirit came down, and the apostolic ministry began "at Jerusalem." Afterwards the gospel was carried into Judea, Samaria, and the remote parts of the earth, agreeably to the Savior's words, "This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world." Accordingly we find Paul, thirty years after, saying that it had been "preached to every creature which is under heaven," —"Their sound went into all the earth and their words unto the ends of the world," Col. i. 23; Rom. x. 18. Eusebius, born in Palestine about A. D. 270, says: "The doctrine of the Savior, like the rays of the sun, quickly irradiated the whole world. Presently, in accordance with divine prophecy, the sound of his inspired evangelists and apostles had gone throughout all the earth, and their words to the end of the world." Eccl. Hist. B II., ch. 3.

Many circumstances providentially prepared the way for this. The apostles had the gift of tongues to speak, and of miracles to confirm their message. The chief nations of Europe, Asia, and Africa, were enchained in peace by the strong bonds of one common government. This greatly fostered friendly intercommunication in commerce, arts and literature; but especially was it subservient to the glorious and rapid spread of the gospel, and the planting of churches in all parts of the world. The splendid military roads of the empire led to the open doors of the synagogue. Thus the soldiers of Cæsar had become road shoppers for the soldiers of Christ, and the synagogue a standing protest against the pagan temple.

The committing of the New Testament to writing also greatly promoted the promulgation of the gospel of the kingdom; for copies were multiplied and extensively circulated, so that believers were enabled not only to "have these things constantly in remembrance," but also in the Lord's merciful providence, to transmit them to us.

That was a joyful sight—great multitudes of the heathen "turning from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God." Not all the tyranny of the civil magistrate, the bigotry of the Jew, and the subtlety of the Gentile philosopher, could silence or suppress that divine message which "is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." Rom. i. 16. From Jordan to Patmos—from the time when John the Baptist began his preaching till John the beloved disciple wrote the Apocalypse—was a bright period.

As here ends the personal ministry of the apostles, a few remarks concerning them will not be out of place. The word apostle is from the Greek apostolos, "one sent with commands or a message." It was by the Lord himself that certain chosen disciples were "named apostles." Luke vi. 13. The following qualifications were essential to their office:

1. They must have seen the Lord, and been eye and ear witnesses of what they testified to the world. John xv. 27; 1 Cor. ix. 1; 1 John i. 3. This is laid down as an essential requisite in the choice of one that was to succeed Judas. Acts i. 21, 22.

2. They must have been endowed with infallible inspiration, causing their doctrine to be received along with "the other Scriptures" as the word of God, and as the standard by which to discern between truth and error. John xvi. 13; 1 Thess. ii. 13; 1 John iv. 6; Ephes. ii. 20; 2 Pet. iii. 2, 16.

3. As credentials of their apostolic mission they must have been empowered to work miracles for the confirmation of their doctrine. Acts i. 8; 2 Cor. xii. 11, 13; Heb. ii. 4.

From this it is evident that there are no literal successors of the apostles, and that the only apostolic succession which we can aspire to is to cherish the faith and practice which the apostles have taught in their writings.

From the death of the apostles till the political downfall of old Roman paganism, the gospel of the kingdom made rapid progress in the world, and believers were greatly multiplied. Shortly after John's death, Pliny, the heathen governor of Bithynia, in complaining against Christianity to the Emperor Trajan, says it "Has spread over not only cities, but villages and the country," and that "many of every age, rank and sex, are being brought to trial." B. X., Ep. 97. And Tertullian, about A. D. 200, in his address to the rulers of the Roman empire, says, "We are but of yesterday, and we have filled every place among you—cities, islands, fortresses, towns, market-places, the very camp, tribes, companies, palace, senate, forum—we have left nothing to you but the temples of your gods.....It is the immense number of Christians which makes your enemies so few, almost all the inhabitants of your various cities being followers of Christ." Apologetic. cap. 37.

In the early part of the fourth century, however, the victories of Constantine over the pagan party, heaped on the church a worldly splendor that hastened the great apostasy which in the seventh century ripened into Popery. So that the gospel in losing a pagan gained a papal foe. If Christianity had been allowed to go on prosperously as it did in the first three centuries of this dispensation, it is impossible to estimate the good it would have done in every country and nation on the globe by this time. But popery turned aside its efforts, compromised and betrayed its principles, and thus crippled its progress. One must have studied the philosophy of history to little purpose who does not see that popery has retarded civilization and true religion in Europe and the rest of the world, instead of advancing them.

From the rise of popery till now believers of the gospel of the kingdom have been very nearly suppressed in the world. That they were never exterminated, however, I gather from sacred history and prophecy. Thus, in the days of Noah there was a remnant of the faithful, even though "the earth was filled with violence." In the darkest hours of Egyptian tyranny there were some who walked "by faith," Heb. xi. 23, 24. In Elijah's time, during Israel's apostasy, there were seven thousand faithful, though unknown, even to the prophet, until the Lord revealed it to him; it is, therefore, reasonable to suppose that in the darkest period of mediæval apostasy, there was a faithful remnant, though perhaps unknown to the writers of profane history. In the days of Esther a royal decree went forth "To destroy, to kill, and to cause to perish, all Jews, both young and old, little children and women, in one day." Esther iii. 13. But that extermination of the church was prevented by what seemed to be a purely natural chain of causes, and yet it was a truly providential and miraculous deliverance. It was of God that, several years before that decree, the Persian king had chosen a Jewess for queen without knowing her nationality when she was selected. And that Mordecai, a Jew, had discovered and made known a plot against the king's life. And that in casting lots for a day on which to appoint the massacre it fell on a day about nine months off, thus allowing the relieving decree which Mordecai obtained, to reach the distant provinces before the massacre occurred. And that the king was taken with sleeplessness one night, and with the idea of reading in the chronicles of the kingdom. And that the book was opened just where Mordecai's services was recorded, which brought Mordecai into favor and turned the tide against Haman and his intended massacre of the Jews. In the overruling providence of God, there is a system of government that embraces not only the most distant star and the tallest archangel, but hears the prayer of the humblest Christian, and notices a sparrow that falls to the ground.

Prophecy has indicated that the persecuting power would "make war with the saints and prevail against them till the coming of the Ancient of days," Dan. vii. 21, 22; but this does not imply their entire extermination, for it also speaks of a remnant being "nourished in the wilderness" during the persecutor's career, Rev. xii. 14, 17, and of some being "alive and remaining" at the advent. 1 Thess. iv. 17.

Scattered through the murky history of the last thirteen centuries we find some gleams of the gospel of the kingdom, and the believers of it. Thus, on the doctrine of Premillennarians, the "Dictionary of Religious Knowledge" by Abbott and Conant, says, "These views may be traced to the earliest history of the church, and were advocated by the fathers up to the fourth century. They then declined, till the Reformation gave them a new impulse, since which time they have prevailed through the entire church to a large extent." Mosheim says that the "Anabaptists" of the sixteenth century "Believed that the soul, from the moment that the body dies; until its resurrection at the last day, remains in a state of perfect insensibility." And "Crosby's History of the English Baptists" gives the following as their confession of faith, about A. D. 1600: "We believe that there will be an order in the resurrection: Christ is the first-fruits, and then next, or after, they that are Christ's at his coming; then, or afterwards, cometh the end. Concerning the kingdom and reign of our Lord Jesus Christ, as we do believe that he is now in heaven at his Father's right hand, so we do believe that at the time appointed of the Father, he shall come again, in power and great glory; and that at or after his coming the second time, he will not only raise the dead, and judge and restore the world, but will also take to himself his kingdom, and will, according to the Scriptures, reign on the throne of David, on Mount Zion, in Jerusalem, forever. We believe that this kingdom of our Lord will be an universal kingdom, and that in this kingdom the Lord Jesus Christ himself will be the alone, visible, and supreme Lord and King of the whole earth. We believe that as this kingdom will be universal so it will be also an everlasting kingdom that shall have no end, nor cannot be shaken; in which kingdom the saints and faithful in Christ Jesus shall receive the end of their faith, even the salvation of their souls; whom the Lord is they shall be also. We believe that the New Jerusalem that shall come down from God out of heaven, when the tabernacle of God shall be with them, and he will dwell among them, will be the metropolitan city of this kingdom, and will be the glorious place of residence of both Christ and his saints forever, and will be so situated as that the kingly palace will be on Mount Zion, the holy hill of David, where his throne was." Vol. 1, Appendix, p. 1. But this faith will not save the modern Baptist who denies these truths, any more than the righteousness of a great grandfather will save a dissipated and wicked son, who inherits his ancestor's name but not his principles.

In conclusion, we rejoice to know that hundreds of the present generation have heard and believed "the gospel of the kingdom," and are waiting to welcome with joy the returning Savior. Fulfilling prophecies and the signs of the times prove the nearness of his approach. But iniquity abounds, false doctrines flourish, and the wicked masses of mankind are ripening for the great harvest of wrath which will gather them in bundles to be consumed in the "furnace of fire."

But ye, brethren, are not in darkness that that day should overtake you as a thief. Let us therefore who "look for" the returning Savior, be diligent that we may be found of him in peace, without spot or blemish. Amen.

The undersigned proposes to issue from the press, either in Chicago or in New York City, as circumstances may decide, the following works, to-wit:

I. The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. In the first division the nature of the Coming Age is fully discussed, as to its physical and moral character. 1. That the earth itself has a crowning age, in which it shall be perfectly adapted to be the residence of man in his highest type; 2. That man, in that resurrection state, will be under the endless reign of the Personal Messiah; 3. In establishing the proximity of that age, the prophecies of Ezekiel, Isaiah, Daniel, Zechariah, Christ, Paul, Peter, and the Apocalypse, are critically examined, relative to its rapid approach.

II. The second work will be devoted to the investigation of the various phases of the Eastern Question:—1. The Egyptian phase, 2. The British phase, 3. The Russian phase, 4. The Ottoman phase, 5. The Hebrew phase, 6. The American phase, 7. Lesser phases of the Eastern Question, 8. The location of each of the Great Powers in the coming contest, 9. All nations marshal under the banners of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. These powers are traced in history to the present time. All the great national issues are fully investigated.

If all that are interested in these great and most sublime topics will aid, they will be issued immediately. They will be printed and bound in a form that will do credit to the vastness of the subjects, and put to subscribers at prices quite reasonable. The books will contain about 500 large royal 8vo. pages each.

VOL. XXXIII. Read + PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, FEBRUARY 18, 1884. NO. 5.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS--TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the doctrine "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortalized saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a clearly defined Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

RUSSIAN PHASE OF THE EASTERN QUESTION---No. 40.

The overthrow of Tyre and the Persian empire were the limits of Alexander's divine commission. These accomplished, he should have been satisfied; but fortune first smiled, then reviled. That Alexander was invincible till his mission ran out, will appear from the results of the three Persian battles. At the battle of Granicus Alexander lost 85 horse and 30 men; while the Persian loss was 20,000 foot, and 2,500 horse. At Issus, Alexander is said to have lost 300 foot and 150 horse; the Persian loss being 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse. At Arbela, Alexander's loss was about 1,200, mostly horse, while the Persian loss was about 300,000, besides prisoners.

This inequality of loss clearly demonstrates divine protection. By means of Alexander's success there was secured a very great admixture of Grecian blood and language among those national tribes, who were in time to be the readers of, and believers in the gospel of the Son of God, first circulated in Greek.

Alexander's conquests north and east of the Persian empire, in Bactriana, Sogdiana, Scythia, and in India, were wasteful of human life, and without any very marked results. His occupation of Bactriana, Sogdiana and Scythia, are not without some historic interest connected with our present subject. North of Sogdiana and Bactriana, was Scythia, extending far into the unknown regions of the north. The Jaxartes (Sihon) was the dividing line. Alexander prepared to cross that river, in the face of a large Scythian force. Before he was prepared to pass over that rapid river, he was visited by 20 Scythian ambassadors. That visit, and the speech of its chief ambassador, reveal too much of the Scythian character not to have special notice. Some of the items as narrated by Quintus Curtius, the historian, we give below, and are as follows:

They gazed upon Alexander for a long time without uttering a word. At last the chief ambassador gave vent to his thoughts in the following speech:

"Had the gods given thee a body proportionate to thy ambition, the whole universe would have been too little for thee. With one hand thou wouldst touch the east, and, with the other the west; and not satisfied with this, thou wouldst follow the sun, and know where he hides himself. Such as thou art, thou yet aspirest after what it will be impossible for thee to attain. Thou crossest over from Europe into Asia; and when thou shalt have subdued the whole race of men, then thou wilt make war against rivers, forests, and wild beasts. Dost thou not know, that tall trees are many years in growing, but may be torn up in an hour's time; that the lion serves sometimes for food to the smallest birds; that iron, though so hard, is consumed by rust; in a word, that there is nothing so strong, which may not be destroyed by the weakest thing?

"What have we to do with thee? We never set foot in thy country. May not those who inhabit woods be allowed to live, without knowing who thou art, and whence thou comest? We will neither command over, nor submit to any man. And that thou mayest be sensible what kind of people the Scythians are, know that we received from heaven, as a rich present, a yoke of oxen, a plough-share, an arrow, a javelin, and a cup. These we make use of both with our friends, and against our enemies. To our friends we give corn which we procure by the labor of our oxen; with them we offer wine to the gods in our cups; and, with regard to our enemies, we combat them at a distance with our arrows, and near at hand with our javelins. It is with these we formerly conquered the most warlike nations, subdued the most powerful kings, laid waste all Asia, and opened ourselves a way into the heart of Egypt.

"But thou, who boastest coming to extirpate robbers, thou thyself art the greatest robber on earth. Thou hast plundered all the nations thou hast overcome. Thou hast possessed thyself of Lydia, invaded Syria, Persia, and Bactriana; thou art forming a design to march as far as India, and thou now comest hither to seize upon our herds of cattle. The great possessions which thou hast, only make thee covet more eagerly that which thou hast not. Dost thou not see how long the Bactrians have checked thy progress? Whilst thou art subduing these, the Sogdians revolt, and victory is to thee only the occasion of war.

"Pass but the Jaxartes, and thou wilt behold the great extent of our plains. It will be in vain for thee to pursue the Scythians; and I defy thee to overtake them. Our poverty will be more active than thy army, laden with the spoils of so many nations; and when thou shalt fancy us at a great distance, thou wilt see us rush suddenly upon thy camp; for we pursue and fly from our enemies with equal speed. I am informed that Greeks speak jestingly of the Scythian solitudes, and that they are even become a proverb; but we are fonder of our deserts, than of your great cities and fruitful plains. Let me observe to thee, that fortune is slippery; hold her fast, therefore, for fear she should escape thee. Put a curb to thy felicity, if thou desirest to continue in possession of it.

"If thou art a god, thou oughtest to do good to mortals, and not deprive them of their possessions; if thou art a mere man, reflect always on what thou art. They whom thou shalt not molest, will be thy true friends; the strongest friendships being contracted between equals; and they are esteemed equals who have not tried their strength against each other; but do not imagine that those whom thou conquerest can love thee; for there is no such thing as friendship between a master and his slave, and a forced peace is soon followed by war.

"To conclude, do not fancy that the Scythians will take an oath on concluding an alliance. The only path among them is to keep their word without swearing. Such cautions as these do indeed become Greeks, who sign their treaties, and call upon the gods to witness them; but, with regard to us, our religion consists in being sincere, and in keeping the promises we have made. That man who is not ashamed to break his word with men, is not afraid of deceiving the gods; and of what use could friends be to thee whom thou couldst not trust? Consider that we will guard both Europe and Asia for thee. We extend as far as Thrace, and we are told that Thrace is contiguous to Macedonia. The river Jaxartes alone divides us from Bactriana. Thus we are thy neighbors on both sides. Consider, therefore, whether thou wilt have us for friends or enemies."—Rollin.

It appears from this speech that, at that time, (B. C. 328), the Asiatic and European Scythia joined; and that the Scythian empire occupied all the territory now forming the southern part of Asiatic and European Russia; and that it was north of the Macedonian empire in its whole extent east and west. The question naturally arising is, What people then dwelt north of the Scythians? or did that term cover all the north of Asia? If the term Scythian was then generic, and included all the nomadic tribes, Scythia, then, covered all the modern Siberia, and was the name of what is now Asiatic, as well as European Russia. These vast plains of Siberian Asia were then occupied by nomadic families, called Scyths (wanderers) who became known to the imperial belt of empires simply as they rushed down from this great northern empire to share with their southern neighbors a more genial climate, and productions more varied and luxurious. This has always been the great Scythian or nomadic field of the world; the region in which the nomadic division of the various races could have an abundance of room for their flocks and herds, and where they could have perfect freedom from the restraints of civilization and refinement. It was the nomadic field in which the true Scythian of every nation "lived, and moved, and had his being." This was then, (except its southern part), the great unknown, so marked on ancient maps. The Persian sages scanned those northern heavens and wondered why that boreal electric sun, whose streamlets shot up with such terrific majesty, never revealed its face like our eastern sun? What kind of animals dwelt in those regions of night and snow, and ice and tempests? Could any human beings dwell there? And if so, of what race? The Greeks, residing in towns and cities, cultivating the arts and sciences, and fond of every species of refinement, cast an eye of contempt upon this northern world, with its scanty productions and numerous tribal nations. All their worthless tramps they called Scyths, not once having the most distant thought that out of this savage nomadic hive, would swarm forth the future rulers of the world. Of these ancient, nomadic races are the world's present rulers.

Alexander crossed the Jaxartes, and totally defeated the Scythians. He returned their prisoners and treated the nation kindly. "The Scythians had always been considered as invincible; but after they were defeated it was owned that every nation in the world ought to yield to the Macedonians. The Sacæ, who were a powerful nation, sent an embassy to Alexander, by which they submitted themselves to him, and requested his friendship. The Scythians themselves made an apology by their ambassadors, throwing the blame of what had happened on some few individuals, and declaring that they were ready to obey all the commands of the victorious prince."

Having totally subdued Sogdiana, he left for the adjoining country of the Bactrians, who had partly revolted. In his progress the elements fought against him. In our view they were the voice of the dumb ass speaking. "In the country of Gabasa (of Sogdiana) he (Alexander) was met with a terrible storm. Flashes of lightning coming thick one upon the other, dazzled the eyes of the soldiers, and entirely discouraged them. It thundered almost incessantly, and the thunderbolts fell every moment at the feet of the soldiers, so that they did not dare either to stand still or advance. On a sudden, a violent shower of rain, mixed with hail, came pouring down like a flood; and so extreme was the cold in this country, that it froze the rain as soon as it fell. The sufferings of the army on this occasion were almost insupportable. The king was the only person invincible by these calamities, rode up and down among the soldiers, comforting and animating them, and pointing at smoke which issued from some distant huts, urged them to march thither with all the speed possible. Having given orders for the felling of a great number of trees, and laying them in heaps up and down, he had fires made in different places, and by this means saved the army, but upwards of a thousand men lost their lives. The king made up to the officers and soldiers the several losses they had sustained during this fatal storm." —Rollin. "They fought from heaven; the stars in their courses fought against Sisera." Judges v. 20.

"When they were recovered so well as to be able to march, he went into the country of the Sacæ, which he soon overran and laid waste. Soon after this Oxyartes, (one of the friendly Persian princes of Bactriana,) received him into his palace, and invited him to a sumptuous banquet, in which he displayed all the magnificence of the barbarians. He had a daughter called Roxana, whose exquisite beauty was heightened by all the charms of wit and good sense. Alexander found her charms irresistible and made her his wife." —J. P. WRETHER.

The present week has afforded me a good opportunity to learn much about our German colonies in this country. The dedication of the new church built this year in Jerusalem was the occasion of bringing together many from the colonies at Beyrout, Haifa, and Jaffa. I think your readers may be interested to hear about the success of these people in Palestine. Last night I attended a concert given in the new church, which proved a decided success. It was certainly the best thing of the kind that I ever heard. The class of people that I met there shows plainly that these people have gained the respect of the wealthy and intelligent citizens of this city. I saw the Pasha and several officials present. Of course everyone knows that the Germans are celebrated for their musical attainments. I will enclose a programme.

I learned that this convention was designed to raise means to assist those who have lately arrived here, and also to help those who wish to come. I am told that 12 or 14 years ago it was thought impossible to sustain a colony in Palestine, but there are now four thronging communities in the country. The houses and other buildings are erected in the most improved and substantial manner. What they do is well done. I am told that their schools are the best in the country and are well supported by outside pupils.

They are a religious people, but not in the least fanatical. They believe in and carry out the principle of common interest more perfectly than has been done since the time of the apostles. Their unity is the secret of their success. They receive no aid from other countries, they have no salaried officers to pay, neither do their preachers receive more than the rest. They seem to have the true missionary spirit, but never make proselytes. They believe in teaching by practice, and to benefit the country, teach the nations the various trades as well as agriculture, and that industry brings its due reward.

Their faith is strong in the prophecies, and expect that all the promises are to be fulfilled here, they also believe they are of the ten tribes of Israel gathered according to God's promises. We observe a vast difference between the missionaries and these colonies. The missionaries make all their proselytes by giving food and money, which must of course be but temporary, while these Germans show much wisdom in providing employment and good wages, which is a permanent benefit, and should they leave the country their work would remain. I should not dare to advise one or two people to come here unless they have plenty of means to live; but an American colony I feel safe in saying would in a short time be ahead of anything in this land. May God hasten the day when we shall see this accomplished.

Dear Brother Chaplin, Mr. Morrill received your letter and was pleased. He and his wife are kind to me as my own family.

I hear that Mr. Howard and party have been in quarantine for the past month. I cannot understand why they went to Egypt; no one goes to Egypt now. They must have had a hard time. Mr. Floyd of Jaffa had a letter from Mr. H., dated Nov. 19, which had been a month on the way from Alexandria. The trouble in Egypt affect this country seriously. Very few wish to travel in Palestine unless they see Egypt.

Dec. 27.—I hear that Mr. Howard and party have arrived safely in Jaffa, and are kindly cared for by Mr. Floyd.

It is very healthy here; we are having heavy rains, more so than ever was known. I have forgotten if I wrote you that the Sultan has sent orders to the Pasha to forbid the cutting of any more olive wood, or even to dig the roots from the ground. This order will cause much distress among the poor Jews who depend upon this industry entirely for support. Had it been done, four or five hundred years ago, the land would now be covered with forests. God only knows what the future will be, and as he is master of the situation, it must come out all right in the end. I am glad that God is God, and there is none beside him. May our God keep you in my prayer.

You will find enclosed two dollars to apply on my subscription, as it has been some time since it ran out. I will now toll to the brethren scattered abroad that I am still waiting and watching for the glorious Redeemer to come and make all things new. I am alone in the faith here, none to talk or converse with on the glorious promises and have no preaching but THE RESTITUTION, and my Bible is my comfort and guide. Oh, how lonely I am. Some of the readers of THE RESTITUTION may love to hear that I am trying to live in the faith and have never fell out by the way. I am trying to live a Christian and do my duty as best I can in my lonely way of living. I have not seen but one brother of the faith in Kansas, and I have lived here four years. I ask the people of God to pray for me that I may live faithful, that I may inherit eternal life when the Life-Giver comes to reward all of His saints. My prayer is to God that we may live faithful until the coming of the Lord to reward all of His saints. There are nearly all the sects here but their preaching don't feed me on the truth as I understand the apostles and prophets to teach, and I am at a loss to understand as they do. I have never took fellowship with any of them. I still live faithful to my Lord alone. If there is any one of the faith near Centropolis, Kansas, Franklin county, I should love to hear from them. I remain your sister in the faith.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.--Second Series. Number 45.

DAMASCUS.

"This region, surely, is out of the earth,—
Was it not dropped from heaven?"

Damascus is the oldest city in the world; and it is the only city which can claim the title "perennial." Its origin is lost in the mists of antiquity; and during the whole historic age it has been a great city. Josephus says it was founded by Uz the grandson of Shem. This is probably true; for it was long the capital of the western division of that country which Abraham colonized, and to which he gave his name. It is unfortunate that this fact does not appear in the English version of the Bible, because the Hebrew name Aram is there rendered "Syria."

But by whomsoever founded, one thing is certain regarding Damascus. When Abraham crossed the desert from Haran three thousand eight hundred years ago, the city was already standing on the banks of the Abana; and from that day till this it has held a first place among the capitals of Western Asia. It has been many changes. It has passed through many hands. It has been ruled by many masters. Syrians, Persians, Greeks, Romans, Arabs, and Turks, have in turn governed or oppressed it; but it has lived and flourished under them all. Of the horrors of war it had its full share. Not less than twelve times it has been pillaged and burned; yet it has always arisen with new beauty from its ashes.

THE KINGDOM OF DAMASCUS.

Damascus was the head of a kingdom which exercised considerable influence on the destinies of the Jews, and occupied a prominent place in Old Testament history. The kingdom embraced a chain of Anti-Lebanon, and extended on the north to Hamath, and on the south to Bashan. Though it lay within the Land of Promise, it is not mentioned in the early history of the Jews. True, Abraham's steward was a Damascene; and if we can depend upon a very ancient and local tradition, the great patriarch himself resided for a time in the city. When the Israelites entered Palestine, Hermon was their northern border. Neither their wishes nor their abilities stretched beyond that noble mountain. They found ample room in the hills and the valleys of the south, and ample occupation in expelling the warlike Canaanites, who dwelt there. It was when David, firmly established on his throne, extended his conquest to the Euphrates, endeavoring to make the "Land of Possession" coterminous with the Land of Promise (compare 2 Sam. viii. 3-9; Gen. xv. 18-21), "it was then Damascus and Israel became rivals. For three centuries and more that rivalry continued, often engulfing and calamitize both. But this melancholy history is interwoven with some romantic episodes which make the Bible reader feel a kind of home interest in the old city.

BIBLE STORIES.

First we have the grand expedition of Benhadad, when with two-and-thirty vassal monarchs he invaded Israel, and sat down before Samaria. His insulting demand is well known (1 Kings xx. 5, 6); and his awful threat when it was refused almost makes one shudder, —"The gods do so to me, and more also, if the dust of Samaria shall suffice for handfuls for all the people that follow me" (ver. 10). It was an idle boast; for while the haughty Damascene "was drinking himself drunk in the pavilions, he and the kings," a handful of Jewish warriors surprised the camp and put the whole host to flight (ver. 20).

It is a singular fact, shewing the permanence of names in the East, that one of the principal families in Damascus, at the present moment, is called Beit Haddad, "The house of Haddad."

Next we have the story of Naaman. Naaman was commander-in-chief of the armies of Damascus, he was one of the greatest generals, and greatest men of his age; but "he was a leper." In some war-like expedition he had captured a little Jewish maid, who became a slave in his harim. Captivity cannot extinguish feelings of compassion in woman's heart. Seeing her master's sufferings, the maid one day exclaimed "Would God my lord were with the prophet that is in Samaria! for he would recover him of his leprosy." To Samaria Naaman went. Elisha did not condescend to see him; but sent him word to go and wash in the Jordan.

The proud Damascene was indignant; "Behold, I thought, He will surely come out to me, and stand, and call on the name of the Lord his God, and strike his hand over the place, and recover the leper. Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel? may I not wash in them and be clean? So he turned and went away in a rage." The whole scene was thoroughly Oriental. The servants now interfere. Better counsels prevail; and Naaman washed and was cleansed (2 Kings v.)

The memory of Naaman clings to Damascus yet. Outside the walls, on the banks of the Abana, is a leper hospital which tradition says occupies the site of Naaman's house. I have often visited it, and when looking on its miserable inmates, all disfigured and mutilated by their loathsome disease, I could not wonder that the heart of the little Jewish captive was moved by her master's sufferings. Then follows the miraculous deliverance of Israel from the king of Damascus by Elisha. Having learned that Elisha was the cause of all his failures, the king resolved to seize him. Accordingly, on a certain night, he surrounded the village of Dothan, in which the prophet dwelt, with horsemen and chariots. In the morning Elisha's servants came trembling and crying, "Alas, my master! how shall we do?" "Fear not," said the man of God; "they that be with us are more than they that be with them." Then he prayed "Lord, open his eyes." And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man; and he saw, and, behold the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha" (2 Kings vi. 13-17). The result is well known. We can imagine the surprise and terror of the soldiers of Damascus when they found themselves alone and helpless in the stronghold of their enemy.

What a glorious type of saving power is here! As it was with Elisha, so it ever is with God's suffering children. The host of heaven encompass them. Were their eyes only opened by Divine agency, they might see, as Elisha saw, flaming chariots and magnificent array of God's armies marshalled round them. The prophet's vision illustrate the apostle's words regarding the angels:—"Are they not ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to them who shall be heirs of salvation" (Heb. i. 14).

The memorable interview between Elisha and Hazael follows next. Elijah had been commissioned to anoint Hazael; but we have no record of the act. His successor, Elisha, was now upon a visit to the city. Benhadad the king was sick, and sent Hazael to ask the prophet whether he would recover. Elisha read the thoughts that lurked in the traitor's heart, and drew such a picture of his future career that Hazael cried in indignation and horror, "Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?" Yet the first act in that long and bloody drama he perpetrated that very night. Returning to the city, Hazael murdered his master and mounted the throne. Thus terminated the royal line of Benhadad.

The Jews of Damascus have a synagogue over the spot where, according to tradition, Elijah once lived, and where Elisha and Hazael met. It is two miles from the city, in a village called Jobar. It is worthy of note that the village is inhabited by Mohammedans, and that the Jews have not, and so far as is known, never had house or land there except the synagogue. There must be some truth in the tradition, otherwise the Jews could scarcely have acquired an interest in a remote spot in the country which their forefathers never possessed. I have often ridden out to Jobar. It is a sweet, quiet ride. The winding lanes are shaded by the spreading boughs of magnificent walnuts, and lined with blooming orchards.

"Here the vines
Wed each her elm, and o'er the golden grain
Hang their luxuriant clusters, clustering
The sunshine."

Here and there the deep, swift Abana shoots out from a thicket of weeping willows, and dashes in snowy sheets of foam over the old weir. Canals cross and recross the path, fringed with tall reeds and long sedgy grass, and spanned by rustic bridges that rock and creak beneath the horses' feet. Jobar is a favorite resort of wealthy Jews, male and female. It is their park and their cafe. There they spend their long summer afternoons often the entire night under bowers of vine and jasmine. Not unfrequently the groves resound with mirth, and revelry, and song. Strange mode in which to celebrate the memory, and honor the shrines of Israel's great prophets!

The enmity of Damascus to the kingdom of Judah brought about its own destruction. The Jews, unable to contend with so powerful a foe, bought the alliance of Assyria. Damascus was attacked and captured, its people were carried away to the banks of the Kir, and an Assyrian colony placed in their room. Damascus thus lost, and lost for ever, its independence. Then "the kingdom was taken away from Damascus," "Damascus was taken away from being a city". (Isaiah xvii. 1-3).

CIRCULAR.

To the Students of Prophecy throughout the World:

The undersigned proposes to issue from the press, either in Chicago or in New York City, as circumstances may decide, the following works, to-wit:

I. The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. In the first division the nature of the Coming Age is fully discussed, as to its physical and moral character: 1. That the earth itself has a coming age, in which it shall be perfectly adapted to be the residence of man in his highest type; 2. That man, in that resurrection state, will be under the endless reign of the Personal Messiah; 3. In establishing the proximity of that age, the prophecies of Ezekiel, Isaiah, Daniel, Zechariah, Christ, Paul, Peter, and the Apocalypse, are critically examined, relative to its rapid approach.

II. The second work will be devoted to the investigation of the various phases of the Eastern Question:—1. The Egyptian phase, 2. The British phase, 3. The Russian phase, 4. The Ottoman phase, 5. The Hebrew phase, 6. The American phase, 7. Lesser phases of the Eastern Question, 8. The location of each of the Great Powers in the coming contest, 9. All nations marshal under the banners of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. These powers are traced in history to the present time. All the great national issues are fully investigated.

In the hurry of making up the outside of our paper, preparatory to attending the Conference at Rensselaer, we neglected to change the date and number—it should be Feb. 13, No. 6.

Will answer some letters as soon as we well can.

BROTHER D. HOWARD has arrived at Jerusalem. An interesting letter next week, dated, Jerusalem, January 8, 1884.

THE passing year bids fair to outrival the last as a year of calamity. Hurricanes sweep the land, and stormy tempests the ocean. Inundations flood the river valleys, and render thousands homeless and destitute. Violence fills the land with deeds of plunder and carnage, and Sodomitish impurity taints the world. The days are evil and the crisis of ages is impending.

"Earth, what a sorrow lies before thee,
None like it in the shadowy past:
Of all the ills that ever tore thee,—
E'en though the bitterest—is the last."

OUR Quarterly Conference at Rensselaer was held according to appointment. The attendance from abroad was quite limited, owing, mainly, to the unfavorable weather. Our brethren assembled, through their committee devolved the duty of public preaching upon Brother H. Barnhill and the Editor. Our social intercourse, both in the church assemblages, and at the kind, hospitable homes of the resident brethren and sisters was enjoyable indeed. May God bless that dear household of faith, is our sincere prayer.

HIGH WATER.

CINCINNATI, O., Febuary 11.—The river is 66 feet 1¾ inches, and rising an inch an hour. Raining hard. The water lacks now but 4¾ inches of the flood of last year. With the rains general and the tributaries all rising, it is impossible to predict what height may yet be reached or when the rise will stop. It is certain now that last year's record will be surpassed before night.

A Scroll of Current History.

"Gloomy forebodings for the current year are," says the New York Herald, "heard on every side throughout Europe. It is not the financial situation, although that is bad, that inspires the European press with misgivings, but the revival of nihilism and the unmitigated failure of the repressive measures adopted by the Russian Government to keep it in check. The murder of Colonel Sudeikin, the rumored assassination of a still higher official, and the strange reports connected with the Czar's recent accident are not the only ominous symptoms of approaching trouble in Russia. The Wiener Allgemeine Zeitung, which is often remarkably well informed on the revolutionary movement states that intelligence of a most serious character has lately reached St. Petersburg from London. The Russian authorities, it asserts, have obtained possession of a cipher letter found at the lodgings of a nihilist refugee in London. This letter has been deciphered at St. Petersburg, and contains a passage to the effect that a revolver can be more safely used than dynamite, and that it will be best to wait for an opportunity when the Emperor and the Czarevich can be attacked together, so that anarchy may set in at once. A simultaneous warning is said to have been sent to St. Petersburg from Paris."

Chinese Gordon's Mission to the Soudan was the subject of a lecture delivered in New York on January 29th by Lieutenant-General C. P. Stone, whose long service in Egypt has given him an intimate knowledge of the country. In Egypt he is called Stone-Pacha. In the course of his lecture he said: "General Gordon's going to Khartoum single-handed is a daring act of devotion to his country. The only chance of success he has is his own personal courage and his prestige as a former Governor of Soudan. The latter is not likely now to be of much service to him. Before, he found the people submissive to the Khedive. Now he goes as a representative of the British Government. The chances are small that he can reach Khartoum. If he fails, the loss to British prestige will be great, and the gain to El Mahdi will be greater. There is a chance that the defence of the Suez Canal may, in a short time, require a force as great as the British now have in India. If Mohammed is really a great leader of men, the chances are that in a few months his home will be Mecca and his title 'El Mahdi Caliph.'" Referring to the tradition of El Mahdi, he said that during his residence in Egypt he was told of the existence of a tradition that in the last days of the world would arise a false prophet—the Mahdi—who would proceed from one conquest to another throughout the world, and would rule it. His rule, it was believed, would be bad and short, for Jesus Christ would soon appear near Jerusalem and gather up all the great dead warriors of the world. Christ would march to Mecca, seize it and proclaim peace on earth.—Christian Herald.

THE LESSON OF THE HOUR.

There is big water in the Alleghony, the Monongahela, the Youghlogheny, the Big Sandy, and a thousand other tributaries of the Ohio, small and great. The melting snow from countless hillsides is rushing down toward the Ohio. All man's efforts are powerless to resist it. The terrible scenes which a year ago startled the country with a thrill of sympathetic horror, are about to be enacted again. Again a great cry of anguish will be heard from the banks of the Ohio. Homes will be made desolate, mills and factories will be ruined, husbands will be separated from wives, children will be torn from the arms of parents. Hunger, desolation, ruin, death will be borne along upon the waters of this great river.

Scenes similar to those now threatening the valley of the Ohio are perhaps gathering upon the shores of the Hudson. The condition for a great freshet in this State are favorable. It may come this year, and it may not. It is not impossible, even, that all the peculiar conditions necessary to develop a great flood may not occur in the Hudson for a number of years. That such a flood will make its appearance sooner or later, unless active measures are taken now to avert it, cannot be doubted. Pray heaven that our predictions may never be fulfilled, and that this state may never see such days and nights of anguish and despair as the Ohio brought down a year ago from the mountains! Human prayer, however, avails but little to avert or to stay the terrible energies of destruction which outrage natured turns upon her assailants.

The angel of death is abroad in the land. The beating of his wings may almost be heard above the roar of the countless torrents ready to do his will.

Will that cry of anguish which comes to us from the banks of the Ohio be, too, a cry of warning? Will it reach to the banks of the Mohawk and the Hudson while there is yet time, or will it, as before, be lost among the louder shouts of selfishness and greed?

If the people of the Ohio must suffer, let them suffer not in vain. In their anguish we may read the lesson of the hour.—N. Y. Sun.

Editor Restitution:

The brethren in Watson and many others throughout this state who have had the cause most deeply at heart, have long felt the great necessity of a thorough church organization, and being recognized by our legislature, so we may have the full legal benefits of such an organization with a uniform name. Hence we have taken the Bible name more generally used by our brethren, of "The Church of God in the Abrahamic faith." Therefore the brethren in Watson have become incorporated into such a legal body, being now able to hold their church property under the above title and name, with the following declaration of principles which we believe and hold most sacred.

1. Test of fellowship, obedience to the gospel.

2. We believe in the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began," and as a means to this end the establishment of the kingdom of God on this earth, with Christ as king, and his immortalized saints as heirs and joint-heirs with him in the rulership of the nations. The restoration of Israel, the literal resurrection of the just and the unjust, the immortalization of the righteous and final destruction of the wicked, also a hearty belief of the gospel, repentance and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy and godly life as essential to final salvation, and immortality only through Christ. In behalf of the above principles we pray for the hearty sympathies and co-operation of all the dear brethren in Michigan, to unite with us in one mighty effort to strengthen and build up our most holy faith. A thorough organization, order and system is the secret of success. "United we stand; divided we fall." By order of the church, M. A. WOODWARD.

MARSHALL, Ill.

Editor Restitution:

Hoping this report will give comfort to the readers of THE RESTITUTION scattered abroad, we can say our place, seven miles southwest of Marshall, was visited by Elder S. T. Hook from Sugar Creek, Ind., who ably talked upon subjects pertaining to the kingdom of heaven and the name of Jesus Christ.

Most of the hearers were surprised to hear that the Christ of the Bible died and was buried and rose again. Life only in Christ was plainly presented. The reward of faith was proven by the promises made to the fathers, and is yet future. The kingdom of God was talked upon and understood by many of our people for the first time; strange, but it is so. Natural immortality was considered and shown to what it leads. False teachers were pointed out by the Scriptures of divine truth. The need of a resurrection was considered. If the teaching of the sectarian world is true, they claiming life without a resurrection, which makes God a liar. If this be so, "Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die."

Must say the meetings were attended well, and good attention given to the word spoken. The house we occupied belonged to Baptists and after some evenings the cry was raised, "away with him, this our craft is in danger," and a meeting was called to consult what to do. The writer was there. The move to close the door was carried. There being a school house on the same ground just across the street, our meeting was held there, still attended well. Instead of being to their good, it was otherwise.

During these meetings five souls were baptized into Christ; and many others, like king Agrippa, "almost persuaded to be Christians." So the meetings closed. On the evening of separation six of the one faith organized into a church, not a kingdom, to work and live for the kingdom to come, observing the breaking of bread and the emblem of our Savior's blood that was shed. This is what we have long prayed for; now the world may look at the shining radiance, still its beams spread too wide, its light reaches too high for them to "wrest" and mystify with their gigantic "Fort Sumpter," eternal torture; for the word of God must be true, let men be what they may. Though the brain of opposition against the truth raged, still the friends—I said friends—those who just a short time ago, as you have learned before this, they would have suffered much for the sake of one who was helping to build up their creed, measuring themselves by what they teach, but when I begin to present the plain teaching of God's word, the cry of "heresy" is raised. Such is the case. These "friends", spending much uneasiness after two unsuccessful efforts, they began to consider. It is hoped.

Now brethren this one thing shall be the aim of my life, to thank the God of heaven that I was aroused from the darkness into which I had been led and had lived for a number of years, not taking my Savior's command, "Search the Scriptures," but like many of my fellow travelers, giving heed to words, precepts and doctrines of men.

Now to him, who has begotten us for his kingdom, when the kingdoms of this age shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ; when "the Lord shall roar out of Zion and utter his voice from Jerusalem, when the tabernacle of David that is fallen shall be raised up, when the swords shall be beaten into ploughshares and spears into pruning hooks, then there will be no more war, when the wolf shall dwell with the lamb and the leopard with the kid, when the lion shall eat straw like the ox, when there will be no more sorrow, pain or death, the curse removed. Then the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the glory of the Lord as waters that cover the sea. Then all shall know the Lord from the least to the greatest, and the Lord shall be king over all the earth, in that day shall there be one Lord and his name one. Yours in hope of the soon coming Lord,

THOMAS J. GARNER.

Miscellaneous.

A TOUCHING INSCRIPTION.

Remembering the sentence pronounced against Israel, that they should be scattered among all nations without a resting-place for the soles of their feet, and marking the providence of God which has, under these adverse circumstances, preserved them a distinct people as a monument to the truthfulness of his word, we can appreciate the sentiment of the following touching inscription found over the gate of a small Jewish cemetery, near Glasgow, Scotland:—

"Tribes of the wandering foot and weary breast,
Whose shall ye flee away and be at rest?
The Wild ocean has but one mark;
The Foe, he cave!
Mankind, their Country,
Israel, but the grave."

It is a noteworthy point that the Waldenses are now putting forth an effort to reoccupy the old ground in Calabria, the extreme south-western province of Italy, from which they were driven 300 years ago. Signor Pons, whose forefathers were among the few that escaped massacre, visited the old scenes last summer. He found a remnant of the old colony people, speaking the dialect of Angrogna, wearing the same dress, having the same manners and customs, retaining the old traditions, and proud of their Piedmontese origin. He spoke to them in the Angrogna dialect and was perfectly understood. They would exclaim, "He is our brother; he comes from the country of our people." They remember the persecutions to which their people had been subjected. They have a strong aversion to confession. Signor Pons is engaged in an effort to rekindle the old fire.—The Presbyterian.

THE GREAT STORM OF 1703

Londoners can congratulate themselves that the recent severe storm, which played sad havoc on land and sea, was not a repetition of the disastrous cyclone that well-nigh demolished London in November, 1703. The storm began the 26th and raged with great fury until the morning of the 27th. The appearance of the city after the subsidence of the storm, observes Macaulay, was as though it had been sacked by a victorious enemy. The loss of life aggregated 8,000, while in money £2,000,000 sterling, it was estimated, would not suffice to cover the damage. Twelve man-of-war, with 1,800 souls on board, were engulfed within sight of land, and the Eddystone Lighthouse, together with its originator, Winstanley, was swept away in the raging waters. By the inundation resulting from the sudden rising of the Severn and the Thames, many domestic animals perished. On one particular level where the waters had full sweep 5,000 sheep were drowned.

VICTORS IN THE OCEAN.

According to the Panama Star Herald, two vessels have narrowly escaped destruction by meteors. One was the steamship Linn of the Pacific Steam Navigation Company, and the other was the United States man-of-war Alaska. A meteor which plunged into the ocean close by the last named ship, just after sunset on December 12 is said to have terrified everybody on board by exploding with a great noise and a burst of flame just before it struck the water. This is not the first time that meteors have fallen near ships, and there is nothing impossible in the suggestion that vessels may have been sunk by them. Meteoric stones have fallen on land, which were heavy enough, and endowed with sufficient velocity, to knock a hole through any ship. Within the last forty years more than twenty vessels have disappeared at sea. How many of them may possibly have been struck and sunk by these flying missiles from the sky, some of which follow in flocks in the tracks of comets, while others are lone wanderers in space until they fall within the earth's attraction, and plunge through her atmosphere with planetary speed, no one can tell.—Review and Herald.

Selections.

A PRE-HISTORIC CITY.

Toledo Blade: Prof. P. W. Norris, who has just got through with his excavations of ancient mounds in the Kanawha Valley, called at the Blade office the other day and told something of his interesting work. The Professor was formerly Superintendent of the Yellowstone Park, but at present he is Assistant United States Ethnologist.

He has been engaged in the West Virginia excavations since last August. Commencing his explorations near the City of Charleston, in the Kanawha Valley, he traced out the ruins of an ancient city five miles in extent. This prehistoric city occupied both sides of the river, its upper extremity reaching within two miles of the mouth of Elk River, which empties into the Great Kanawha at Charleston, and its lower extremity being seven miles below the Elk.

Seven of the mounds which he opened were from twenty to thirty-five feet in height and from 300 to 540 feet in circumference at the base. Near these he opened about forty smaller ones. Altogether he opened fifty-six in the valley. It may be well to add here, before particularising, that the aggregate collections from these mounds amounted to over 4,000 the specimens, which are intended for the National Museum at Washington. These consisted principally of about thirty specimens of steatite and sand-stone pottery and pipes, many lance arrow-heads, hatchets, fish-darts, celts, gorgets, and and various other kinds of things nematite iron paint hatchets, and paint cups; several hundred pieces of shell money; bone and horn punches used for dressing the flint arrow-heads into proper shape; twenty-one bracelets, evidently made from Lake Superior copper; one copper gorget (breast-plate) copper crowns, and many copper beads. All of the copper was heavily coated with virdigris. Indeed, from the copper crown, breast-plate, and bracelets on one of the skeletons which the Professor exhumed the end of the bark coffin had become so coated with virdigris as to mislead many into the belief that the coffin was copper-plated, and some of the West Virginia newspapers reported it; but the Professor wants it distinctly understood that he authorized no such statements.

In a mound thirty-five feet high and 540 feet around its base was a vault twelve feet square and ten feet high, the walls of which had been supported by black-walnut timbers, some of the timber as much as twelve inches in diameter. In the center of this vault, lying horizontally on his back, was a giant skeleton seven feet and six inches long, and measuring nineteen inches through the breast, under the arms. The arms were extended by its side. On each wrist were six large copper bracelets, four of which had been inclosed in cloth or dressed skin. The fact that these bracelets were so deeply incrusted with virdigris, and that the decay of the enwrapping material had been so great, made it impossible for the eye of science to distinguish with certainty as to whether this inclosing material was dressed skin or cloth. Under the skull was a stone lance-head. There was a copper gorget upon the breast, with holes in it. The gorget, which is four inches square, is regarded by the Professor as having been a badge of authority. Lying on the left shoulder were three blocks of isinglass 7x9 inches on the surface and nearly one inch thick. The weight of these had so crushed in the shoulder that it was impossible to get an accurate measure across from shoulder to shoulder. Hence the necessity of measuring through the breast, under the arms, as above stated. In the right hand was an hematite iron hatchet, having a four inch blade. This hatchet is without an eye for a handle. In the left hand were several lance-heads, six inches in length, of fine flint manufacture.

Leaning backward in a dark coffin, which stood somewhat slanting from a perpendicular position, was another skeleton, in such a position in relation to the first as to let the left hand over its head. On this left hand, thus extended over the giant's head, were two copper bracelets. In the right hand were a bunch of lance-heads similar to those of the giant. In each corner of this solemn vault was a warrior inclosed in his bark coffin, and standing nearly erect, with a stone hatchet, not grooved, and lances, in or near his hands. Nearly 100 various specimens of arms and ornaments were found in this one vault. The falling-in of this vault caused a depression or hole on the top of the mound. In this depression a subsequent race—the stone-work builders or modern Indians—have placed a stone coffin, six feet in diameter and four feet high. In this stone coffin was discovered a much decayed skeleton and some very rude stone weapons.

In another mound, two miles from, and nearly the same size as the last described one, were found two skeletons, with rude weapons. This was very near the top of the mound. Then there were about thirty feet of earth similar to dry mortar, so hard as to require picks for excavating it. This hard earth extended down to the natural surface of the ground. But here was the most wonderful discovery of all. Quite a number of people from the vicinity happened to be present at this supreme moment, says the Professor, and among them the Hon John E Kenna, United States Senator from West Virginia. The remains of a large-size warrior was found lying flat on his back, with a copper crown covering his head and neck, ornamented with seashell and bone beads. On one side of this warrior lay five others with their feet all pointing towards him, while on the other side were five women, as indicated by their size and ornaments, also having their feet pointed towards the central warrior. About these skeletons were found various weapons and ornaments. At the head of each cistern were double cisterns, cemented, and containing more or less water. These cisterns were of different diameters, but average about four feet in depth. The nature of this sepulchre seems to have been so different from any other yet discovered that the professor says that were it not for the fact of so many reliable witnesses having been present, he would hesitate to publish it. The question naturally occurs, How came these ten skeletons there, five of them male and five female, all evidently buried at the same time with the sheriff? Could they have been entombed alive? Then these ten cemented double cisterns at the head of each skeleton—for what purpose were they made? Each of them contained more or less water; can it be that this water has been pent up in this old ancient mound for ages? Yet how otherwise? For thirty feet above and more than that distance around this spot there was hard earth, "dry like mortar," which had to be excavated with picks. It could not have seeped up through the natural ground beneath, for the cisterns were well cemented. This is known in the Kanawha Valley as the Orcel Mound, and is on Col. Ben Smith's farm.

Another mound, two miles below the Smith farm, and on what is called the Poor farm, in Kanawha County, is 306 feet in circumference and twenty-five feet high. The top of this mound is a small, flat plain forty feet in diameter. Its top and sides to a depth of about two feet was covered with the natural soil. The entire remainder of the mound was ashes which had been burned until they were very fine and heavy. However, these ashes had all been deposited in bark vessels, containing about one-half a bushel each. About the centre of the mound were two large skeletons, in a sitting posture, facing each other, with one leg of each between those of the other, and their hands extended, palms upward, towards one another. Resting upon their hands was a curious altar made of stone. This altar consists of a bowl-shaped stone about two feet in diameter, the concave side up and filled with ashes. On its top was a flat stone cover, with two holes in it, and having on it the ancient totem marks. But what good now to us, who cannot interpret it, the mystic language of the totem mark? Down, even with the natural surface of the ground, in this mound, was found an immense slightly concave altar. The center of this altar was filled to about the depth of six inches with fine ashes. Around, further from the centre, there were ashes and bits of human bones, piled up to the depth of about two feet. These seem to have been pushed aside from the center to make room for the fine ashes which were left in the centre. The Professor sunk a twelve-foot shaft down the centre of this mound, and when he came to this huge altar, he excavated as far around it as he could without its caving in on the men—perhaps obtaining a diameter of twenty-two feet, without discovering the outer rim of the altar. Hence he could not give its diameter. He says that there cannot be the least doubt but that these ashes are the cremated remains of human beings.

Brevities.

The four great Bible societies of the country and Great Britain issued last year 2,989,284 copies of the Scriptures.

The first edition of the entire Bible in the Zulu language has been received at the mission stations in that country, from America, where it was printed by the American Bible Society, under the superintendence of S. C. Pixley.

For the first time since the invention of printing, a German book has reached its 1,000th edition, each of them numbering 3,000 copies, thus making in all 3,000,000 copies. It is a primer by Hacster, published by G.D. Baedeoker, of Essen, which first appeared in 1853, and reached its 100th edition in 1863.

At a microscopic exhibition in Boston lately the sting of a honey bee was thrown upon the screen, the point of which was so sharp as to be hardly distinguishable. At the time of the finest of fine needles was shone under the same power of the microscope, and the end of the needle measured five inches across.

An interesting discovery has been made at Nimes, in southern France, so rich in Roman remains. It consists of a block of mosaic masonry twelve metres in extent, representing a Roman emperor enthroned, with a female at his side. He is surrounded by a group consisting of a warrior with a helmet and a number of slaves. Before him are two figures of men leading along a lion and a wild boar. The translated pavement is in perfect preservation, and has escaped any injury from the workman's pick; the designs are good, and the colors as fresh as if they had been applied yesterday. Competent authorities who have inspected the mosaic declare that no museum contains its equal. If a price could be set upon it $200,000 would not be too high.

Cornell University's mummy is a truly royal mummy. It came from the Necropolis at Thebes, belonging, it is thought, to the Twenty-third dynasty, probably not far from 900 B.C. The dried-up remains of this Egyptian King are made to do service to science in the New World after a lapse of about 2,700 years. Egypt in his day made very little stir in the world and was fast hastening to its final downfall as a dominant empire of the world three or four hundred years later.

Sententious.

Character lives in a man: reputation outside of him.

Towards the soul which places itself in the attitude of receiving all things flow.

A man who feels that his religion is a slavery, has not begun to comprehend the real nature of religion.

The benevolent eye giveth value to the bounty which the hand dispenses.

Not to know evil that is innocence; but to know evil and choose the good, that is virtue.

It is with flowers as with moral qualities; the bright are sometimes poisonous; but, I believe, never the sweet.—Hare.

"Withhold it not, that unspoke prayer
Which struggles in thy thought,
To bear upon its ample wings
Each soul with burden fraught.

Personal character should always be a resultant of tribe action, instituted for unselfish purposes. The meanest and most illegitimate of all human pursuits is the direct pursuit of reputation.

Our spiritual natures are to be knit into firmness by toil, to be hardened into power by conflict, to be softened into humanity by the experience of their weakness, to be rendered tractable by affliction, and thus fitted for a safe eternity.

THE THINGS ABOVE.

"Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth." Col. III. 2.

"The well for us may flow much blood the heart
Too strongly here are rudely snapped apart,
The veil the pitcher at the fountain breaks,
The golden bowl is shattered for our sakes,
To draw new fruit and healing all we love.
To raise our souls to lasting things above.

Every best of a servant of God, and every work of a child of God, has its place and its part in the Divine plan. To be faithful at that post, and in that work, should be the purpose of servant or child. Faithfulness there redounds to God's glory, and to the honor of the faithful one.

He that truly walks with God, converses with him in frequent prayer and constant communion, runs to him in all his necessities, asks counsel of him in all his doubtings, opens all his wants to him, weeps before him for his sins, asks both remedy and support from him for his weakness, fears him as a Judge, reverences him as a Lord, and obeys and loves him as his patron and father and friend.—Jeremy Taylor.

PRESUMPTION.

Manners impress us as they indicate real power. Nature forever puts a premium on reality. What is done for effect is seen to be done for effect; what is done for love is felt to be done for love. A man inspires reverence and honor because he was not lying in wait for these.—Emerson.

"There is a point of rest
At the great centre of the Creator's love
A glimpse of its secret source:
A little child may slumber undisturbed,
Without the smile of one fairy curl,
In that strange central calm amid the mighty whirl."

THE CHURCH'S CRY.

All down the ages, Lord,
Thy church has looked for thee,
According to thine ancient word,
To come in majesty.

"I quickly come, behold,"
Each writer the promise clear,
But centuries have since been told,
Nor does thine ear appear.

Still do thy people hope,
Still for thy coming cry,
Still with the powers of evil cope,
And watch the day-dawn nigh.

What can thy "quickly" mean
Our weary hearts would know?
Why so long absent hast thou been?
Why [illegible] longer yet?

Thou Sun of life, arise,
With healing in thy rays,
Till earth beneath the clouded skies
Thy worthy praises sings.

SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

No student of current events can question the fact that we have fallen upon eventful times. Times which are impressive and momentous. If we look upon the world's military preparations we behold vast armies and navies—the revenues of nations are taxed to the utmost to support their standing armies. The best talent and wisest statesmanship are called into requisition on account of the critical condition of national affairs. If we accept the conclusions of science, we must believe that we are approaching great changes in the physical world. The sun's surface is rent with storms, and the earth responds to the shock with tornadoes, cyclones and earthquakes.

The Christendom of our times is aptly portrayed by the remarkable prophecy of the apostle Paul, "In the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemous, disobedient to parents, unthoughtful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good. Traitors, heady, high minded, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God, having the form of godliness but denying the power thereof." A more accurate and terse description cannot be found of the formal and pleasure-seeking church of our day. When we consider the self-sacrificing spirit of the apostolic church, the purity and devotion of her members, the uncompromising spirit of her leaders and their loyalty to truth, we fail to see in the modern church any of these strong characteristics of Christian fidelity. The modern church adheres to forms and ceremonies and to creeds, but depends little upon the explicit testimony of the word of God. She is jealous in her adherence to the articles of faith, but ignores the quickening power of the gospel of Christ; indeed, she is wedded to the world and seems to have lost sight of the precious promise of the coming bridegroom.

The prophecies bearing upon the restoration of the Jewish people, are being fulfilled. Jerusalem once more is becoming a city among the nations. The land which laid desolate and barren through so many ages, is now becoming fertile and productive. The desolate places are being rebuilded and the long scattered and wasted people, are returning to the land of promise.

In fact, all the signs, whether physical, national, or religious, point to great and important changes in the near future. And the student of prophecy can see in these wonderful preparations, signs of his return who is the Desire of nations, the Hope of his people, and the Redeemer of Zion.

A VEXED QUESTION SETTLED.

The Appointed Time, a Determinant Time.

Dear reader, the question, "How long the vision?" is answered,—"unto 2300 days—then the sanctuary shall be cleansed—(for) at the time appointed, the end!"

1. Let us notice the leading terms of this text—their import and their usage. For them we have the sum of its teaching.

The 2300 evening-morning is the Hebrew expression for day first, and day second, and so on to day sixth. Gen. i. 5-31. Thus we have "evening, morning," and day six times interchanged to begin with.

Then in verse 26, this "vision of the evening-morning is for many days." Nay, more. This word (yamim) for days is used for Daniel's personal trial on "pulse and water ten days"—four times over, ch. i. 12, 13; in this book of Daniel thirty times (as in Dan. vii. 12, 13), and in the Hebrew Scriptures over 2000 times—all in literal form—and only expressive of years when interchangeable with years, as tag and tally in the lives of the patriarchs, Gen. v., or with prophetic symbols—in this range of prophecy—Daniel and Revelation. Note, The doubt or darkness is only in the expositor and his exposition.

2. The days of "the vision," (the phrase for "evening-morning 2300" v. 14, and its corresponding "many days," vs. 26) are used for the time of "the yearly sacrifice—full year," and the like 17 times; see Ex. xiii. 10; Lev. xxv. 29; Josh. xiii. 1; 1 Sam. i. 3, 21; ii. 19; xx. 6; xxvii. 7; (Zebach yamim, yearly sacrifice or sacrifice of days).

3. The word for "appointed time" occurs 22 times to teach a determined, established time. Ex. xxiii. 15; Num. ix. 2; Hab. ii. 3.

4. The 70 weeks, 490 days, "seal the vision." They were fulfilled in so many years! Num. xiv. 34; Ezek. iv. 6, 8, 9.

The first period of our late general expectation was based on these prophecies and their dates in our Bible chronology. The 70 weeks were taken to reach to the cross, A. D. 33, and thus the prophecy was abridged—omitting "the city and sanctuary" and its desolation—A. D. 70. Thence, the remnant of 2300—1810 must reach 1880 But this again omitted the fact that the sacrifice, etc., were to cease in "the midst of the (one) week." Dan ix. 27. This cessation of sacrifice transpired necessarily when "the altar, the temple, and city" were destroyed! Hence, the other half of that "one week" remained to settle the affairs of that remnant people, the fortresses and order in Judea—extending into A.D. 74. From that "end (settling up) of the war" the 1810 have not ended, as unbelief assumes, but does reach into 1884!

Here the finger point of Providence through Papal and Mahomedan centres of collapse, with the general "signs of times" concur to emphasize prophecy as it portrays the end of the times of the Gentiles! Nay more!—the inauguration of "his times, the blessed and only Potentate! the King of kings! Amen, and amen." Ps. lxxii.

To my apprehension this whole question is settled to faith as never before. Reason and revelation are at one. Our generation announces the time of the end. Many do run to and fro! Knowledge does increase! Hence, the outline of prophecy (now the sum of history) through the four great Gentile empires, must reach its predicted goal. Only recognize "the city and sanctuary and the midst of the week," as God's "waymarks" towards "the end," and we are yet "in the way," and on running time! "Bless the Lord O my soul."

LIVING ORACLES.

"Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away." Matt. xxiv. 35.

You never get to the end of Christ's words. There is something in them always behind. They pass into proverbs, they pass into laws, they pass into doctrines, they pass into consolations; but they never pass away, and after all the use that is made of them, they are still not exhausted.

HERE AND HEREAFTER.

"Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." 2 Cor. iv. 17.

It is a sweet and pleasant thought that when all these days of pain and sorrows and work are ended—these days of contending and unrest—there will come a folding of hands. It is sweet, when sorrow and weariness are our only companions, to remember that the hour is not far away when the Father will fold the tired hands of his child to his, will seal the aching eye with sleep, and breathe under its trembling lid the sweet dream of heaven. Weary not, faint not, the Father sees you, and you know his hand leads you. A little pain and a little labor he metes you for your good; be patient, and when the night comes he will give you rest.

SONGS IN THE NIGHT.

"In the night his song shall be with me." Psalm.

"Who giveth songs in the night." Job. xxxv. 10.

Very many of the sweetest joys of Christian hearts are songs which have been learned in the bitterness of trial. It is said of a little bird that he will never learn to sing the song his master will have him sing while it is light in his cage. He learns a snatch of every song he hears, but will not learn a full separate melody of his own. And the master covers the cage and makes it dark all about the bird, and then he listens and learns the one song that is taught to him, until his heart is full of it. Then, ever after, he sings the song in the light. With many of us it is as with the bird. The Master has a song he wishes to teach to us, but we learn only a strain of it, a note here and there, while we catch up snatches of the world's songs and sing them with it. Then he comes and makes it dark about us till we learn the sweet melody he would teach us. Many of the lovinat the evening hour, for it [illegible] before the dawn of another day some tenderly loved one may finish his or her span of life for this world, and then it will be too late to retract an unkind word, or even to seek forgiveness, for an injury inflicted upon the heart of a loved friend departed.

Saved the Baby.

Little dogs often command high prices for fancy's sake, but it is the big dogs that are sought for and valued when protection and muscular usefulness are wanted. An interesting exception is related in the incident below. Even a little dog found his strength for once equal to his good will, and was able to save a baby's life.

A woman left her baby, eighteen months old, on the floor of the front room playing with its toys and a little terrier dog that is its constant companion. The mother was away only a minute or two, but when she came back and opened the door her infant's head, arms and shoulders were hanging beyond the stone sill of an open window, and near it, with its feet on a chair, stood the little dog, holding on to the child's dress for dear life.

Her child unconscious of any dan-with him the reward of the saints, do we not feel that we would like to be the instrument of gladdening the hearts of others by putting THE RESTITUTION into their hands that they might read and understand these beautiful truths, and learn the road that leads to everlasting life, that the angels in heaven may rejoice over one more sinner who hath repented, and another star added to our crown?

This is not a vain undertaking. We know that every dollar spent will bring in, some thirty, some sixty, and some an hundred fold. It is more blessed to give than to receive.

Oh! let us remember the words of Christ, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

How we admire Paul's effort to convert King Agrippa! There are millions of souls in the world just as valuable as Agrippa and who would more readily accept and obey the truth. Then let us work while it is day, for the night cometh wherein no man can work. Our time is short, and what we do must be done quickly. Do not put it off until next year or next month. We may never see next year. Now is the accepted time. The harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few.

Title Page.—"The Law, the Covenants, and the Sabbath. Also an Epitome of the Great Salvation; and an Appendix including various other subjects, in brief."

The Sabbath question is carefully and lengthily examined, and presented and discussed in a somewhat new light.

The work also includes the consideration of Sunday, conditional immortality, the gospel, return of the Jews, the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, punishment of the wicked, the state of the dead, the new birth, the one faith, the one hope, the image of God, nature of Christ, the name, religion, morality, Christianity, etc."

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortalization together with him in the government of the nations of Israel; the restoration of the literal race of Israel to their own land; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. Also a heart belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

THE COMING MAN, WHO IS HE? AND WHAT SHALL BE HIS WORK?

For many centuries these thoughts have agitated the minds of succeeding generations. A certain undefinable vague unrest has ever held a strange power over our race. Humanity, since it first appeared upon the stage of action, has sought in vain to penetrate the darkness that shrouds us with sable pall the yet to come. The most profound philosophers of every time and age have sought in vain to pierce its hidden depths, and toward it have directed their keenest mental swords. But they have returned them to the scabbard whence they were drawn, bearing no trace of captured foe.

Nature still sighs under a weight of wrong she seems unable to right, of ills she is unable to cure, of sorrows she cannot soothe. Earth itself is groaning and heaving, exhuming and entombing, its long-concealed treasures and its living millions; giving back the solar disquiet that threatens at times to rend the universe from centre to circumference. Lurid sunrises and glowing sunsets for months repeat themselves, but as yet no satisfactory solution of the strange phenomenon has been given by scientists. Ocean's depths become a huge, boiling, chaldron, engulphing islands in her relentless bosom, and in their stead sending others to her restless surface. The physical world seems all unrest, commotion, disquiet. Yet we need not fear its utter dissolution. Its foundations are sure; it shall abide forever.

The mental world has, as it were, caught the [illegible] from the physical [illegible] on whose brow rests the crown of royalty, down to the poorest serf, the most miserable miner, who scarce sees daylight long enough to appreciate its blessings, all, all is unrest, disquiet. All are sighing for something not yet attained, for justice, for freedom, for security. The plaintive cry is heard on every breeze, from every land. Will none bring deliverance? Will none arise and break the yoke of the oppressor, and give to our race the precious boons of right and liberty?

It may be deemed presumptuous to assert, that these solemn enquiries may be satisfactorily answered from one source; where, and where alone may be found the key that will open up to each and every one the seeming profound mystery of the past, present, and future of our race.

Then to the question: 1. Is there a coming man? I answer most emphatically, there is. He will surely come. 2. Who is he? I reply, Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of the living God, whose coming was foretold by the prophets hundreds and hundreds of years before he came. He it is who was represented by them as the Wonderful Counsellor, the Mighty God; as the Prince of Peace, as the Prince of the House of David, as the coming King of the Jews, as the Lord of the whole earth! But never is he spoken of as the second person in the trinity; this is but a relic of paganism, an offshoot of the multitudinous gods of the heathen.

It may be asked where all this information respecting the coming man may be obtained. I reply it may be found in the Scriptures of truth. The revelation of the great First Cause to his creature man.

It is not my province here to attempt to prove the truth of the Scriptures, or their inspiration. They themselves do this. Nor have they ever been proved untrue, or blotted out, though vain, boastful man has often made the attempt. His efforts have come to naught. Still the circulation of this wonderful book increases as no other book ever has; and we can now safely assert, that within the last century the life and teachings of Jesus of Nazareth has been translated into about 600 different languages and dialects, and not less than 7,000,000 copies have been sent broadcast over the world. To prove anything untrue the evidence against it must always be more weighty than that in its favor. In favor of the inspiration of the Scriptures, we have a "thus saith the Lord, the Creator of heaven and earth." On this I rest till the more weighty evidence appears on the other side.

For this brief digression from our theme I offer as an apology the fact that in the Scriptures alone is to be found a complete history of the individual in question, and together, they must stand or fall.

Jesus of Nazareth came not into this world as a Luther, a Garibaldi, a Tell, a Kossuth, a Wilberforce, a Wendle Phillips, a Lincoln or a Garfield; or any other ancient or modern hero or philanthropist. Neither in life, nor in death, did he resemble them, or they him. These, as well as all other mortals, came into the world unannounced, unforetold. They came in the natural unfolding of the centuries, ere they left the land of the living, entered the chambers of the dead, and the iron bars of the grim monster still holds them within his precincts. Jesus of Nazareth came into the world for a definite purpose, and though the Son of God, he was born of woman, as are others of our race. He was born a mortal creature, an undeveloped character, subject to all the ills, trials and temptations of human nature. His mental and moral character were of a higher type, because these principles were bestowed by divine power. They were bestowed in justice to Jesus, the second Adam, who was now to be tested as the first Adam had been, but failed.

A perfectly pure, moral nature could not have come from a sinful source, and for this reason was Jesus, the only begotten Son of God. Brought into the world by divine power, that he might stand on an equally high moral platform with the first Adam, before entering on his life test. His physical, fleshly nature, obtained from his mother was subject to the same laws as is the family of humanity. His moral and intellectual nature coming from God was simply pure, just as the first Adam, who, though he was pure, was not of necessity immortal.

When our progenitor Adam was created on this earth, he was an undeveloped character, that is, he was so constituted that he had the power of choice, and, through this free will, came sin. He was to be tested, and if he proved worthy, the rulership of the earth would have been his. He proved unworthy, he disobeyed, and for this disobedience he was at once and forever shut out from the tree of life, which would in time have imparted immortality had the partaken of its fruit. He was not at his creation, nor has any one of his numerous posterity ever since, been endowed with an immortal soul. The thought that man is in possession of a soul is but another heathen dogma, handed down by the superstitious through succeeding generations. The earth was made for man, (not heaven), but by his disobedience he proved himself unworthy so fair an inheritance, therefore he was left to fill out his years of life, and return to his original elements, dust. (Not to a fiery cloud as Tyndall suggests.) But the Divine Being saw fit to give mankind another opportunity to obtain an endless inheritance on this earth, and, to this end, he gave the promise, that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head, which promise carefully considered, may be expressed thus, Good will in the end overcome all evil, or, the final outcome of all created things will be good.

For the accomplishment of this great and beneficent purpose God saw fit to appoint his Son Jesus, the Second Adam, through whom, if he proved obedient, the race might attain immortality. The Creator always uses means to accomplish his purposes, whatever they may be.

The first link in this chain of wonderful events which was destined to culminate in the redemption of the earth from the curse and the blessing of all the nations, was the selection of one nation or people from among all nations of the earth which God saw fit to call his own. This selection began by the calling out of Abraham from the land of the Chaldees into the land of Canaan. Abraham obeyed the call of God and was blessed for so doing. He was afterward more severely tested and proved true, and for his faith and obedience God promised to give to him and his seed all the land which he then beheld, and told him that all nations should yet be blessed in him. From this nucleus, we cannot note particularly this nation through the sweep of the ages. The first we see of them as a nation, is when delivered from Egyptian bondage. God then changed their time and made that period to them the beginning of months. To this nation God gave a system of laws founded on moral and sanitary principles, vastly superior to any ever founded by mortal man. He gave to them a part of the land he had promised to Abram, Isaac and Jacob. He gave them kings and prospered them. They forsook him and went after the idols of the heathen nations by which they were surrounded. He left them to the power of their foes. When they returned to him he blest them.

Finally, in the reign of Zedekiah, the last of the kings of Judah, and one of the most wicked and insubordinate, the Lord says by the mouth of his holy prophet, Ezek. xxi., "Remove the diadem, take off the crown (from the head of Zedekiah): I will overturn, overturn, overturn (the kingdom of Judah) and it shall be no more (the kingdom) till he come whose right it is, and I will give it him."

Since then Judah has not been a kingdom, nor will it be till he come whose right it is to sit upon the throne of his father David and reign over the House of Jacob forever! More than eighteen centuries ago Jesus came into the world just as foretold by the prophets hundreds of years before.

Nowhere in revelation are we told that he existed previous to that time, only in the purpose of God. The worlds were not made by him, but by the Logos, the word of God's power, and by that same power the ages were arranged for the Christ, his birth was announced by angelic messengers who proclaimed peace on earth and good will to men. He was dealt with by his parents after the manner of other children, and was subject to them. We are told that he grew both in wisdom and in stature, and in favor with God and men. This conclusively proves that at the first he was an undeveloped character.

John the Baptist who was prophesied of as one who should announce the immediate approach of the Messiah, the Christ, came and fulfilled his mission. Thousands flocked to hear his preaching, and were by him baptized in the river Jordan unto repentance. With this multitude came Jesus of Nazareth and he too was baptized of John. Not because he had committed sin, for this he never did. But he inherited a fleshly nature, and to such baptism was but the fulfilment of a righteous law which he knew it were best to obey. In coming up out of the water he was publicly acknowledged of God as his beloved Son, and there he was anointed or set apart for the work of his ministry. That is the preaching of the gospel of the kingdom.

This gospel of the kingdom was the good news of the re-establishment of the kingdom of Israel and Judah. This was the gospel which before was preached unto Abraham, when God called him out and told him that all nations should yet be blest in him, and this included the restoration of all things spoken of by all the holy prophets since the world began. Manifestly it was not the design of the Almighty to restore the kingdom at this time, because, when restored, it was his design that it should abide forever, and this could not be with a mortal king at its head, and such and only such a nature had the Christ as yet attained.

To aid him in his mission he chose, or appointed certain followers whom he told to go only to his own, or the Jewish people. For about three and a half years they continued to proclaim the glad tidings of the kingdom. But his own people refused to accept him as their king, and when they brought him before Pilate and accused him as an imposter and blasphemer, they boldly declared they had no king but Cæsar. Christ acknowledged to Pilate that he was the Son of God, that he was a king, the king of the Jews, that for this purpose he was born into the world. Pilate found no fault in him, yet he complied with the request of the multitude and delivered him into their hands to be crucified, and he was crucified, the just for the unjust; that is, though a just and good man, he was sacrificed or slain as if he were an unjust one, and because that he would not deny that he was the Son of God, the future king of Israel. He knew well the joy that was set before him in the everlasting future if only he endured to the end. He did endure to the very end, to the death, even the death of the cross, being fully assured that as a reward for this perfect obedience God would raise him from the dead, and bestow upon him an immortal incorruptible nature.

The light of his life went out on the cross when in pleading accents he said, "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do." It was written and placed over his head upon the cross, that all might know the only crime laid to his charge:

JESUS OF NAZARETH, THE KING OF THE JEWS.

He was laid to rest in the cold, silent tomb, and the fond hope cherished by his followers, that he was the Messiah, the promised heir to David's throne, died out with the setting sun of that day of gloom, because that as yet they did not comprehend why he at first came into the world as a man of sorrows. As yet they know not that perfection of character would surely bring its reward, a resurrection from the dead. Nevertheless it did, and in three days they again beheld their risen Lord in their midst.

Yes, by the power of the Almighty, the bands of death were loosened, for it was not possible that he should be holden of them. He, the Christ, the second Adam, came forth from the dead to die no more. He alone of all the human family was raised to die no more; thus proving to the world that it is possible to attain to a resurrection, to immortality. Thus opening the way to a future life, bringing that life and immortality to light through the gospel.

By faith and obedience he obtained immortality, and it is only by following him in the exercise of these virtues that any of our race will ever attain to an endless life. Jesus of Nazareth died as no other man ever died. He died not as a martyr to some theory or opinion. He died not as a philanthropist seeking a temporal blessing on a certain class of suffering humanity. Neither did he die as a substitute for our race, seeing that all die since, as well as before; good and bad, old and young alike. Neither did he die to cancel a debt that had been contracted between the Creator and the created. He did not do as the poet sings, "pay it all;" that was not his mission. He did not die to save immortal souls from endless torment, for there are no souls to be tormented endlessly. (Origin first introduced this heathen dogma into the Christian church early in the third century, at which time he also applied his allegorical method of interpreting the Scriptures.)

Jesus of Nazareth came into the world as the king of the Jews, as the rightful heir to David's throne and kingdom, prospectively. He came as a child, he grew to man's estate, and his whole life was one of perfect obedience. This perfection of character excited the jealousy and envy of the high priests and the rulers of the Jews, and they sought to make him deny that he was the Son of God, the future king of Israel. These facts he refused to deny, and this denial led him to the cross, to his death. Had he denied who and what he was, he need not have died as he did, though death would at some time have claimed him as a victim, for as yet he possessed only a mortal nature. That which is immortal cannot die. But by not yielding to temptation, but in all things retaining his integrity, he was accounted worthy of a resurrection from the dead, and an exhaltation up to heaven, from whence in due time he will appear on this earth to claim the rulership of the whole world.

After he rose from the dead he told his followers to go into all the world, and preach the gospel. His own nation had persistently rejected him; he wept over them and said, "Behold, your house is left unto you desolate," and how truly this was to them verified within forty years, history faithfully records.

He went outside Jerusalem with his few chosen ones and while yet he was blessing them, he was taken up into heaven, and the angels who beheld their astonishment and grief said to them, "This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Then and not till then will war, and tumult, and anarchy, and oppression cease. Then and not till then will a king reign in righteousness, and princes rule in judgment. Then and not till then will the whole earth be filled with the knowledge of the Lord. The religious world may glory in her many schemes for converting the heathen, and nurture within her bosom, and pass by at her own doors, worse than heathen millions! Nihilists and Socialists may explode every Parliament building, castle, tower and palace in broad christendom, and erect upon their ruins other systems of government as faulty as those just vanquished! Politicians may weave the subtlest schemes for the amelioration of all human wrongs, and the establishment of the highest possible human rights. But these all, all will vanish as the gossamer before the breeze of morn, when the coming man appears to inaugurate his reign of everlasting righteousness.

In conclusion I will briefly notice what the work of the coming man will be. First it will be to establish the fifth universal monarchy on the earth; this will be under, not above, the whole heavens. This work will of necessity lead to a subjugation of all other existing systems of government. The insubordinate will be utterly overpowered and destroyed. Those who acknowledge his rightful sovereignty will be left to enjoy the blessings of his reign. The curse will be removed from the whole earth, and thus it will be fitted for a higher type of humanity than it now supports. Jerusalem, restored, rebuilt, beautified and embellished beyond our present highest conceptions will be the grand metropolis. Into it the wealth and commerce of all nations will continuously be brought.

The Coming Man and the lowly Nazarene.—Now the Christ, the anointed son of David, will sit upon his throne, and from him shall have go forth to the uttermost parts of the earth—laws founded in righteousness, justice and equity.

His associate rulers, the kings and priests of that age, will be his immortalized saints, who like himself, have been tested and survived the test. On them he will have bestowed an incorruptible nature like his own. All the higher, nobler traits of human nature will continue to be more and more developed, and while the eternal cycles of the ages continue to repeat themselves, man, purified and immortalized, will continue to enjoy the highest type of existence, as real as he now enjoys an inferior condition.

These assertions are not the mighty cogitations or day-dreams of a single fevered brain. No! No!! These grand and glorious truths are all taught in the revealed word of the living God. They have been believed by thousands and millions all down through the sweep of centuries. They are believed today by all those who have rejected Origin's allegorical method of interpreting the Scriptures, and take them as they read. By his system of interpretation everything is resolved into a myth, an immaterial, incomprehensible non-entity, fitted only to dwell in that ethereal region of which the poet sings, that lies "beyond the bounds of time and space"—which being literally interpreted simply means—no where.

In the political platform on which I stand, there no "ifs." The candidate has been duly elected. Being fully tested he was found thoroughly competent. On the political banner under which I labor, there are no stains—no foul blots. There are no rings. To every son and daughter of our race, the franchise is freely offered. No preference is given either to sex or nationality. The only pre-requisite is loyalty, as that includes all else, and surely this is but simple justice.

The entrance to that fair land is guarded by a vigilance that accepts no bribes, that tolerates no hypocrisy.

Editor Restitution:

I will write but a short letter, as I have but little of interest to report.

On the 7th of last December, I was attacked by asthma. I commenced using the medicine recommended by Bro. Kidwell, of Arkansas. I remained at home until Jan. 14, and received very much relief from this medicine, but it would not break up the attack. It however is the best medicine I have found, and it might permanently cure where the disease has not become chronic. I hereby thank Bro. Kidwell for the recipe.

Leaving home Jan. 14, I went to Woodland, Yolo Co., where I remained two weeks. From there I went to Auburn, Placer Co., and remained near that town with the family of J. W. Hulbert, about four weeks. I preached a few times, but there was so much rain, and the roads were so bad, that some who desired to could not attend.

I then went to Bro. Tolbert Hays's, near Colfax, on the Central Pacific R. R. The altitude of this place is about 2,300 feet above the sea. Auburn is 1,300 feet high. At these places I had no symptom of asthma. I remained at Bro. Hays's one week, preached five times, and baptized Bro. Hays's son and two other young men.

I then returned to Woodland, and preached three times in the Baptist church house; but there was so much rain that the attendance was not very large.

I had an appointment at Willow Slough, but on account of rain it had to be abandoned. After remaining there one week I returned home in excellent health. In less than twenty-four hours after my return, the asthma commenced again, and as I failed to throw it off with medicine, I reluctantly left home, after a stay of ten days, and came to this place, where the difficulty left me without the aid of medicine.

I have been holding some meetings in the Christian Chapel in Kelseyville. Last Sunday Miss Maggie Stone came and made the good confession, and is to be baptized next Sunday. Tomorrow night there is to be a meeting for the purpose of asking and answering questions. (Bible questions). I think there will be a good supply of questions, and God being my helper, I trust to be able to correctly answer them. It may take more than one evening to get through with them. I believe such meetings can be made very profitable. I expect to remain here until the weather becomes settled, as we are now having "the latter rains."

The death of Bro. Hugh Barnhill was a terrible shock to us. I have known him as far back as I can remember, and I do not know of any man of my acquaintance who has left a better record for piety and morality, and of more unbounded generosity. He was a man in whom we could confide. But, alas! death now has the victory over my dearly beloved uncle and brother. We confidently believe his sleep will be broken ere long by the coming of the great Life-giver. Till then we bid him a kindly adieu, and now may we all be prepared to meet him, clothed with immortality and eternal life, with the vigor and bloom of eternal youth. What a blessed hope is set before us! Certainly we cannot afford to spend our time with the fleeting things of this world, and neglect to prepare ourselves for the glorious things connected with the world to come.

I also learn from THE RESTITUTION that Bro. R. Willard has also gone under the power of the enemy—death. Do we all realize that soon the names of others will also be announced as having closed their labors in this world? Let us work while we can, and secure the right to eternal life. Our race for that life is a short one, but cannot be repeated. In hope.

Enclosed find $1.00 for Missionary fund. It is now going on four years since I have been reading your valuable paper, and I would not like to do without it any more. There are but a few here in this place of the one true faith. We try hard most every day to convince some of their mistake, but they appear to be willingly ignorant. I say the Bible is a plain and harmonious book when rightly understood, and is able to make us wise unto salvation. Oh, if only all mankind would believe this and study it with a sincere desire to know the truth and obey its teaching. I often say to myself and wonder how long will we have to see and witness daily this world, love their own and stray away from the true word of God. So brothers and sisters while we live here, let us hope and wish for our daily prayer to be answered soon, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as in heaven." The time may be near, as we think, for therefore let us watch and pray to be accepted when he comes who is to be King of kings, and Lord of all. Your sister in Christ,

NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S DOORSTEP.

The idea of the doorstep of Nebuchadnezzar being in the British Museum, seems strange enough. And yet the fact appears to be so. The Daily News points out that in the Egyptian and Assyrian gallery at the British Museum, and in close contiguity to the Hittite monuments and the bronze gates of Shalmaneser, there has just been placed a bronze doorstep from the great temple of E-Saggil, at Borsippa, a suburb or division of Babylon. The doorstep not only has inscribed on it the name of Nebuchadnezzar, but also mentions his health or restoration to health. The doorstep may thus have been a votive offering. The thought may suggest itself whether the inscription on the doorstep has any relation to the madness of Nebuchadnezzar spoken of in the well-known words of the 4th chapter of Daniel, which record how the renowned monarch, after looking with pride on the great Babylon which he had built, was in the "same hour driven from amongst men, and did eat grass as oxen, and his body was wet with the dews of heaven, till his hairs were grown like eagles's feathers, and his nails like birds' claws." It would not, however, be easy to make such an identification. The temple of E-Saggil, to which the doorstep pertained, was a famous seat of Babylonian idolatry, and remained such until the time of Nabonidus, the last Babylonian king. The dedication of the doorstep would thus scarcely be consistent with Nebuchadnezzar's worshipping the God of Israel, as mentioned in Daniel iv. 34-37.

The two newly recovered cuneiform inscriptions of Nebuchadnezzar were not found on the eastern slope of the western Mount Lebanon, as the brief notice hitherto given would lead one to suppose, but near the northern end of the eastern range, the ancient Mount Lebanon proper, at about two hours' distance from Hermel, a village situated near the Orontes, and well-known by a very singular Syrian monument of sepulchral character—a nephesh—which has often been visited and described by tourists. They are engraved on the rock of a valley called Wadi Brissa, and are placed, opposite of each other, on the right and on the left of the pathway up the bed of the wild gorge. They measured nearly seventeen feet in length by about nine in height; and are written, one in arabaic, and the other in durative cuneiform characters, divided in nineteen columns. Each one is accompanied by a bas-relievo; that of the first representing a personage with the Assyrian tiara as head-dress, turned toward the left and raising an animal standing erect on its hind legs, possibly a lion. Beneath this personage there must have been some image of divinity, which has completely disappeared, while one can still read lower still:

"To the goddess....

Who exalts....

Who inhabits the temple of Gula, the temple"....

The bas-relief of the second inscription represents a man, in the posture of adoration before a tree, having a curiously shaped and pointed cap on his head, somewhat similar to the mitre, closed at the top, worn still by bishops. The two inscriptions contain each a different text; but both begin by the titles of Nebuchadnezzar: "Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, the illustrious Pastor, the servant of Merodak, the great Lord, his Creator, and of Nebo his illustrious son, whom his Royalty loves." Unhappily neither of the new inscription contains any historical passage, the king in them contenting himself with giving an account of the buildings he is having constructed in Babylon.

DIVINE RELATIONS.

Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? Job xi. 7.

The divine nature is incomprehensible to our finite understanding. We cannot grasp the infinite in space nor the everlasting in duration. Imagination, in its wildest flights, cannot conceive of space as unlimited, nor can it, by any possibility, place a boundary with no space beyond. Neither can it grasp duration unending, nor fix a final hour to the onward flow of ages. Though the infinitudes of space may unfold the universes, yet the heaven of heavens cannot contain God. 2 Chron. vi. 18. Equally incomprehensible in his relation to duration. From everlasting to everlasting he is God, even inhabiting eternity. Ps. xc. 2; Isa. lvii. 15.

Before the idea of an infinite and eternal God, the human mind shrinks into its nothingness in wonder, awe, and admiration. This infinite and eternal Jehovah has a relationship of being which is expressed by the august word FATHER. As this is a term of co-relationship, its correspondent denominative is SON, and in the highest acceptation of this word it belongs to only one being in all the universe of God. Angels are called sons of God, and Adam is called the son of God, being such by their creation. The saved of mankind are called sons of God in a peculiar sense, being such by redemption. But in the whole range of intelligences there is only one Son of God in the strict co-relationship of these denominatives, Father and Son. This co-relationship is thus definitely expressed:

"And the word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father) full of grace and truth." No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son which dwelleth in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him." For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. We feel to love and revere him, too, in whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins. May we never through false teachers, foretold by the apostle, be seduced to deny the Lord who bought us, nor to account the blood of the covenant with which we are sanctified an unholy or common thing, and thus insult the spirit of grace. As we may write more in the future, we sleep for the present with declaring that, for ourself, we have most exalted views of the nature, character, and attributes of our dear and adorable Redeemer. Dear Lamb of God, Thou wast slain and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood," and we hope to soon see the enthroned King of kings and Lord of lords.

CHURCH HISTORY.

In this number we give from the New York Independent that part of the document entitled—"Teaching of the Apostles"—that precedes the epistles, or chapters given in a former number from the same enterprising journal. It will be noticed that these preliminary sections or chapters amount to six; which with the ten succeeding ones given in that former number amount to sixteen. On the future of human destiny, the "positively features" are that life and death are the doctrines.

THE "TEACHING OF THE APOSTLES."

In our article of Feb 27th we gave an advance translation of the latter part of the "Teaching," the part which was unknown before. Since then a remarkable interest has been taken in the work by our American scholars, and three complete translations have appeared, made from the text of Bryennius, one by Professors Hitchcock and Brown (with their reprint of the Greek text), one in the Andover Review, by Mr. Sterbuck, and one by Prof. Frederick Gardiner in the Churchman. We give, today, our translation of the first six chapters known as "The Two Ways," and found in a variety of shapes in the literature of the Early Church. We have taken advantage of American, English and German investigations thus far.

Observe, in advance, the circumstance that Matt. xxviii. 19, 20 seems to give the frame upon which this "Teaching" is built up. a. "Teach all nations" corresponds with the "Two Ways" of life and of death, the first six chapters which stand below. b. "Baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost" is found in chapter seventh. c. "Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you" is the continuation in chapters eight to fifteen. And, although there is no emphasizing of the "Lo! I am with you always." (d.) the "end of the world," is chapter sixteenth.

In Germany the discussion is still in progress, if, indeed, the first surprise can be said to be so far overcome as to leave room for the discussion to begin. Harnack still inclines to the years, say 140 to 150, and to Egypt as the country in which it arose, and Delitzsch seems to agree with him. Luthardt thinks it belongs to Northern Palestine and about the year 100. We may add that the Archimandrite Bapheides, in reviewing Bryennios's book in a Constantinople journal, (the Ecclesiastic Aletheia) declares himself to be in favor of the date 100. There can be little doubt that this date is too early. Harnack, whose knowledge of the first three centuries is of the widest character, is publishing the "Teaching" in the first fasciculus of the second volume of "Texte und Untersuchungen," and a proof of the first sheets lies before us, containing the Greek text and a German translation in parallel columns. Full notes are in the printer's hands, and prolegomena with excursus are almost ready. Let us turn to the text:

TEACHING OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES.

Teaching of the Lord through the twelve apostles to the nations.

I.—1. There are two ways—one of life, and one of death; and there is a great difference between the two ways. 2. The way of life, then, is this: First, Thou shalt love God, that made thee; second, thy neighbor as thyself; and all things that thou dost not wish done to thee, do them not thyself to another. 3. The teaching of these words is this: Bless those who curse you and pray for your enemies, and fast for those who persecute you; for what kind of grace is it if ye love those that love you? Do not the heathen the same? But love those that hate you, and you shall not have an enemy. 4. Abstain from fleshly and worldly desires. If any one give thee a blow on the right cheek, turn the other also to him, and thou shalt be perfect; if any one compel thee to go a mile, go with him two; if any one take away thy cloak, give him thy coat also; if any one take from thee that which is thine do not demand it back. (The text adds: "For indeed thou canst not"; which is not quite clear.) 5. Give to every one that asketh of thee, and demand it not again; for the Father wishes that some be given to all out of the favors which have been bestowed upon such. Blessed is he that giveth according to the commandment; for he is innocent. Woe to him that receiveth; for if any one in need receiveth he shall be innocent; but he who is not in need shall give satisfaction, wherefore he received and to what end; and being put in prison, he shall be examined as to what he has done; and he shall not come out thence till he pay back the last farthing. 6. Moreover, concerning this also it is said: Let thine alms sweat in thy hands ("drop down on thy hands"—J. W." (John Wordsworth, Prebendary of Lincoln?) in The Guardian, March 19th) till thou knowest to whom thou givest.

II.—1. The second commandment of the teaching. 2. Thou shalt not murder, thou shalt not commit adultery, thou shalt not commit pederasty, thou shalt not go with harlots, thou shalt not steal, thou shalt not use magic arts; thou shalt not prepare poisons, thou shalt not commit abortion, neither shalt thou kill the child that has just been born, thou shalt not desire that which is thy neighbor's. 3. Thou shalt not swear, thou shalt not bear false witness, thou shalt not backbite, thou shalt not cherish revenge. 4. Thou shalt not be double-minded, nor double-tongued; for a double-tongue is a snare of death. 5. Thy speech shall not be false nor empty, but filled with the deed. 6. Thou shalt not be an avaricious man, or a robber, or a hypocrite, or an evil-minded man, or a puffed-up man; thou shalt not take evil counsel against thy neighbor. 7. Thou shalt hate no man, but some shalt reprove and for these thou shalt pray (or: "for some thou shalt pray,") and some thou shalt love more than thine own soul.

III.—1. My child, flee from every evil and from everything that is like it. 2. Be not given to anger, for anger leads to murder; be neither jealous nor quarrelsome nor touchy, for from all of these murders arise. 3. My child, be not lustful, for lust leads to harlotry, neither a speaker of obscene words, neither a man of lofty eyes (the sense here seems to be one who stares around at women), for from all of these sins of adultery arise. 4. My child, be not an augur (one who prophecies from the flight or voice of birds), since that leads to idolatry, nor a conjurer nor an astrologer nor a cleanser (one who pretends to cleanse from diseases or from sin by sacrifices or other processes), neither wish to look at these things, for from all of these idolatry arises. 5. My child, be not a liar, since lying leads to stealing, nor a covetous man, nor a lover of empty fame, for from all of these arise thefts. 6. My child, be no murmurer, since it leads to blasphemy, nor self-sufficient, nor evil-minded, for from all of these blasphemies arise. 7. Be meek, for "the meek shall inherit the earth." 8. Be long-suffering and merciful and free from evil, and quiet and good and always attentive to the words (literally "trembling at the words;" compare Isa. lxvi. 2) which thou hearest. 9. Thou shalt not exalt thyself, neither shalt thou give self-confidence a place in thy soul. Thy soul shalt not cleave to the lofty ones, but thou shalt converse with the just and the humble. 10. What soever things befall thee, accept them as good things, knowing that nothing happens without God.

IV.—1. My child, him that speaketh to thee the word of the Lord shalt thou keep in mind night and day, and thou shalt honor him as the Lord, for whence the authority (there is a play on the words in the original: "The lordship.....the Lord." The sense is: "Where the Lord's word is spoken, there the Lord is. From whence the Lord's person speaks," J. W.," in the Guardian) is spoken, there the Lord is. 2. Seek daily the faces of the saints, that thou mayest find refreshment in their words. 3 Thou shalt cause no division, but rather pacify those quarreling; thou shalt judge justly, thou shalt not respect persons in reproving for faults. 4. Thou shalt not be of doubtful soul, whether (a thing shall be or not. ("Thou shalt not be a double soul." Harnack thinks it should be rendered: "Doubt not whether (God's judgment) will come or not.") 5. Be not a stretcher out of the hand in reference to receiving, and a withdrawer of the hand in reference to giving. 6. If thou hast, with thy hands thou shalt give a ransom for thy sins. 7. Thou shalt not hesitate to give nor shalt thou murmur in giving, for thou shalt know who the good Repayer of the reward is. 8. Thou shalt not turn away the needy man, but share all things with thy brother, and thou shalt not say that they are thine own; for if ye are sharers in that which is immortal how much more in mortal things. 9. Thou shalt not withhold thine hand from thy son or from thy daughter, but from youth thou shalt teach them the fear of the Lord. 10. Thou shalt not command thy servant or thy maid, who hope in the same God, in thy bitterness, lest they cease to fear the God who is over both, for does he not come to call with respect to persons, but [he comes] to those whom the spirit has prepared. 11. And ye servants be obedient to your masters as to the type of God, in reverence and fear. 12. Thou shalt hate all hypocrisy and everything that is not pleasing to the Lord. 13. Thou shalt not neglect the commands of the Lord, but keep what thou hast received neither adding nor taking away. 14. In the church thou shalt confess thy faults and thou shalt not come to thy prayer with an evil conscience. This is the Way of Life

V.—1. But the way of death is this: first of all it is evil and full of curse; murders, adulteries, lusts, whoredoms, thefts, idolatries, conjurations, poisonmakings, robberies, false witnessings, hypocrisies, double-heartedness, deceit, pride, wickedness, self-sufficiency, avarice, base speech, envy, impudence, high-mindedness, boasting. 2. Persecutors of good men, hating truth, loving lying, not knowing the reward of righteousness, not joined to that which is good nor to just judgment, attentive not to that which is good, but to that which is evil, from whom meekness and patience are afar, loving vain things, hastening after revenge, not pitying the poor, not laboring with them that are in distress, not knowing him that made them, murdering children, destroying what God has formed (These two phrases refer to the practices forbidden in chapter ii, verse 2, in an inverted order; the one is killing the child just born, the other killing the unborn child.), turning away the needy, distressing the oppressed, helpers of the rich, lawless judges of the poor, sinning in every way. Withdraw yourselves, children, from all these people.

VI.—1. See that no man cause thee to err from this way of the teaching, since he teaches thee without God. 2. If then thou art able to bear all the yoke of the Lord thou shalt be perfect; but if thou art not able, what thou art able this do. 3. Concerning food, endure what thou art able. But keep thyself carefully from that which is sacrificed to idols, for that is the service of dead gods.

Among the points to be noticed in these opening chapters we mention a few.

The way of life is the way of Acts ii, 2; xix, 9, 23; xxii, 4; xxiv, 14, 22, and the two ways are the "broad way and the narrow way of Matthew."

Fasting as well as praying for one's enemies is commanded. But fasting and fame, for from all of these arise thefts. 6. My child, be no murmurer, since it leads to blasphemy, nor self-sufficient, nor evil-minded, for from all of these blasphemies arise. 7. Be meek, for "the meek shall inherit the earth." 8. Be long-suffering and merciful and free from evil, and quiet and good and always attentive to the words (literally "trembling at the words;" compare Isa. lxvi. 2) which thou hearest. 9. Thou shalt not exalt thyself, neither shalt thou give self-confidence a place in thy soul. Thy soul shalt not cleave to the lofty ones, but thou shalt converse with the just and the humble. 10. What soever things befall thee, accept them as good things, knowing that nothing happens without God.

IV.—1. My child, him that speaketh to thee the word of the Lord shalt thou keep in mind night and day, and thou shalt honor him as the Lord, for whence the authority (there is a play on the words in the original: "The lordship.....the Lord." The sense is: "Where the Lord's word is spoken, there the Lord is. From whence the Lord's person speaks," J. W.," in the Guardian) is spoken, there the Lord is. 2. Seek daily the faces of the saints, that thou mayest find refreshment in their words. 3 Thou shalt cause no division, but rather pacify those quarreling; thou shalt judge justly, thou shalt not respect persons in reproving for faults. 4. Thou shalt not be of doubtful soul, whether (a thing shall be or not. ("Thou shalt not be a double soul." Harnack thinks it should be rendered: "Doubt not whether (God's judgment) will come or not.") 5. Be not a stretcher out of the hand in reference to receiving, and a withdrawer of the hand in reference to giving. 6. If thou hast, with thy hands thou shalt give a ransom for thy sins. 7. Thou shalt not hesitate to give nor shalt thou murmur in giving, for thou shalt know who the good Repayer of the reward is. 8. Thou shalt not turn away the needy man, but share all things with thy brother, and thou shalt not say that they are thine own; for if ye are sharers in that which is immortal how much more in mortal things. 9. Thou shalt not withhold thine hand from thy son or from thy daughter, but from youth thou shalt teach them the fear of the Lord. 10. Thou shalt not command thy servant or thy maid, who hope in the same God, in thy bitterness, lest they cease to fear the God who is over both, for does he not come to call with respect to persons, but [he comes] to those whom the spirit has prepared. 11. And ye servants be obedient to your masters as to the type of God, in reverence and fear. 12. Thou shalt hate all hypocrisy and everything that is not pleasing to the Lord. 13. Thou shalt not neglect the commands of the Lord, but keep what thou hast received neither adding nor taking away. 14. In the church thou shalt confess thy faults and thou shalt not come to thy prayer with an evil conscience. This is the Way of Life

V.—1. But the way of death is this: first of all it is evil and full of curse; murders, adulteries, lusts, whoredoms, thefts, idolatries, conjurations, poisonmakings, robberies, false witnessings, hypocrisies, double-heartedness, deceit, pride, wickedness, self-sufficiency, avarice, base speech, envy, impudence, high-mindedness, boasting. 2. Persecutors of good men, hating truth, loving lying, not knowing the reward of righteousness, not joined to that which is good nor to just judgment, attentive not to that which is good, but to that which is evil, from whom meekness and patience are afar, loving vain things, hastening after revenge, not pitying the poor, not laboring with them that are in distress, not knowing him that made them, murdering children, destroying what God has formed (These two phrases refer to the practices forbidden in chapter ii, verse 2, in an inverted order; the one is killing the child just born, the other killing the unborn child.), turning away the needy, distressing the oppressed, helpers of the rich, lawless judges of the poor, sinning in every way. Withdraw yourselves, children, from all these people.

VI.—1. See that no man cause thee to err from this way of the teaching, since he teaches thee without God. 2. If then thou art able to bear all the yoke of the Lord thou shalt be perfect; but if thou art not able, what thou art able this do. 3. Concerning food, endure what thou art able. But keep thyself carefully from that which is sacrificed to idols, for that is the service of dead gods.

Among the points to be noticed in these opening chapters we mention a few.

The way of life is the way of Acts ii, 2; xix, 9, 23; xxii, 4; xxiv, 14, 22, and the two ways are the "broad way and the narrow way of Matthew."

Fasting as well as praying for one's enemies is commanded. But fasting and prayer are so closely connected in the Scriptures that it is not clear that this means anything more than praying. Still the germ of a heresy may be found here.

The commands for liberality in giving are very emphatic, and the correlative command to be slow to receive benefactions shows that a class of lazy paupers were attaching themselves to the Church. The origin of the quotation "Let thine alms sweat in thy hands until thou know to whom thou mayest give" is not known. So we say that one's hands itch to give.

The grossness of the sins against which candidates for baptism are warned indicates the terrible wickedness of the world about them. Murder adultery, infanticide, fetiside, poisoning, and nameless sins are included.

There seems to be the germ of a later heresy in the paragraph which declares that beneficence provides a ransom for sin.

The confession of sins "in the Church," that is, in the congregation, is yet a great way off from the circular confession of the later days.

The tolerance given to those who are "not able" to keep all these commandments is noticeable, as also the strict prohibition of the use of food offered to idols. This shows a stricter rule than Paul cared to enforce.

The instruction of these six chapters seem to have been repeated to the candidates, who were, very likely, required to commit it to memory. It is marked for its purely ethical character. This is most strenous and imperative, and reminds one of the answers in the Episcopal Catechism, especially the long one beginning "My duty towards my neighbor is, to love him as myself." All the theological doctrines which one can gather from this portion are, that there is a God who made us and who loves all men, who hears prayer, to whom we must "give account," that "without God nothing occurs," that there is a "word of God" which is "spoken" (reading not mentioned); that the Spirit leads men into the truth; that "the Lord" (Christ) has given commandments to be obeyed, which must neither be added to nor taken from (thus perhaps still orally transmitted). This is all. Theology is still implicit, not yet explicit; and being a Christian means accepting Christ as Messiah and teacher, and obeying his great command of love to God and self-sacrifice for men.

SIGNS AND FOREBODINGS.

"And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken. And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory." Luke xxi, 25-27.

A DARK SUN.

Last evening at 6 o'clock there was a green sun. All the clouds about the sun were green, and the clear sky in the immediate vicinity was of that color. After sun set the natural red appeared, and persisted for a long time. This display of a green sun and green clouds follows the great solar storms which were coincident with the cyclones of the past two weeks. The great sunstorm which we noted on Friday morning as showing the largest group of spots in three years was seen on the sun's extreme edge yesterday going out of view. It appeared as a large notch in the sun's limb, showing a great depression in the photosphere. The chain of sun spots which appeared last Tuesday is now fairly in view. The area involved is very great.—Rochester Chronicle and Democrat, April 7.

ATMOSPHERIC PHENOMENA.

Something like a repetition of the splendid aerial phenomena which were witnessed in various parts of America, England and France toward the end of last year has recently been noticed at Paris. M. Joubert describes the appearance of these new phenomena in a letter which he has sent to the Academy of Science. At four o'clock in the morning his attention was drawn to a flame of extraordinary brilliancy reflected on the mirror in his room. Looking in an easterly direction he saw the heavens from the horizon to a height of about twenty-two degrees illuminated in a magnificent manner. Objects around were seen distinctly, and in the atmosphere the partial mists and vapors were covered with every conceivable variety of tint, from a deep blood-red fringing the horizon in a limitless line to soft streaks of violet fading away toward the zenith. These splendid hues gradually disappeared before the approach of dawn. These must be included among the "great sights from heaven," foretold by Christ to precede his second coming, as shown in Luke xxi. 11. Such events though referrable by materialists and rationalistic unbelievers generally to second and solely natural causes, are yet by earnest Christians watched with an interest as time rolls on, that deepens in its intensity, for such phenomena are regarded by them as so many intimations of the near approach of the end of the age and the ushering in of a new dispensation.—Christian Herald.

A TERRIBLE TIME APPROACHING.

The period between 1880 and 1885 cannot fail to excite the liveliest interest with astronomers, as the four great planets, Saturn, Neptune, Uranus and Jupiter, will then be in perihelion for the first time in about 4,000 years, and in consequence of this remarkable event it is believed that the climatic conditions of the earth will be disturbed and produce alternate degrees of excessive heat, cold, rains, floods, hurricanes, and fatal epidemics. During the sixth and sixteenth centuries of the Christian era three of the above planets were in perihelion, and from that or some other cause floods, hurricanes, earthquakes, sickness and the plague extended over the world and destroyed vasts amounts of life and property.

In the sixth century the plague broke out in the east, and sweeping over Africa, Asia and Europe, destroyed, it is estimated, 160,000,000 people. The city of Alexandria lost 200,000 inhabitants. In Constantinople 2,000 died per day during three months, and in and around Rome during the same time 3,000 died per day. A large number of cities, villages and provinces in Eastern Europe, Western Asia and Northern Africa were almost depopulated, and remained in that condition several centuries. The people filled panic stricken in every direction, and for miles around these cities the dead were left unburied, and thus filling the air with pestilential odors added additional horrors to the scenes of distress and misery. In the sixteenth century the plague ravaged the world again. Constantinople lost 300,000 people, and in and around Rome, Naples and other cities of Italy, 400,000 died in five years.

Fifteen millions perished in China and 30,000,000 died in the countries bordering on the Red, Black, and Mediterranean Seas. Marseilles lost 76,000 inhabitants in six months, and in and around London 250,000 died in three years, and in that city fires were kept burning day and night to purify the air, which seemed vitiated several years. Ireland lost 300,000 people, Paris 100,000, Madrid 71,000, Alexandria 50,000, and the total loss of life by the plague and famine of the sixteenth century is estimated at 120,000,000. If the foregoing calamities were the result of three planets in perihelion, what may be anticipated from the four now approaching perihelion? The theory entertained is that the perihelion the four great planets will affect the sun and the sun in turn will injuriously affect the earth, and hence disastrous consequences to life and property will follow.—New York World.

Editor Restitution:

Through THE RESTITUTION, to the dear ones scattered abroad, I would pen a few of my thoughts. It is a great pleasure for me to read the minds of the brethren and sisters in the faith; and I feel as if I should contribute my little although it is not much I can say; but variety is the spice of life. I love the doctrine as advocated in THE RESTITUTION; I have taken it a year. We have also taken the World's Crisis the last fourteen years. I have read a great deal of religious literature of the different sects, but nothing to compare with the writings of the advent Christians of the present day. For Biblical scholarship and correct reasoning their simple, truthful arguments and gentle manner in dealing with errors in theology should surely command the attention of every Christian, no matter what his creed or preconceived opinions may have been. The Advent Press, with but few exceptions, speaks in a kind spirit that breathes love and good fellowship to the whole human brotherhood. Those papers are the only preachers we have, and while they preach to us this gospel of the kingdom, we feel to thank God and take courage that we are living so near the consummation of our hope, and by consulting the sure word of prophecy we know our whereabouts. Our surroundings now are the same pleasure loving and fleshly lusts that brought the flood upon the old world and swift destruction upon the cities of the plain. Corrupting sin has become a foul stench in the church. High officials and professors of the lowly Jesus, will stoop to the most shameful debauchery. Oh, how are the mighty fallen! tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon, lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice. But as it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be also at the coming of the Son of man. O how often I have to pray thy kingdom come. Sometimes I feel sick at heart with the cold formality and hypocritical worship of these last days. O Lord keep and preserve us from the evils that surround; the wheat and the tares grow together until the harvest.

MARY WINNER.

WILSON.—At Austin, Ill., at three o'clock, Monday afternoon, April 7, 1884, Sara, wife of James W. Wilson, aged 32.

Sara J. Underwood, daughter of E. and M. Underwood, was born in St. Charles, Ill., Dec. 15, 1851, and lived at that place until her marriage to Jas. W. Wilson, Oct. 12, 1870. Chicago was then their home until soon after the great fire, when they removed to Austin, which has since been her place of residence. For one half of her short life Sister Sara has been a faithful servant of her Lord, having united with the Church of God at Geneva, Ill., when quite young. She wanted to live for her husband and little ten-year-old daughter, but it was ordered otherwise, and she sleeps, confident that it will be only for a short time, and in the awakening—Joy. Her husband will realize that the home is not home now she is gone; her child will lack a mother's care, no matter how kind others may be; her father and mother must take up the journey of life once more though the way is dreary; her four brothers lose, for a time the kindest [illegible] and the church and [illegible] she lived will [illegible] Wednesday, April 9, services were held at the Baptist Church in Austin. H. V. Reed spoke words of comfort and admonition, after which the remains were taken to St. Charles, Ill., and laid away to await the coming of Jesus. May He soon come and may we all be ready to meet him and our dear sister.

SOME GREAT BLUNDERS CORRECTED.

Campbell in his Appendix to the New Testament, page 29 (A. D. 1832), says, "The phrase eternal life, the burthen of the New Testament, occurs not once in all the Jewish Scriptures."

But this is a serious blunder, for he had previously said, on the same page that eternal and everlasting are "aionios in the original;" and a man of his claims to learning ought to have known that the phrase "everlasting life" occurs in that notable prophecy, Dan. xii. 2, the Greek of which, in its unin flected form, is zoe aionios: the same phrase in the New Testament being translated "eternal life" 99 times, and "everlasting life" 14 times.

A recent and celebrated commentary blunders almost as badly in saying on Dan. xii. 2, "Here only in the Old Testament is "everlasting life mentioned." As that commentator often refers to the Hebrew, he ought to have known that in the Hebrew of this passage the word for everlasting is olam, the very same that is rendered "evermore," in Psa. cxxxiii. 3. "Life for evermore," in that psalm is, therefore, certainly the same as "life everlasting."

But a still greater blunder is contained in a pamphlet lately sent to me, which says, "The Old Testament has no revelation in direct and explicit terms of a future life for any human being; which leaves it unnecessary for me" to remark that the same volume contains no threats of vengeance beyond the grave, either of limited or limitless duration."

Such a sentiment is the more surprising as it comes from a writer so enlightened as to advocate conditional immortality, and to oppose the "second-chance" delusion.

Paul's saying that Christ "brought life and immortality (rather, incorruptibility) to light through the gospel," 2 Tim. i. 10, was not intended to teach that the holy patriarchs had no direct and explicit revelation concerning a future life. Through the gospel our Savior brought life and incorruptibility to light in three ways,

1. By sending the gospel of the kingdom into "all the world," Matt. xxiv. 14, to [illegible] the doctrine of life [illegible] out of its comparative obscurity among the Jews, and made it shine forth to all mankind.

2. Through that gospel he also revealed more clearly both to Jews and Gentiles the way of access to life and incorruptibility, namely, that they cannot be obtained by works alone, apart from the righteousness which is by faith.

3. By his own literal and corporeal resurrection, as we learn "through the gospel," he most luminously illustrated and brought to light, the nature of life and incorruptibility. Paul had seen in vision that risen body in its glorified state shining "at midday above the brightness of the sun."

Thus it was shown that the promised immortality consists of life manifested through an incorruptible body. And this truth had never been so vividly brought to light as in the body of the risen Savior. Nor had it been so generally published to the Gentiles, nor the manner of access to it so clearly revealed, before the Savior rose from the dead and sent the gospel of the kingdom into all the world.

The word photizontos, which the common version renders "brought to light," Rotherham's version renders "illumined." In that sense the passage would teach that Christ "illumined life and incorruptibility through the gospel." Neither rendering denies to the patriarchs the promise of "a future life."

"Through" (dia) in this text, signifies "by means of," and as justification cannot be obtained except "through the faith" (dia tes pisteos), so neither can life and incorruptibility be obtained except "through the gospel," (dia tou euaggeliou). Rom. i. 16; iii. 30. "In order to justification we must embrace the faith; in order to immortality we must believe the gospel; even that "gospel of the kingdom" which our Lord commanded the apostles to preach "in all the world," thus covering the whole "field" and leaving no spot of earth on which divine authority can be found for proclaiming any other gospel. Hence, it is a waste of words to vent so called "charitable" thoughts as to the salvation of this, that, or the other protestant, papist, or pagan, who, after arriving at years of accountability, rejects that gospel.

The holy patriarchs "died in faith (margin, according to faith), not having received the promises, but having seen them and greeted them from afar." Heb. xi. 10, 13; R. V. If those promises had related only to the present life, their dying without receiving them would have been a falsification or frustration of their faith instead of being "according to" or in harmony with it. The expression "according to" is, therefore, very emphatic here, as the ancient Greek believer could see at a glance, and this point of the argument will appear in English also if we follow the exact order of the Greek words, namely. "According to faith died these all, not having received the promises," that is, not having received the things promised. Hence, as rational creatures believing the word of God, there was absolutely no conclusion left for them but that they would receive those things in "a future life." Abraham believed that Isaac would be raised "even from the dead" rather than the promises should fail, and did he not believe that he himself will be raised rather than they shall fail? Would it require any stronger faith to believe in his own resurrection from the dust of the grave, than in Isaac's from the ashes of the altar? Heb. xi. 19.

The gospel was preached to Abraham, and to Israel in the days of Moses; and the holy patriarchs, from righteous Abel, "obtained a good report through the faith," tes pisteos, Heb. xi. 39; iv. 2; Gal. iii. 8. But it would be a contradiction of terms, and utterly incredible, to say that either "the gospel" or the faith which is accounted for righteousness, contains no promise of a future life.

On Heb. xi. 19, Adam Clarke very truly says. "The resurrection of the dead must have been a doctrine of the patriarchs; they expected a heavenly inheritance; they saw they died as did other men; and they must have known that they could not enjoy it but in consequence of a resurrection from the dead."

"How could Abraham and David have understood the covenants made with them, if in those covenants they had seen no direct and explicit references to a future life? To Abraham was promised the land of Canaan not to everlasting possession;" but he died without inheriting "so much as to set his foot upon." Did not that imply and necessitate a future life? Gen. xvii. 8; Ac. vii. 5. "To David it was covenanted that his kingdom shall be established forever "before" him, that is, in his presence; and he died leaving a mortal occupant upon his throne, yet consoling himself with the "everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure." Does not this indicate his expectation of a future life? 2 Sam. vii. 16; xxiii. 5. He prayed for deliverance "from men of the world, which have their portion in this life," implying the hope of having his in the future life, by a resurrection; for he adds, "As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness." Psa. xvii. 14, 15. "Thou shalt quicken me again from the depths of the earth." Psa. lxxi. 20. "God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave." Psa. xlix. 15. Besides this of himself, he also "spake of the resurrection of Christ," saying, my flesh shall rest in hope for thou wilt not leave my soul in sheol, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption." Psa. xvi. 9, 10; Ac. ii. 30, 31. And on the resurrection of Christ depends that of all his redeemed, from Abel to the last one that dies. His resurrection is the pledge of theirs; he the firstfruits, they the harvest. "If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain." 1 Cor. xv. 14.

What can be more direct and explicit than the following. "O that thou wouldest hide me in the grave, that thou wouldest keep me secret until thy wrath be past, that thou wouldest appoint me a set time, and remember me!... Thou shalt call, and I will answer thee; thou will have a desire to the work of thy hands.... Though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God." Job. xiv. 13, 14; xix. 26. "The Lord killeth, and maketh alive; he bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up." 1 Sam. ii. 6. "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead." Isa. xxvi. 19. "I will ransom them from the power of the grave, I will redeem them from death. O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave I will be thy destruction." Hos. xiii. 14. "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." Or, as Tregelles renders it, "many from among the sleepers in the dust of the earth shall awake, these shall be unto everlasting life; but those shall be unto shame." (By "these" is meant the sharers in the first resurrection; by "those" is meant the rest of the sleepers who do not awake at this time, but at the end of the thousand years). "And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever.... Go thou thy way till the end be; for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days." Dan. xii. 2, 3, 13. Instead of "stand in thy lot," Gesenius translates, "arise to thy lot." The Septuagint reads, anastesy epi ten klerosin sou, "thou shalt arise to thy inheritance." The last chapter of Daniel, therefore, teaches very plainly that there shall be a future life, and that it shall be brought about by a resurrection from the dead.

Before the New Testament was written, our Lord said to the Jews, "search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me." Jno. v. 39. This proves that the Jews thus addressed considered eternal life to be promised in the Old Testament Scriptures; and by earnestly "searching" they might also have discovered that the same Scriptures testified of Jesus as the true Messiah. Thousands, even now, admit that the Bible contains the true revelation of eternal life, but they are too indolent to "search" it and find out the specified way, terms, or conditions, of obtaining that life.

Long after Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, died, the Lord said, "I have also established my covenant with them, to give them the land of Canaan, the land of their pilgrimage, wherein they were strangers." And Micah said. "Thou wilt perform the truth to Jacob, and the mercy to Abraham, which thou hast sworn unto our fathers from the days of old." Ex. vi. 4; Mic. vii. 20. But how could this be except in a future life? Does not the simplest mind see in this language a direct and explicit promise of such a life?

And speaking of Israel's restoration, the Lord said. "My servant David shall be their prince forever." Eze. xxxvii. 25. As David, like Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, was dead, how could he become their prince except by resurrection to a future life? If David here means the Messiah, it equally predicted his resurrection, for other prophecies said he would die. His death and resurrection are both implied in one verse. "I will divide him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the spoil with the strong; because he hath poured out his soul unto death." Isa. liii. 12.

The resurrection was taught even in the Apocrypha, when we find these sayings, "The king of the world shall raise us up, who have died for his laws, unto everlasting life." "It is good, being put to death by men, to look for hope from God to be raised up again by him." "Doubtless" the Creator of the world, who formed the generation of man, and found out the beginning of all things, will also of his own mercy give you breath and life again, as ye now regard not your own selves for his law's sake." 2 Mac. vii. 9, 14, 23.

The Pharisees, the principal sect of the Jews, believed in a resurrection of the dead, both just and unjust. Ac. xxiv. 15; xxiii. 8.

Martha believed in the resurrection as an event beyond dispute, saying, "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day." John xi. 24.

All this before the New Testament was written. How, then, was such knowledge obtained, except from the more ancient Scriptures?

But a perfectly conclusive and unanswerable proof that the Old Testament Scriptures taught a resurrection to a future life is found in the words which the Lord addressed to Moses, saying, "I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." Ex. iii. 6, 16. With this single proof text, the Lord Jesus "put to silence" the Sadducees who denied the resurrection, and with this we too may put to silence all who deny that the Old Testament revealed the resurrection and future life. Mat. xxii. 23-34; He does not say, "I was the God of Abraham," etc., as we may suppose he would have said had those patriarchs passed into perpetual non-existence beyond the prospect of resurrection. But in saying, "I am the God of Abraham," etc., he owns himself as still having good in reserve for them; to obtain which they must rise again from the dead. Having the blessing of a future life in store for them, "God is not ashamed to be called their God; for he hath prepared for them a city." Heb. xi. 16. And because he "quickeneth the dead, and calleth the things not being as being," to emphasize the certainty of their future being, it is said, "They all live unto him,"—not, be it remembered, in a disembodied state but in the risen corporeity, which in the foreknowledge of God, is as clearly seen as if it were already present. In his sight Abraham "is not dead but sleepeth." Lu. xx. 37, 38; viii. 52; Rom. iv. 17.

Some years ago a celebrated sectarian preacher expressed surprise that Moses said nothing of an "immortal soul," seeing that the Egyptians believed in it, and Moses was learned in all their wisdom. There is nothing surprising in this, however, for their theory of immortality was not the true one. It is certain that the writings of Moses do teach an immortal body, through a resurrection; as our Lord plainly shows in Lu. xx. 37, where Moses is quoted not to prove that there is an "immortal soul," but "that the dead are raised."

Moses and other holy patriarchs, looking for immortality at the resurrection had much clearer views of the future life than modern Swedenborgians and ancient Greek philosophers ridiculing the resurrection of the body.

Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, "dwelling in tents," "looked for the city (polis) which hath the foundations whose builder and maker is God." (According to the lexicons of Greenfield and Bagster, polis —"city"—means, "A place of permanent residence, abode, home.") And what they looked for, they shall see—"Thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down" as were the unsettled, insecure, and moveable tents in which they sojourned. Heb. xi. 10. We also seek that "continuing city;" it is "to come," —the "New Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God." A city "having the glory of God: and her light like unto a stone most precious even like a jasper stone, clear as crystal," having also the river of life, and tree of life, and monthly fruits, and all blissful things. A city of pure gold, with streets of gold, and gates of pearl, and a great and high wall with foundations of precious stones. "And there shall be no more curse; but the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it; and his servants shall serve him; and they shall see his face; and his name shall be in their foreheads. And there shall be no night there; and they need no candle, neither light of the sun; for the Lord God giveth them light; and they shall reign forever and ever. And he that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them. They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun strike upon them, nor any heat. For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." Rev. vii, xxi, xxii.

In the great question of a future life the patriarchs felt as deep and personal an interest as we, and they were at least as capable of drawing logical and rational conclusions from the promises, and promises afforded them. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob could see as well as we do that the promise of Canaan, "for an everlasting possession," (Gen. xvii. 8), implied necessarily the promise of everlasting life also; and all its cognate and co-eternal blessings. The warm and lively emotions with which they looked forward to a realization of the things promised are graphically depicted in the words, "They saw them afar off and embraced them." Heb. xi, 13. They "saw" them with the eye of faith. The Greek for "embraced" signifies the yearning and affectionate salutation with which one greets a dear friend who is approaching in the distance, or with which returning voyagers greet their native land as they come in sight of its distant promontories.

Would that the whole of the Episcopalian creed were as true and sound as that clause in Article VII, which says. "They are not to be heard which feign that the old fathers did look only for transitory promises."

As to future vengeance on the wicked, that too is taught in the Old Testament Scriptures.

Enoch the seventh from Adam, said, Behold the Lord cometh with ten thousands of his saints, to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him." Jude 14, 15. Jude applied this to the vengeance to be executed on the wicked at the resurrection, and who can deny that Enoch applied it in the same way?

Job said, "Have ye not asked them that go by the way? and do ye not know their tokens, that the wicked is reserved to the day of destruction? they shall be brought forth to the day of wrath." Job xxi. 29, 30.

David said, "The enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs; they shall consume; into smoke shall they consume away." Psa. xxxvii. 20. The first death of the Lord's enemies is usually a natural one and not by burning. Plainly therefore this points to their second death. Do any of the modern "D. D's" express themselves in this "direct and explicit" language concerning the doom of the wicked? Do they not actually have the audacity to deny that the wicked shall, as the fat of lambs, consume away into smoke? Their creed is so directly opposed to David's on this point that it would be utterly incongruous for them to select such an evanescent thing as the fat of lambs, to illustrate their view of the future destruction of the Lord's enemies. The unenlightened heathen are his enemies,—"enemies in their minds by wicked works"—as the Colossians once were. Col. i. 21. Dying in those wicked works, they die enemies. Now, as there is no repentance in the death-state, it follows that if they awake at all they must awake enemies and therefore subject to the great decree that dooms all the "enemies of the Lord" to be consumed into smoke. So then, instead of awaking to a second chance they would be awaking to a "second death."

Ezekiel said, "When a righteous man turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, and dieth in them; for his iniquity that he hath done shall he die." Or to follow the Hebrew tenses more closely, "when a righteous (man) turneth away from his righteousness, and hath committed iniquity, and died in them; for his iniquity that he hath done he shall die." Eze. xviii. 26. Do we not perceive here two deaths of the apostate, —the first "in" his iniquity, and the second "for" his iniquity?

The subject is by no means exhausted, but the testimony already adduced proves very clearly that future rewards and punishments were believed in by ancient patriarchs and prophets; and that they had much clearer views on those points than many modern professors.

"A Little Child shall Lead Them."

Followed by a Sketch—The Last Hours of Our Dear Departed.

This leading on this bright morning in March, when the winter seemed passing and gone, and the grass was springing and hopes reviving to hail the genial season at hand, gave my soul a heavenly refreshing, and I received strength to lift my pen for the delineations that follow this introduction.

After our blessed family worship my little grand child said to me:

"Grandma, read to me about Jesus."

I lifted her on my lap and read where he was taken up and a cloud received him out of their sight, and the visitation of the two men in white raiment, who said, "This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."

"That's it," exclaimed the dear little one, not yet three years old. "Now grandma, find the other," and so I did, and read:

"And he led them out as far as to Bethany, and he lifted up his hands and blessed them. And it came to pass while he blessed them, he was parted from them, and carried up into heaven."

"Grandma, where does the heavenly Jesus live?" she earnestly asked some months ago, and this question caused me to remember this reading, and now it has become a settled wish of hers to hear it at least once a day, and she is sometimes heard repeating portions of it.

That scene at Bethany came to me with a sweetness and fulness that I never felt before. I seemed translated to the spot, and saw Mary and Martha and Lazarus among the beholders, and entered into their feelings as never before—"We shall never entertain him again. I shall never sit at his feet and hear his words of counsel and comfort again. Oh! our sad home. Will he ever come back again? How welcome then the words of the heavenly messengers; and how they treasured them up, and longed for their fulfillment, and oft, it may be, looked heavenward to see if he were coming. Oh! the parting words of earth! Who shall weigh their weight? It is past adding out. When will they cease? When the same Jesus shall come back again to earth; then, and not till then, will they cease. How can we help looking up with the beholders of Bethany, and crying out, "Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly!"

Among the millions that have gone before us our turn has come at last. The light of the house is quenched. The family is dissolved. It is to more. The fragments are here, it is true, but we are no longer a beautiful whole, as in Eden's bowers. The arrow sped, it lodged in the heart of the patriarch, and he is no more. But ere he died he gave us his blessing.

He first called for his eldest son, and as he fell upon his knees and clasped his father's hand in his, his father said, "Is it still your purpose, my son, to go to England?"

"Yes, father, so far as I now know."

Then he blessed him substantially in these words: "God Almighty bless thee, my son, and go with thee and make thee a blessing, and preserve thee unto his heavenly kingdom, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen and amen."

We, each one, now pressed forward for the priceless boon, and we received it—a legacy to be prized above riches. The little sleeping grandchildren were not forgotten, but with his failing strength he cried out, "O yes! God bless the children."

We now fell before the Lord about his bed, and prayed that we might be kept faithful and meet him in peace when Jesus comes. Then the farewell kiss, and another of earth's sad partings was over. Twelve hours from this, on Sunday morning, at my first greeting, he, with closed eyes, responded in these words, and they were his last:

"Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me, bless his holy name."

On Monday morning, at 3:55, Mar. 10, 1851, he ceased to suffer. The silver cord was loosed, and the golden bowl broken, and we alone as never before.

The days of the years of his life were eighty-nine years, seven months, and five days.

Cheerful trust was the characteristic of the few last years of his life. He had no care for the future, saying, I am in God's hands, and all is well. To lighten every one's burden about him was his greatest delight, and his gratitude to his God and to his family, from day to day, seemed unbounded. What a pleasure it was to do anything for him, and how careful he was to save us work. On his dying bed we told him he was the sunshine of the house, and we knew not how to live without him.

"Thus the Lord renews the youth of his children and helps them to bring forth fruit in old age, and "the youth of age is sometimes more attractive than youth itself."

From that ever memorable scene in Bethany, we chose our text for the occasion. "I know he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day." The Lord also gave us the desire of our hearts in the one we chose to officiate in these solemn rites—our beloved pilgrim brother, W. F. Smith, of Philadelphia. He had, at times, been a guest at our house, and we felt that he ever came filled with the spirit of his divine Master, and my dear husband so much prized his comings, and his prayers; and I am persuaded had he ordered every thing himself, he could not have had it more to his own mind.

After the reading of other Scriptures he turned to this scene in Bethany, and it was let to shine out before us in its native simplicity and sublimity. Was there ever a scene like it on the earth? Did ever weeping friends have such a minister? and such words of life spoken to them before, and such tears mingled with theirs? Its fragrance remains fresh and sweet unto this day.

The Master himself seemed in our midst speaking to us in the same tender tones of love and sympathy that he spake to the weeping sisters of Bethany, and we received them as our own, and sat in this benign atmosphere in perfect peace and looked upon the face, beautiful in death, so soon to be made alive to die no more.

The speaker was led to draw a favorable comparison of our home to himself, in his weary rounds, with the home in Bethany to the Lord Jesus as he resorted thither after his weary day in Jerusalem, adding, I found no such an atmosphere anywhere else.

As a cup of Jesus' own mingling, reserved for this the time of my greatest need did this cordial come causing my lone spirit to well up in grateful praise.

In a peaceful glade overlooking a placid sheet of water, near the village of Haddonfield, where "Hudson sleeps," we laid him, to his rest in Jesus' keeping until the coming of that Just One.

Thus died, Rowland Willard, Sr., at Haddonfield, N. J., in a good old age, full of days, and full of praise, and his mantle fell upon his youngest son, who bears his name, and who is the support of his mother, as he was the staff of his father, on whom he leaned with so much love and confidence to the end.

Our three sons—the second of whom chose his father's profession—with their wives, and our precious friends, many of whom have already consoled us by letter, survive to cherish his memory. "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his;" or, let me be found waiting, which is "far better."

THE RISEN CHRIST.

"But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept." 1 Cor. xv. 20.

Joyful Tidings!
"The Lord is risen today!"
No longer must the mourners weep,
Nor call departed Christians dead;
For death is hallowed into sleep
And every grave becomes a bed;
For Christ hath risen, and men shall rise,
For Christ hath won, and men shall win.

—Wesley.

We see in the Risen Christ the end for which man was made, and the assurance that the end is within reach. Christ rose from the grave changed and yet the same; and in him we have the pledge and type of our rising.—Westcott.

What is spring after winter, but nature speaking of the resurrection of her Lord! It is the season when day is lengthening and mastering the night; light is overcoming darkness, and life springing out of apparent death; as in the returning presence of him who is very life and very light, and maketh all things new. Thus as morning and spring return again and again, so, after the manner of Christ's resurrection, and in the image and likeness of God, must men arise, and be renewed day by day, while day by day the outer man perishes.—Isaac Williams.

There are no marks of the crown of thorns upon his brow, yet he looks more than ever a King! The placid sunrise is beautiful, but there is not half so much quiet beauty about it as reigns over that ineffably sweet face. O, look into his eyes, what a depth of love, what a tenderness, yet what an overwhelming power of, love! In his Easter joy, he thought of us and of our salvation, of each one of us by name and look; he will know that joy again when we come before him, to rest forever in his presence.—F. W. Faber.

GOD IS LOVE.

Where shall we go for manifestations of the tenderness, the sympathy, the benignity of God? The philosopher of this world leads us to nature, its benevolent, filial causes, the kind contrivances to increase the sum of sinful happiness: and there he stops —with half his demonstrational But the apostle leads us to the gift bestowed by the Father for the recovery of man's intellectual and moral nature, and to the cross endured by the Son on this high behalf. Go to the heavens, which canopy man with grandour, cheer his successive light, and mark his festivals by their chronology; go to the atmosphere, which invigorates his spirits, and is to him the breath of life; go to the smiling fields, decked with verdure for his eye, and covered with fruits for his sustenance; go to every scene which spreads beauty before his gaze, which is made harmoniously vocal to his ear, which fills and delights the imagination by its glow or by its greatness. We travel with you, we admire with you, we feel and enjoy with you, we adore with you,—but we stay not with you. We hasten onward in search of a demonstration more convincing that "God is love;" and we rest not till we pass into the strange, the mournful, the joyful scenes of Calvary; and, amidst the throng of invisible and astonished angels, weeping disciples, and the mocking multitude, under the arch of the darkened heavens, and with earth trembling beneath our feet, we gaze upon the meek, the resigned, but fainting sufferer, and exclaim, "Herein is love!" Herein, and nowhere else, is it so affectingly, so unequivocally demonstrated, —"Not that we loved God, but that God loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins."—Richard Watson.

WHEN WILL THE NIGHT BE GONE?

JOHN L. WINK.

When will the night be gone?
This long, dark night of sin?
Oh, when will come the dawn
That brings the glory in?

When all our toil shall cease,
And cares shall vex no more,
And we shall rest in peace
On Canaan's happy shore.

To weary ones how sweet
To lay their burdens down;
They bear the cross, 'tis meet
That they should wear the crown.

Teach us, O Lord, to wait
In patience for the day;
Through all the mortal state,
Inspire our hearts to pray.

Thy blessed Kingdom come,
When from every tongue shall rise,
And echo through the dome
Glad songs of paradise.

THE JEWS OF MODERN TIMES.

The Reformation of the sixteenth century tended to alleviate in a certain degree the wretched condition of the Jews, by bringing them more pre-eminently before the world. Throughout the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the study of Hebrew was cultivated by Protestant divines, who derived considerable biblical lore from the channels of rabbinism. These studies caused great surprise to the Romish priests, who spoke of it as a "newly forged tongue yclept Hebrew." Although the Jews were freed from the singular persecution which had disgraced the middle ages, their social condition continued intolerable. The consequence was, that the divines who cultivated that study were frequently stigmatised from the Romish pulpits. In Germany and Poland especially they were the objects of ancient prejudice and hatred and the victims of galling persecution. Europe's science was to the Jew an alien, and Europe's Christianity an abomination.

Von Dohm, one of the councillors of state, was the first that sounded the note for the amelioration of the condition of the Jews. Dohm was ably supported by Lessing; while the influence of such men as Herder, Kant, and Hegel was also beneficial. But all the phenomena of that stirring and thinking time centered in one man—one of those messengers sent by an almighty Providence into the world to divide the light from the darkness. Moses Mendelssohn, who was born in the year 1729, had from his boyhood drank deeply from the fountain of Jewish antiquity, whilst the civilization of Europe bestowed upon him that which no Jew of that age possessed—a thorough classical and philosophical education, for which he was mainly indebted to his friend Lessing. He secured for himself in early life a solid reputation by means of a successful competition with the renowned Kant; after which he devoted himself to the absorbing object of raising his brethren in faith out of their social decrepitude. He translated the pentateuch and the psalms; but so ignorant were his brethren of the German alphabet, through the prejudice engendered by their ill treatment, that he was obliged to use the Hebrew character for his translations. In 1783 Mene-sefe, or the Gatherer, the first periodical ever published by Israelites, was issued by Mendelssohn; and was—with other Hebrew periodicals in Germany, Russia, Austria, and Poland, all printed in the language of Moses—the means of doing much good. And now, more than half of all the newspapers and periodicals in Germany and and Austria are edited and conducted by Jews. A movement was made for a reform of the synagogue, and in 1810 the first reformed synagogue was established at Hamburg by Jacobsohn. An organ was introduced; there was great objection to the organ on the ground that it was a custom of the Christians.

Now, what was a very remarkable fact was, that Thomas Aquinas opposed the organ in the west, because it was a custom of the Jews. Soon afterwards other reformed synagogues were established, and now they were common all over the continent. These modern synagogues formed a considerable contrast to those of the age of Mendelssohn. The service had been curtailed to less than a fourth of its limits, many parts being expunged, such as the advent of the Messiah, the restoration of Israel, etc. The services were performed in the German language, but Hebrew was retained for some of the cherished lessons of the old liturgy. No distinction now obtains in Teutonic countries, between the Israelites and other citizens, in regard to political privileges. The assistance the Jews gave to William Prince of Orange secured to them the good will of the Dutch. At present they number in that country over 100,000 souls, including men of celebrity in all the departments of learning: they had sixty schools authorised by the government, and excellent training colleges for clergymen. Their charitable institutions had multiplied until they had become a positive nuisance, because they had tended to paralyse industry and to generate poverty. In no European capital were there so many sturdy Jewish beggars as in Amsterdam.

In Austria the Jews were found in large numbers. Many had been driven into an outward profession of Christianity till lately; but since the battle of Sadowa, Austria has been obliged to introduce many radical changes in its system of government. Religious opinion was now perfectly free throughout the empire. Since then the children and the grandchildren of those who were obliged to go over to the Church had come back to the synagogue, bringing with them at the same time all those Christian connections that they had formed. Philosophical transcendentalism, which for a while left the synagogue unscathed, had now proved as hurtful to a large proportion of the Jewish disciples as to those of the Church; and there was as much fanaticism among rationalists as among theologians. The skepticism of Kant, Hegel, and Strauss had advanced with rapid strides, and the majority of the upper classes of the Jews had grown indifferent to revealed truth. Drunkenness and uncharity were rarely to be met with among the Jews of any class; but their orders were much given to gambling and to finery in dress. The Jews may be divided into three classes—the strictly rabbinical, moderate reformers, and ultra radicals. In Germany they excel in intellectual pursuits—even the working-class being in advance in point of intelligence, of the middle class in England and France. After giving a description of the mode of observing the Jewish Sabbath, Mr. Marks referred to the establishment of an agricultural training school in the Holy Land.

Many of the Jews had given their support to this on two grounds. One portion was influenced by the consideration that it would be the means of making the population who desired to acquire such a training industrious. The other portion did it because they saw in it something like a preparing of the way to the fulfilment of the prophetic prediction—"Again will I build thee up, Israel, and thou shalt be built. Thou shalt yet plant vines upon the mountains of Samaria." Those Jews who had faith in biblical prophecy believed in the final ingathering of Israel. They considered that without a future restoration their entire history would be one of the greatest incongruities ever offered to the mind of thinking men; without this, the problem of the preservation and continued identity of the Hebrew people would be incapable of being solved. Without a restoration they felt that they would have no connection with the past or the future, but they would appear like a community to whom Almighty Providence had no fixed design. But they had this belief in a restoration in their hearts, a bright future opened before their eyes and before their face; and they had as they believed, a full view of that part, which they were destined to fill in the closing scene of that great moral drama which the Jews have represented upon the broad theatre of the world. At the same time, this belief does not exert a particle of influence over their social and political relations, because they hold that the restoration of Israel pointed to a time when a thorough change would be brought in the principles of state government, and when all political constitutions existing would be annulled. Hence the sentiments which they cherished for their native land as citizens and as Britons were no more affected by the doctrine of the restoration than are the sentiments of so many Christian brethren who still believed in the millenium. They could both hold their separate religious views without suffering them to diminish in the smallest degree their affection for their common country, or their ardent zeal for its glory and for its prosperity.

The treatment the two and a half million Jews in Russia are subjected to is a disgrace to the government. The worst is a conscription, which is made the precursor of forced baptism. A few drops of holy water, sprinkled by a Greek priest, transforms the conscript Jews into orthodox Christians, and renders them amenable to rules, the violation of which sends them to Siberia. The oriental usage of marrying at an extremely early age drives many young Jews out of Russia into Prussia and England. This class furnishes the principal portion of the converts of the London Society for converting the Jews. He did not object to propagandism, but none but moral means should be employed. He referred to certain material advantages afforded to Jewish converts by this society. In France the Jews were emancipated by the republicans of 1789. Napoleon I. convoked a sanhedrim of rabbis from all parts of the world, to ascertain whether there was anything in the moral and religious code of the Jews incompatible with good citizenship; the result was satisfactory. He doubted if any synagogue was conducted with so much levity as that of France. The Alliance Israelite had done good in an effort to unite all Jews throughout the world in a league for mutual benefit; and the very worst forms of helping the Jews is to send money to Jerusalem, as nine out of every ten Jews in Jerusalem were born beggars. Edward I.'s act of banishment prohibited Jews treading the soil of Britain till Cromwell, in 1656, broached its repeal. But it was by slow steps that ultimate equality was reached in their admission to parliament.

In 1745, when a run on the Bank of England took place owing to the alarm caused by the pretender's invasion, the Jews brought forty-eight wagon loads of gold from the continent to the bank, and the run at once ceased. In this country the Jews had benefited greatly from the progress of education. The University College had conferred important advantages on the upper classes of Jews, and they reflected much credit on their Alma Mater. While they composed only one-thirteenth of the students, they carried off seven-elevenths of the honors. The Jews' Free School in London, with its 2000 pupils of which he has been one, and other schools, had wrought a most extraordinary change on the children of the poor. The number unable to read and write did not exceed one per cent. There was a good many rich Jews in London, but the number of the wealthy was greatly over estimated. The amount they gave in charities would surprise many. There were eight Jews in parliament, some of whom had given free lots of land on their estates for the building of churches, because they held it to be a high social duty to provide for the spiritual instruction of their Christian tenants. A few learned Jews attempted to effect a reform of the Anglo-Jewish synagogue, which being resisted by the ecclesiastical authorities, a new synagogue was instituted in 1842. The ritual was purged of its Michnic and Talmudic portions, and which ever recalled the cruelties of former days; Moses and the prophets being their sole guides. The congregation is rapidly increasing, another reformed synagogue having been established at Manchester. It is ascertained that the Jews number seven millions. In the United States there are 100 synagogues. The Jews had no dogma but this, 'There is but one God.' The Bible is regarded as having three divisions; the Law of Moses, binding in the highest degree and inspired—all the other books, the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, and even the book of Daniel, are called Hagiographa, are not held to be inspired in the same way. They never decline any doctrine from them, unless clearly unfolded in Moses. They do not proselytize, because they hold that every human being, of whatever faith soever, stands in the same relation to God, here and hereafter, as the Jew himself. If a man believes in God, and looks up to him for help, he shall not fail afterward in the future life. They are a nation of witnesses; and it might be asked, how this extraordinary people had been kept separate from other nations, in so remarkable a manner. Rationalists, positivists, and others had started many conjectures for the purpose of solving it; but they had all failed. It could not be solved on natural grounds. But how do the Jews solve it? They throw themselves back on the inspired Scriptures, and bow with reverence before these prophetic words—"Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord... Fear thou not, O my servant Jacob, neither be dismayed, O Israel: for though I make a full end of all nations whither I have scattered thee, yet will I not make a full end of thee; but I will correct thee in measure, and will not leave thee altogether unpunished." Thus prophecy and miracle combine to solve it.

[The above is the substance of two lectures delivered a few years ago by D. W. Marks, chief minister of the congregation of British Jews, and Professor of Hebrew at University College, London. They were delivered before the Philosophical Institution, Edinburgh, Scotland, and are interesting as giving, in brief compass, a sketch of the Jews in Europe for the last 300 years.

"BURIED CITIES RECOVERED."

"Buried Cities Recovered," is the title of a royal octavo volume containing 626 pages, bound in fine muslin, richly ornamented, beveled cover printed on most excellent linen paper in good clear type. It contains over one hundred and seventy illustrations, every one of which conveys to the mind valuable information, many of them being full paged representations of ancient cities, art and ruin, and is published by Bradly & Co., 66 North Fourth St., Philadelphia.

I have always longed to press the soil of the Great East with my own feet, and search with my own eyes the remaining traces of that ancient greatness which refuses to be forgotten. But I am spared of the toil, danger, fatigue and expense of such a task. Great exploration companies armed with pick ax, spade, sieve and vast sums of money have unearthed marvels beyond our conception; and rival scholars have been vying with each other in deciphering monumental inscriptions of ancient royalty, and reading to us the literature of a cultivated scholarship which dates coeval with the cities and empires long since buried, lost and unknown to the human family. And now before me is the volume by Dr. F. S. DeHass, late United States Consul in Palestine, giving extensive and well written accounts and copious artistic views of the "Buried Cities Recovered." So that while I read in mystudy I seem to be on the very streets that were laid, built, and trod so long ago; I gaze upon the stupendous palatial structures which were the glory of a civilization beside which our own looks meek; I stroll through magnificent halls, courts and corridors; I admire the mighty columns, spanning arches, vaulted domes, sculptures and frescoes. With profound amazement I enter the library and behold thousands upon thousands of clay volumes so finely written that they can only be read by the aid of a magnifying glass, but they relate the acts of kings and nations, the same as our own historic works. There are text books on astronomy and political economy; yes, there is the very multiplication table, the rule of cube, root, and all more ancient than Abraham.

Dr. DeHass has divided his book into part first, which contains seven chapters on "Egypt." Part second, which has seventeen chapters on "The Land of Israel." Part third, devotes nine chapters to "Trans Jordanic Palestine," and "an Appendix containing the later discoveries made in Egypt, Assyria, Chaldea, Asia Minor, Greece and Italy," up to November 1882, and an index occupying 8 or 9 pages.

As compared with "The Lord's Land," written by Dr. H. B. Ridgaway, Dr. DeHass does not detain the reader but a very little with the details of his journeying and matters of that sort, but devotes himself more exclusively to matters of discovery and history, and the publishers claim that Dr. DeHass gives much, especially in the line of recent discovery, which is not published in any other volume. And certainly he has much which I have not found anywhere else.

The author's style is easy and his subject matter full of interest as a few extracts will show. Speaking of the Great Pyramid he says: "The celebrated archæologist, Col. Howard Vyse, has discovered upon some of the stones of this pyramid certain hieroglyphics that answer to the name of Shoofoo, rendered by Herodotus Cheops; and Suphis, by Manetho, but which is in reality the identical name of Joseph, the Hebrew. It is therefore inferred that Joseph, during the long famine, when he gathered the people into the cities, and was compelled to feed and find them employment, engaged them in the construction of this grand monument, perhaps for astronomical purposes, or, as a depository for valuable records; and that, by order of Pharoah, he was buried in it at his death and when his people returned to Canaan they carried his remains with them, which will account for the empty sarcophagus, and the pyramid being closed again after first opened."

"It is also a singular coincidence that the description given by Herodotus Cheops, answers exactly the character of Joseph, who, he says, closed the temples of the Egyptians, and forcibly employed the people in building this pyramid; and that the name Saophis found here above the king's chamber, containing the name of Suphis, has been discovered in Wady Magharah, on the rout of the Israelites through the wilderness of Sinai." P. 48, 9.

THE DESTROYING ANGEL.

Speaking of the "vast cemetery, the * * largest in the world, extending * * perhaps 20 miles, estimated to contain at least twenty-five million human bodies," he says: "We entered several pits that appeared to be the burial places for the lower classes, and found long galleries cut in solid lime stone that underlies the desert, filled with mummied piled one upon another, six and eight courses deep like cord wood, all carefully embalmed, and looking as if laid but yesterday * * *. And what is most revolting, the natives are using these mummies for fuel, and fertilising their fields with the dust and ashes of their ancestors! Even stripping them of their winding-sheets, and sending cargoes of the linen wrappings to Europe and America for the manufacture of paper. Some of the linen was of the finest texture, over 500 threads to each inch."

"For scientific purposes we examined many of these remains, and to our surprise found them mostly young persons, their heads thickly coated with straight black hair, all their teeth sound, their bodies well proportioned, and of full habit, as if they died suddenly. They also appeared to have been embalmed hastily,—simply wrapped in swathing bands and dipped in common pitch or bitumen. As it was here, or near this that Moses wrought his miracles before Pharaoh, and as this was the Necropolis for all Egypt, may not some of these be the victims of divine wrath, who perished on that eventful night, when the 'Destroying Angel' swept through the land, cutting off the first born?"

THE RECOVERY OF NINEVEH.

This chapter is full of interest. "Xerxes, Alexander and the Romans, marched their armies and fought their battles over this site without knowing that the city lay buried beneath their tread. * * * During their explorations they came upon the bakery of King Sargon's palace, and old hand-mills, with loaves of bread still in the ovens, baked probably before Rome was founded; and the wine cellar was discovered full of large egg-shaped pottery jars. The wine had all evaporated, leaving a sediment in the jars, from which you could easily detect the odor of the grape when the vessels were filled with water. They also struck upon the store-room, containing many articles in different materials, principally wrought iron, such as nails, saws, chains, picks and shovels * * so well preserved they were put at once into the hands of the workman, and the excavations carried on with shovels and picks, forged by blacksmiths centuries before Christ."

LIBRARIES.

"The most interesting discovery was the finding of numerous inscribed tablets and cylinders in the palace of Sennacherib * *. Hundreds of volumes were found, not written on paper or parchment, but in cuneiform characters on their bricks or clay tiles while yet soft, and then burned hard * *. The books were neatly paged, numbered, catalogued and arranged upon shelves * *. They were all subjects,—history, poetry, biography, agriculture, religion and politics; also grammars, arithmetics, etc. A library of more than 20,000 tablets has been recovered which belonged to an early King of Ur, in Chaldea, "at least 2,000 years before Christ." More on tiles, and on gates of brass and marble slabs was found the history of the world from the creation to a thousand years after the flood. Giving accounts of the very facts and persons, insomuch that it would seem that Abraham copied the first eleven chapters of Genesis from these records before he left Ur, his native land. Here are also the names of Abraham, Ishmael, Noah, Enoch and others. As modern works are often illustrated, so also are these ancient writings. Those records make "Eden" to be the ancient name of Babylon.

Again our author takes us through the gate where Mordecai sat, into the Royal Court where King Ahasuerus held out the scepter to Queen Esther. And in the appendix, among other things he describes the "well of Joseph" which supplies the citadel of Cairo with water. It was discovered by Saladin, filled with sand, when clearing away the site for his fortress. It is 200 feet deep, 15 feet in diameter, excavated in solid rock with a spiral stair case or inclined plane, like the thread of a screw, winding around the well from top to bottom, wide enough to drive two mules abreast, making the entire opening at least 25 feet in diameter * *.

This noble book is full of useful knowledge and thrilling interest. It ought to be in every family, for really, no one can afford to be ignorant of the great themes of which it treats. Whether wisely or otherwise, this book is sold only by subscription, at $3.50; but to ministers of the Gospel, the publishers generously offer to furnish it at greatly reduced rates, if they will communicate personally before the first of May, 1884.—N. Y. Merchant's Journal, Pittsburg Sentinel, March 14, 1884.

CIRCULAR.

To the Students of Prophecy throughout the World:

The undersigned proposes to issue from the press, either in Chicago or in New York City, as circumstances may decide, the following works, to-wit:

I. The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. In the first division the nature of the Coming Age is fully discussed, as to its physical and moral character: 1. That the earth itself has a crowning age, in which it shall be perfectly adapted to be the residence of man in his highest type; 2. That man, in that resurrection state, will be under the endless reign of the Personal Messiah; 3. In establishing the proximity of that age, the prophecies of Ezekiel, Isaiah, Daniel, Zechariah, Christ, Paul, Peter, and the Apocalypse, are critically examined, relative to its rapid approach.

II. The second work will be devoted to the investigation of the various phases of the Eastern Question:—1. The Egyptian phase, 2. The British phase, 3. The Russian phase, 4. The Ottoman phase, 5. The Hebrew phase, 6. The American phase, 7. Lesser phases of the Eastern Question, 8. The location of each of the Great Powers in the coming contest, 9. All nations marshal under the banners of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. These powers are traced in history to the present time. All the great national issues are fully investigated.

If all that are interested in these great and most sublime topics will aid, they will be issued immediately. They will be printed and bound in a form that will do credit to the vastness of the subjects, and put to subscribers at prices quite reasonable. The books will contain about 500 large royal 8vo. pages each.

—BY L. C. THOMAS.—

The above named work is now ready for delivery. It contains 350 pages, 12 mo., on good paper, substantially bound in cloth. Price $1.

Title Page.—"The Law, the Covenants; and the Sabbath. Also an Epitome of the Great Salvation; and an Appendix including various other subjects, in brief."

The Sabbath question is carefully and lengthily examined, and presented and discussed in a somewhat new light.

The work also includes the consideration of Sunday, conditional immortality, the gospel, return of the Jews, the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, punishment of the wicked, the state of the dead, the new birth, the one faith, the one hope, the image of God, nature of Christ, the name, religion, morality, Christianity, etc.
